Senator HIGGS.—I understood that the case of the six hatters was to form the basis of a vote of censure on the Barton Administration. I cannot understand why the leader of the Opposition in another place, Mr. G. H. Reid, who, I regret to learn from a press report, is in the employ of the Employers' Federation of Australia, has not had the courage to move that vote of censure. I saw in the Ballarat Courier a few days ago a statement that when an appeal was made for funds to carry on some federal elections—they wanted some £20,000—it was stated that the Employers' Federation had all they could do to find Mr. Reid's expenses. I hope I am not giving utterance to anything which is not true. I should be very sorry to do so. A report of a speech which I made some time ago, and in which I referred to Mr. Reid, was given in such a way that it conveyed an erroneous impression regarding him. I very much regret that the report appeared in that form, and I should regret to give utterance to anything that would be a misstatement concerning him or any other man. But a report certainly appeared in the Ballarat Courier, setting forth that, according to one speaker, the Employer's Federation had all they could do to find enough to pay Mr. Reid's expenses.

Senator DE LARGIE.—They could not assist this political fund because they had to raise Mr. Reid's expenses.

Senator PULSFORD.—I suppose the honorable senator has a strong suspicion as to the way in which that was brought about?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The statement appeared in the press.

Senator PULSFORD.—But one can get anything he wants in some sections of the press.

Senator HIGGS.—There is a song which I heard at the theatre the other evening that exactly fits this matter—

It's only what I've been told you know

I don't know whether it's true,

But just as it was told to me

I tells it unto you.

Senator PULSFORD.—I understand the honorable senator exactly.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator misunderstands my motive.

Senator PULSFORD.—I understand it perfectly.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator should have been present to hear what the representatives of Queensland had to say regarding the Customs administration. He would have been much more edified than he was by listening to anything about the leader of the Opposition in another place. Touching the six hatters, we have no objection to our own fellow workers in the old country coming to Australia. But let them come here unfettered in any way by agreements; let them come and learn the conditions under which men labour here, and, having done so, let them make their agreements if they desire to do so. The Prime Minister carried out the law. I admire him for it, and I hope that the law will never be altered in this respect. Of course I know that Senator Pulsford would not only admit men under contract, but would open the doors of this country to all the Hindoos and all the coloured men and women of India, whom he regards as our brothers and sisters. Those of us who support the action of the Prime Minister stand on a different footing altogether. Those who are in favour of the section under which the employer who introduced these hatters was required to give an explanation, desire to keep Australia for the white races. They say it is better for the white races, and for the world as a whole, that Australia should be preserved in this way, and I hope that there will be no alteration of the Act. I shall refer this evening to only one other item, and that is the proposed legislation in connexion with New Guinea. I sincerely regret that a Queensland statesman should have ever been induced to annex New Guinea. I think it involves a great waste of money, and that it will prove a danger in the future. This reaching out for more territory when we have such a lot of unsettled territory is like the selfish way in which many good people throughout Australia act when they get the chance. Very good land is cut up in Queensland, and a farmer goes out and takes up 160 acres. Then he sees a selection near him comprising another 160 acres, and he reaches out to grasp that. He has not cultivated, nor half cultivated, the first block before he obtains the second one, and in this way he goes on until he has obtained perhaps 640 acres. A good many other people do the same thing, with the result that settlement is retarded, and the farmers themselves have burdens to carry which are a drawback to them all their lives. In view of the fact that we have such a vast area of country unsettled and fit for settlement, it appears to me to be bordering on the ridiculous for us to go right away to New Guinea and to try and establish settlement there. We shall be fortunate indeed if New Guinea does not bring us into trouble at some future time. I wish we could rid ourselves of the whole place.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Why did not the honorable senator raise that objection when we were discussing it? He raised no objection then.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator cannot remember everything. If he turns to Hansard he will find that he has done me an injustice. I said then what I have said in regard to the New Hebrides, and what I shall say relative to all our attempts to establish an Australian Empire before we have settled our own great continent.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Has the honorable senator already gone back on republicanism?

Senator HIGGS.—I have not gone back on my belief in a republic. As the honorable senator has mentioned that matter, I, at the same time, wish him to understand that I have a great deal of sympathy with republican institutions. I am perfectly loyal. I shall be loyal to the King of England while he is King of England—loyal to the Crown—but if it is ever within my power to influence the public in favour of republican institutions, I shall do what I can in that direction.

Senator PULSFORD.—That is loyalty.

Senator HIGGS.—Certainly it is. I repeat that I am loyal, and shall be loyal, to the King of England while the people of England allow him to remain King; but in my opinion it would be far better for the people of England, and far better for the people of Australia, if there were a republic in both countries. I am looking forward to the time when it will be possible in Australia, and in England, too, for the poorest child of the poorest parents to work his way up to the highest position in the land if he has the requisite ability. I should like to know whether Senator Pulsford can see anything objectionable in that desire. At all events, I do not. I hold these views, and if the people of Queensland are not satisfied that I, as one of their representatives, should do so, they will be able to make a change when the time comes. I trust that wherever I am, and whatever position I occupy as a public man, I shall always have the courage to give expression to my public sentiments, whatever they may be.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—It was not my intention to address the Senate during the debate on the address in reply, because, as a rule, I look upon such a debate as being practically a waste of time, unless there is something serious to complain of upon which the Ministry are attacked strongly and vigorously, and there is something to answer. Most of the questions dealt with in the Governor-General's opening speech have to come before us eventually in Bills, which will have to be dealt with in detail. The only persons who gain by a debate on the address in reply are the members of a clever Ministry who, hearing what members of Parliament generally say during the debate, gauge what measures are likely to receive considerable support, and what measures are likely to receive little or no support. If they are wise they adopt this plan: Those measures which are likely to receive the greatest amount of support are put first upon the notice-paper and are dealt with, but those to which considerable objection has been taken, and against which the chances are that they will not be carried, are kept low down on the paper and become at the end of the session what are known amongst politicians as "the slaughtered innocents."

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator seems to know the game.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But I could not sit still after listening to the speech of Senator Higgs and his references to the Eastern Extension Company. The honorable senator no doubt speaks what he believes to be true, but I can assure him that he makes a very great mistake when he talks about the conduct of the Eastern Extension Company with regard to the Pacific cable being in any way unscrupulous. I know the heads of the Eastern Extension Company. I knew the late Sir John Pender well. He was a man to whom the Empire owed a great deal, because after the first break-down of the cable between England and America, he and Mr. Thomson, who was afterwards made Lord Kelvin, put their hands into their pockets, and between them they did all they possibly could, and eventually succeeded, in laying down the second cable. They did more for telegraphic communication between the Empire and the various parts of the world than any other men I know. Sir John Pender was a most honorable, upright, and straightforward man. So far as the Pacific cable was concerned, he opposed it undoubtedly in the interests of his own company, and quite right, too. That is what Senator Higgs would have done had he been in his position. But he did so in a manly, straightforward manner. I also know the Marquis of Tweeddale, the present chairman of the company, and Mr. Hussy, the secretary. While I was Agent General for South Australia I knew that our interests, and the interests of the Eastern Extension Company were the same, as we had a line across South Australia to Port Darwin connected with the company's cables at Banjoewangie. We were interested with the company in securing that as much business as possible should pass over our line. In my opinion, we in South Australia were much too kind-hearted and considerate to the rest of Australia in dealing with that line, because from the time that overland line was constructed to Port Darwin until about 1896 we lost between £300,000 and £400,000. That money went in some cases, of course, into the pockets of our own people, who used the line; but the very great bulk of it went into the pockets of merchants and others in the other Australian colonies, who used the line.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did the Eastern Extension Company lose much like that?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; they did not lose.

Senator KRATING.—They never lose.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Then why should South Australia have lost?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We should not have lost, and it was a great mistake on our part to make the reductions we did in the charges for carrying messages over the line. We knew that there was a considerable amount of jealousy aroused, especially in Queensland, over the construction of that line. The people of that State thought they would get the line through their territory, and because it happened that the line was constructed in our territory, they always opposed it, and said all the nasty and disagreeable things they could possibly say of it. I can, therefore, thoroughly understand that Senator Higgs, who hails from that banana-land, has heard all sorts of statements made and never contradicted, which he believes to be gospel, and which are not gospel at all. It is because of this that the honorable senator has made the statements to which we have just listened. I opposed the Pacific cable at the conference held at Ottawa in 1894, in the interests of my own State. I opposed it in London during the whole of the time I was there as Agent-General, in the interests of my State. I considered that, as we had a line of cable connecting with Banjoewangie, which connected us with all the Eastern countries, Japan, China, and India, and that as we had another connecting us with Africa, there was no room for a further cable, and that its construction would undoubtedly involve us in a considerable loss, because the only trade which such a cable could get would be from Canada, America, and possibly from a part of Europe. What has been the result? The result has been exactly what I foretold, and we have suffered a loss of £90,000 on the first year's business.

Senator KEATING.—We had no cable to Africa, when the honorable senator opposed the Pacific cable.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, but before the Pacific cable was absolutely agreed upon we had a cable to Africa, which had been promised for years by the Eastern Extension Company. The English Government required a cable to South Africa, which they did not desire should touch upon the foreign possessions along the western coast of Africa, as other cables touched upon French and German colonies on the African coast. They resolved to take a cable from close to Lands End right on to Gibraltar, from there to the Island of Ascension, thence to the Island of St. Helena, thence to Cape Colony and Simon's Bay, across from there to Durban, and then they had not far to go to Mauritius. From there it was to go to Keeling Island, and from Keeling Island to Western Australia. The British Government, after the original troubles in South Africa, found that it would be desirable to have a direct line to South Africa, and the Eastern Extension Company agreed to lay it. We knew for years and years that there was going to be a connexion brought about in that way. I shall not go further into that subject, but I say with regard to Sir John Pender and others, that they acted most honorably. They did no underground tricks, but what every man looking after his own interest would do, what Senator Higgs would have done in the same position, and what every intelligent man would do in the circumstances. With regard to the arrangement made by the Postmaster-General to allow the company to open offices in the Commonwealth, all I have to say is that four States, Western Australia, South Australia, New South Wales, and Tasmania had previously agreed to allow them to open offices, and to allow them to open offices for all time.

Senator DRAKE.—That is so.

Senator PLAYFORD.—What the Postmaster-General has done is to make an agreement under which they are allowed to open offices in the other two States as well. The old agreements with the States to which I have specially referred are to be set aside, and there is to be a new agreement with all the States, lasting only for twelve years, at the end of which time fresh arrangements can be made. No matter what we did, we could not prevent the company having offices opened in the States to which I have referred, including as they do some of the principal States, the mother State, the important State of South Australia, and the important State of Western Australia, which will be a very big State within a very few years, and will possibly beat some of the other States which are now of more importance. When that is considered, I think it must be admitted that the Postmaster-General has made an excellent arrangement with the Eastern Extension Company. Now, I have something else to say about Queensland, the State which Senator Higgs represents. I have something to say about the sugar duty and the rebates thereon. I have to say that, speaking of my own State of South Australia, I think it is a scandalous shame that we should be called upon to pay one penny towards the rebate upon sugar grown by white labour in Queensland. years past most of the States, and practically all with the exception of Queensland have been true to the idea of a white Australia. Some of them, and especially South Australia, at considerable loss to themselves, kept the yellow and the black man out. Queensland did nothing of the sort. She allowed them to come in, and used them for the growth of sugar. Now it is proposed that we should try to do as possible to ease the sugar cultivators down, and agree to give them a rebate on sugar grown by white labour. Surely it was never intended that the States which subjected themselves to considerable loss in keeping out the yellow man and the black man, should now throw their hands into their pockets to help pay Queensland, which State was not true to the sentiment of a white Australia? If we take the case of South Australia, we admit that we allowed a certain number of Chinamen to come in to make the railways to the auriferous fields near Port Darwin. It was a railway of 120 miles in length, and the question was raised whether white or coloured labour should be employed in the construction.

Senator Higgs.—Who was Premier of South Australia then?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Sir John Kingston. I have heard it said that I was concerned in this business, and I have also heard it said that my old comrade, Charles Cameron Kingston, was a party to it. But we opposed the action of the Government in giving the tender to Miller Bros., on the understanding that they should be allowed to use what labour they liked. So if Mr. Kingston is concerned, I can say that no man in the whole of the Australian States has been more true and consistent in his advocacy of a white Australia, and in this matter a considerable amount of injustice has been done us by the circulation of so evil a report. Immediately after the construction of that line a law was passed in South Australia to prevent any Chinamen coming in. We saw the mistake we had made. A considerable section of the South Australian Parliament looked upon it as a mistake at the time. A minority then became a majority, and soon afterwards they brought in a Bill to stop that kind of thing in the future. What has been the result? The result has been that practically ever since we lost from £50,000 to £100,000 a year. We have lost also in another way by the policy pursued. For instance, when I was in London as Agent-General for South Australia, a gentleman well known in the financial world there and a man of considerable means came to me and said—"Now, Mr. Playford, we intend to form a chartered company to take over the Northern Territory from you. We will pay the whole of the money you have spent upon it in hard cash"—We had spent practically £3,000,000—"We will take the territory over from you and form a chartered company." It was something like the Matabeleland Company of which we have heard so much, and of which the late Cecil Rhodes was the head. I said to this gentleman—"Put your offer in writing. But there is one point to be considered: What about labour?" He said—"We must have a free hand as regards labour. You sell the territory to us and we shall deal with the Imperial Government as regards labour. We must have absolutely a free hand as regards labour." My old colleague, Mr. Kingston, was Premier at the time, and I told this gentleman—"I expect you will not get it." I wrote a letter to Mr. Kingston in which I told him that there would not be the slightest trouble in South Australia getting rid of the Northern Territory, that the chartered company was booming, and there would be no trouble in floating the whole thing in London. The only point was as to whether he would allow them a free hand in the matter of labour conditions. I also said that, looking at the interests, not of South Australia alone, but of the whole of Australia, although we were a small colony, and could by this arrangement get rid of the whole of our liabilities, including the continual liability of about £100,000 a year, we could not make a more fatal mistake than to allow of the influx of a coloured population to that Territory. I pointed out that they would settle there and breed there, and that though they might not trouble us so long as we lived, they would eventually become a menace to which the trouble of the negro in the United States would be a mere flea-bite. I said—"If you agree to the proposal you send me one word," and I gave him a code word. If he disagreed he was to send me another word. Very soon after Mr. Kingston got my letter, a Cabinet meeting was held, the Cabinet said "No," and that was the reply I received. Here we are, then, in this position in South Australia, that we have shown that we believe in a white Australia to our financial loss. At the same time, we do not believe in putting our hands into our pockets to help Queensland, which has not shown her belief in it at all, which has never suffered any financial loss in the matter, but which now, in accordance with the policy of the Government, deliberately comes forward and says—"Oh, you pay your share amounting to £5,500," when I contend that we ought not to be required to put our hands into our pockets at all. If there is a State which ought to be exempted from such an imposition it is undoubtedly South Australia, which has suffered quite enough for doing all she possibly could to keep Australia white.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—South Australia has a bigger proportion of coloured aliens in her Northern Territory than has Queensland.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have 2,000 of them altogether. I wish to say a few words about the creation of the High Court. This Parliament ought to be specially economical, because all the States, with one or two exceptions, have suffered severely from the drought. It will take some years before these States can recover, and during that time we ought to do all we possibly can to return to their Treasurers, through the Customs, as large a sum as possible, so as to prevent the imposition of unnecessary taxation. I shall always be found voting on the side of economy where it is wise and judicious; but when I come to the cost of a High Court I am met with this position, that it is absolutely necessary. It is suggested that the Chief Justices of the States should be asked to constitute the High Court—they would not undertake this duty without being paid for their services—and that this arrangement should last for a few years, or for a number of years, as the case might be. I do not like a makeshift of that kind. If we are going to establish a High Court, and its creation is absolutely necessary, it had better be constituted on the lines of the Supreme Court of the United States than be composed of the Chief Justices of the States. It does not follow at all that no Chief Justice of a State would be appointed to the High Court Bench. No man can serve two masters, and the Chief Justice of a State, no matter how he might try to be fair, just, and honorable, as I have no doubt every one of them would be if appointed, might have some little inclination to favour the State which he served as against the Commonwealth. It is far better that there should be no room for any suspicion. It is far better that we should have our own independent Judges. The only question to be considered is whether the amount which it is proposed to pay for their services is not excessive, and whether the expenses in connexion with the court cannot be cut down to a reasonable extent, always remembering that we must have efficiency. I shall be one of those who will assist to cut down the expenses if it is shown that it can be reasonably done. Coming to the question of the naval subsidy, Senator Higgs has said that he believes in the formation of an Australian Navy. I, too, believe that it would be a great deal better for Australia if we had a navy. But we are not in the position of those who sang in England a few years ago—"We have the ships, we have the men, we have the money, too." We have not the trained men; we have not the ships; and it appears to me that we have not the money. We cannot afford to buy a fleet at the present time, and to go into the London money market for that purpose would, I believe, be a great mistake. The Imperial Government certainly protects us. If we were dissevered from the old country, and the Imperial Government gave it out to the world that they took not the slightest interest in Australia or its concerns, I wonder where we should be with the yellow man. We might be in rather a tight fix with the yellow man in the northern part of the Commonwealth. I shall not pursue that line of thought, because I cannot imagine the time will ever come when we shall be severed from the old country, and shall belong to the wonderful republic which Senator Higgs has alluded to so feelingly. Of all the forms of government which I have been able to read about; of all the forms of government which have ever existed in this world, the one which is most satisfactory and least troublesome to the people, the one which causes the least friction to the people, and which is practically the least expensive, is undoubtedly a constitutional monarchy. In the new naval agreement provision is made for training our men, and, after all, that is one of the most important points to be considered. We need to get the trained men before we secure the ships. To get the ships before we train the men is like a man getting a wife before he buys a house. At the present time, and for the present, which is stipulated, it is eminently desirable that we should enter into an agreement, and pay this exceedingly small sum to Great Britain. Considering the neighbouring colony of New Zealand has entered into the spirit of the thing, may as well follow her example, pay her share of the subsidy, and get our men trained; and then, when possibly we may be in a more prosperous position than we are now, we may talk about buying ships to be manned with the men we have trained if we can only find the money. At the present time, however, it is premature to talk of buying ships. We shall do nothing in that direction if we refuse to pay this subsidy. It would be meaningless for our part not to make some contribution to the mother country, which certainly protects us, and would protect us against any hostile force no matter from what quarter it might come. I am highly amused at my honorable friends from Western Australia referring to what they call the transcontinental railway. I have never heard of a railway to run along a continent being called a transcontinental railway. The general understanding of a transcontinental railway is that it is one to run along the coast on one side of the continent to the coast on the other side. But our honorable friends from Western Australia—that is, of sin, sorrow, and sand—will insist on using this high sounding phrase of "transcontinental railway." I believe that they will carry their point from the very fact that the people will not understand after all it is only a railway to run along the coast. I have some knowledge of the territory in South Australia; and from having seen some of the land, I am second, from talking with those who have gone over the route of the line; and, third, from having, when Commissioner of Crown Lands, sent out an expedition to report on the Nullarbor Plains. The fact is that on the border line of Western Australia and South Australia there is an immense area of well-grassed land. The puzzle is that it grows good but is not well grazed. It is one immencrystalline limestone formation in which all the water runs away, in which you cannot make a dam until you get to some granite outcrop. I thought that we might be able to get artesian water. When I was in office I suppose I spent over £5,000, and I believe that South Australia has spent from £10,000 to £20,000 to that end. We sank to a depth of 3,000 feet, but we never got artesian water. We got water to flow up a considerable height in the case of the tubing, and when it was pumped up it was always found to be stock water which could not be used for engines. It appears to me that our experience on the Nullarbor Plains will be repeated elsewhere along the route of the line. The country, with the exception of a slip round Port Augusta, right away to Kalgoorlie, with the exception of a slip round Eucla, has never been taken up by the pioneering squatters. If they could have made dams they would have taken up the land. If they could have got wells they would have taken up the land. It has not been taken up, not because it has not food for stock, but simply because it is waterless. For the whole distance from Port Augusta, except near that port, to Kalgoorlie, the railway would not pick up one ton of freight on the one hand, or one passenger, practically, on the other hand. It would never pay. The absurdity of the proposal to adopt the 4ft. 8½in. gauge is apparent, when it is mentioned that the railway from Perth to Coolgardie, in Western Australia, as well as the railway from Terowie to Port Augusta, in South Australia, is built on the 3ft. 6in. gauge. To connect those two railways with a line built on the 4ft. 8½in. gauge would be the very height of absurdity. Over this plain country there would be no big cuttings to be made. There would be no trouble in making a railway. It could be made very cheaply—practically on the surface. With a 3ft. 6in. gauge a train could travel at the rate of 50 miles an hour, in a straight run, without the slightest difficulty. That rate would be quite fast enough for any purpose, especially as there would be no passengers to be picked up, and the whole distance could be run without many stoppages. There is only one ground on which its construction can be defended. If it is required for defence purposes, then the rest of the community might put their hands into their pockets to the tune of say £50,000 or £100,000 per annum to make up the loss which would be occasioned. They might find that sum every year for defence purposes, just as we find the money to insure our buildings against fire. But for no other reason can its construction be advocated in fairness to the rest of the community. As it is not to come before us in a definite form this session, I shall not pursue the subject any further. Another point which has not been touched upon here or elsewhere, so far as I know, is the creation of the Inter-State Commission. I question very much whether it is wanted at the present time. I do not know what questions we have to bother about, except the Murray River question, which may have to be dealt with by the High Court, and possibly by the Privy Council eventually.

Senator PEARCE.—How about the railway freights on the South Australian railways?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I know of no trouble between South Australia and Victoria at the present time. There used to be a little trouble, and there may be some now, but any difficulty could be overcome by constituting the Inter-State Commission of the chief managers of the State railways, and it might not be necessary to pay those gentlemen very much for their services. I do not believe that there is any necessity at the present time for an Inter-State Commission, although possibly one may be necessary in the future. I shall wait to hear what are the arguments in favour of its establishment. If it can be shown that by means of an unjust tariff the railways of one State are competing unfairly with those of neighbouring States, and that it necessitates the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, of course I shall be prepared to vote in that direction. But unless that justification can be shown I am not prepared to saddle the community with a very large annual expense for a commission which, when appointed, would have little or no work to do. A great deal has been said about the Customs administration. I do not propose to go into this question at any length. I had the pleasure of listening to my old colleague, the Minister for Trade and Customs, to-day, when he wiped the floor of the other House pretty well with his opponents in his usually vigorous style. I know that there is no more honorable or straightforward man than

Mr. Charles Cameron Kingston. He will do what he believes to be absolutely right, and in the interests of the public. He is not at all given to taking advantage of anybody. He has not a "down" upon anybody. One individual said on one occasion that it was in consequence of the Minister having some special dislike to him that certain action was taken. I know that that statement is absolutely false. If anything, he is a good deal too fond of forgiving his enemies; and he has forgiven some which it would have been a good deal better for him if he had not forgiven. But be that as it may, I listened carefully to a great many of Senator Pulsford's statements. There is one case of which he made a great song. It is that of a sailor who came ashore in Sydney with some silk and a bible, and who was very improperly, according to Senator Pulsford, interfered with by a Customs officer. Sir, he was very properly interfered with. People are not allowed to bring on shore silk, which is a highly dutiable commodity, without giving notice to the Customs officers, and those officers did right in arresting the man. The only point I have any doubt about is as to whether they might not have said to him—"You say you are going to post the silk and the bible by parcels post to New Zealand, and that it was given to you in London for that purpose. Come along to the post-office and let us see you post it and put the direction upon it, and we will let you go." Something of that sort might have been done to see if the man had any bona fides. But you must not allow these people to come ashore with dutiable commodities without paying duty. I know how tobacco and cigars and all sorts of dutiable goods are smuggled in this way by ships' officers. My honorable friend, Senator Charleston, who is an engineer, was once on board a steamer that regularly ran into San Francisco, and he can tell many curious stories of how years ago ships' officers used to smuggle things in, and divide the spoils amongst themselves. We have to watch them very closely. With regard to the promised Bill for the establishment of a Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, I shall heartily support it. I believe it is a proper step to take. If there is a trouble with labour extending beyond the borders of any one State, and affecting two at least, it becomes pretty serious, and it is a great deal better to save

all bother than to allow serious strikes to take place, causing severe injury to the public. No one has said anything about the High Commissioner in London. I say that the appointment of a High Commissioner is absolutely premature. You want no High Commissioner in London until you float a loan there. If the Treasurer is going to float a loan, he should have a High Commissioner there, who should certainly do the inscription of our stock. These States have lost hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of pounds because they did not do the inscription of the stock for themselves. For several years in the State of Victoria—and also in the State of New South Wales—the Government was paying £500 per million to various banks for inscribing their stock. We in South Australia were doing the same, paying the firm of Glynn, Mills, and Co. I took up the work when I became Agent-General for South Australia, and did it myself. I did it in the first year for £105 per million, and on the next occasion for £85 10s. per million. I dare say that it is now being done for less than £80 per million. The sum I saved in that way for South Australia was two or three thousand pounds a year while I was Agent-General. The agents in London for the Crown colonies have undertaken the inscription of stock from the very time of the passing of the original Inscription of Stock Bill, and this work only costs the Crown colonies about £90 per million. I think that Messrs. Ommanney and Blake were the Crown agents when I was at Home, and they told me that they had done the work for the Crown colonies from the very inception, and had saved those colonies a very large sum of money. Therefore, I say that our High Commissioner must start with the inscription of our Commonwealth stock for the first federal loan floated in London. And that first loan ought to be a decent-sized loan—certainly not less than a million. The idea of the Treasurer floating a loan of £500,000 was a mere pettifoggish thing—it was ridiculous. You must not float in London, for the Commonwealth, less than a million, at least—a couple of millions would be better. Then you can test the market to see what your stocks are quoted at on the Exchange. You can see what their value is as compared with all other colonial stocks, and be able to tell whether you will save any money by consolidating your State loans. You cannot tell that before, because you do not know what your stocks will be worth. When your federal loan gets among the Stock Exchange quotations and people are dealing with your stock, and working upon it, and there have been a great many transactions in connexion with it, and other states of things exist, and you can compare the quotations from day to day from the Stock Exchange, so that you can see the difference between the Commonwealth loans and State loans, you can say whether the Commonwealth can take over State debts in payment for the premises which have been transferred to it by the States. We shall then be able to say that at a certain price we can float on the London market at a certain figure, and can save a certain amount of interest on the transaction, which will be very beneficial to the Commonwealth and the States. But until you have floated a Commonwealth loan in London, you cannot talk about consolidating stocks. A great many of the people who talk about consolidating State stocks, have not the remotest idea of the trouble there is in reference to the matter. You fancy that you can get people who have got stocks belonging to an individual State to give up their stocks in return for Commonwealth stocks or bonds, and you think that you are going to gain a lot of money by the transaction. As a matter of fact, you are going to gain nothing by it practically. People will want more than an equivalent. The colony of New Zealand tried that years ago. They formerly had provincial Governments. Those provincial Governments issued loans. The interest on these loans ranged from 7 per cent. to 5 per cent. Then they had established a central Government, and the central Government offered to the people who had the provincial bonds—and, therefore, only the security of the provinces—the security of the whole of New Zealand. But they had the biggest trouble in the world to get the people to give up their provincial stock. They offered a 4 per cent. stock, and in one instance that I know of they had to pay £136 for a £100 bond to get people to come in. There was one of the 7 per cent. loans which they tried to consolidate at 4 per cent. They got about £15,000,000, I think. But there was a considerable number of stock-holders who would not come in under any circumstances. The result of that transaction—although it appeared at first sight that because of the difference in interest between 7 per cent. and 4 per cent., it was a good thing for New Zealand—was, as I said to the Agent-General for New Zealand before I left, a total loss to that country. I said to him, "Many of those loans of yours would have run out in due course, when you could have borrowed the money again at 3 or 3½ per cent. You have saddled yourselves with 4 per cent., and, because of the amount you have paid to redeem the old stocks, with a vastly increased debt. You are paying a higher rate of interest than you would have paid if you had let those stocks run out." I wrote a long report upon this subject to Sir Frederick Holder, now the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and who was then the Treasurer of South Australia. Although we had a number of 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. bonds, and also a lot of 4 per cent. bonds, and although we were then borrowing at 3½ per cent.—we could not borrow at that rate now—I told him that I would not advise him to attempt to consolidate our stocks, because the people in London who held our bonds would just say—"It is all very well; we have got those bonds which are worth so much in the market; if you want to buy them from us you must give us that money and something else to induce us to give up the bonds." Because an equivalent amount to what they could have obtained in the open market would not have induced them to part with the bonds. They would have nothing to do with an offer of that kind. You must give them more than an exact equivalent; and every penny you give them beyond that equivalent is so much loss to you. It will be clear from this, I hope, that this consolidated stock business is not so easy as a great many people have been led to believe from what has appeared in the newspapers. There is only one other point to which I wish to refer, and that is the federal capital. I say that, in common justice to New South Wales, we ought to settle that question as soon as we possibly can. We have agreed to an Act of Parliament, and we are bound to abide by its terms. I see that an attempt is being made in some of the newspapers to have the matter reconsidered—to have another referendum, and to obtain the decision that either Sydney or Melbourne shall be the established capital of the Commonwealth.

Any such attempt ought to fail. We have agreed to the Constitution, and are bound to our agreement; and the sooner—in common fairness to the people of New South Wales—we settle the matter the better. But at the same time I am not prepared to spend any money for some time to come. We must be in a far better position financially before we can afford to build the capital. I do not believe that we can spend a small sum and put up with cheap and nasty buildings. That would be a great mistake. If we are going to lodge our people in wooden shanties—which probably will be burnt down if we do—it will be a great mistake. We must do the work decently, but we must wait until we have the money to do it with. But, in justice to New South Wales, we should tell that State what position we have fixed upon, because she is keeping out of the market lands that are ready for settlement. She is keeping out of the market those sites which have been favorably reported on by Mr. Oliver and others; and we should not retard her progress by delaying the selection of the site question any longer than is necessary. As to the preferential trade business, we have heard the speech of Senator Symon. His imagination ran riot in that portion of his address in which he taxed Mr. Chamberlain with having brought this subject forward as an electioneering dodge—as something sprung upon the people of England as a surprise. I can tell honorable senators that so far as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned, he has had this idea in mind for a good many years, and has not kept it to himself. When I was in London in 1897 or 1898, there was a big meeting of Chambers of Commerce, at which Canada was represented, and members of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of such large centres as Liverpool and Glasgow were present. Mr. Chamberlain, on that occasion, reviewed the whole situation, and left no doubt upon the minds of those who listened to him that personally he was in favour of establishing some system of preferential trade within the borders of the Empire. He had no special scheme to advocate at that time, and he spoke with very great caution, as befitted a man occupying the important position he then held. But he left no doubt upon the minds of those who could read between the lines that his feelings undoubtedly were in favour of preferential trade within the Empire. I may add that

Senator Playford.

I had a conversation with Mr. Chamberlain on the subject. When I saw him he had some idea—as Rosebery also had—of a Zollverein under which there would be trade between various parts of the Empire and a Tariff against the outside world. I told Mr. Chamberlain that so far as my State was concerned—and I believe I could speak for the various Australasian States as well—we could not agree to anything of that sort. It would ruin manufactures and we should not be able to get from the Tariff on goods which come from outside sources sufficient money to meet our wants. If we were prepared to do anything at all it would be on a give-and-take principle. I said “If I will put an extra duty on foreign wool, South Australia will give you preference over some foreign manufactures. If you put a duty on wool you may say it is a tax on raw material, but on manufactured material, which is re-exported, of course you can remit the duty. You might tax on wheat, butter, fruits, and a number of many lines with which we could supply you while we might meet you with a preferential trade in other directions in which we could supply us. But, certainly, free-trade between Great Britain and the various parts of the Empire, with protection against the outside world, would not suit us under the present circumstances.” I look upon the question as being, at the present time, in a nebulous state. It may rise eventually into some great planet—into some shining star—but it is in a nebulous state at the present moment; and, until we hear something more definite as to what Mr. Chamberlain proposes to do—what preferences he is going to give, upon what particular articles he is going to give it, and what he shall be asked to be prepared to give in return—we need not seriously discuss it. Personally, however, I look at it as being a good thing, because it will not merely bind the people of this country together by bonds of sympathy—it will bind them by stronger bonds—bonds of interest; and if our mutual interests can be joined by some system of this sort the bonds of Empire will be much stronger factors than they are at the present time.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 3 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To make a personal explanation, I wish to call attention to a statement made by the honorable member for North Sydney on Thursday last. He is reported to have said—

I know that when the division came on—

The division upon the tea duty—

the honorable member for Eden-Monaro was looking for the Attorney-General, because that Minister had left the House in the face of an important division without pairing.

It is possible that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro was looking for me, and that I was not in the chamber, but I have reason to remember, because of the surprise which occurred in connexion with the division, and because I have since consulted my diary, that I was within the precincts of the chamber from the commencement to the close of the sitting. I have not the least doubt that the honorable member for North Sydney made the statement in good faith in consequence of something which he heard. I am concerned only with the fact that I was in the building during the whole evening, and did not leave until after the division was taken. I was paired for the division to oblige a member of the Opposition.

Mr. THOMSON.—As a matter of personal explanation, and in reply to the Attorney-General, I wish to say that it is a duty and a pleasure to accept his statement unreservedly. What I said was in reply to an unexpected interjection, and it might be excusable if, under such circumstances, I did not speak with the close accuracy which might have been expected had I made a deliberate statement. I do not put my explanation upon that ground, however. I had ample justification for the statement, for on the night of the division upon the tea duty, and shortly before the division took place, the Government Whip—the honorable member for Eden-Monaro—stated that the Attorney-General had left the House and had not paired. He then endeavoured to obtain a pair for him, and put down the name of a representative of New South Wales, who at the time was absent from Victoria. I objected to the name being used, because the honorable member to whom it belonged had told me in a recent conversation that he was in favour of the duty upon tea, and another pair was found. The Government Whip was certainly seeking a pair for the Attorney-General, although, I accept the statement of the latter, and that he was within the precincts of the House. I could support my statement as to the seeking for a pair by the testimony of other honorable members if I chose to bring them into the question, but I do not feel justified in doing so. I am quite satisfied to leave the matter where it is, and stop at the statement of facts within my own knowledge.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—With reference to the statements made by the Attorney-General and the honorable member for North Sydney, the fact that the division alluded to was taken nearly twelve months ago makes it impossible for anyone to be very clear as to what members were or were not within the precincts of the House at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is impossible to allow a debate to take place upon a personal explanation. The Attorney-General was within his rights in making such an explanation, but I am not sure that the honorable member for North Sydney was in order in following him, and I am certain that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro will not be in order in proceeding to discuss the matter further.

RELIEF TO THE CROTTY MINERS.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—In view of the fact that the Commonwealth Constitution is similar to that of the United States of America, and that the American Congress voted £200,000 for the relief of the victims of the Mount Pelee disaster, and that now at Crotty, in Tasmania, over 1,000 people are almost destitute because of the amalgamation of two mines there, will the Prime Minister place upon the Estimates the sum of £10,000 to assist those pioneers?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I am under the distinct impression that it is not within the power of the Commonwealth Parliament to vote money for such a purpose. The honorable member speaks in a good cause, and I shall give the matter further consideration; but I hope that what I say now will not be supposed for one instant to be an intimation that I think that what he asks will be granted.

FEDERAL ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Mr. BROWN.—With reference to the alleged omissions from the Federal electoral rolls, I wish to ask the Minister for Home Affairs if he proposes to take steps to have the names of electors who are said to have been left off enrolled prior to the boundaries of the State divisions being finally decided upon?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have already taken what action is possible. The lists of names—which are really the rolls—have been printed in New South Wales, and I hope to have them exhibited at every post-office in the State within the next day or two. I believe that they are to be sent out to-day or to-morrow. I have also inserted notices in the press, pointing out the discrepancies to which the honorable member alludes, and asking electors to inspect the rolls and to send in their names to the officer in Sydney if they find that they have been omitted.

GENERAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. POYNTON. — Will the Prime Minister indicate to the House what measures he considers are of such importance as to warrant the prolongation of the session until such a time as will make it impossible to hold the elections to this House and to the Senate upon the same day?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—In all courtesy to the honorable member, I do not feel called upon to make a Ministerial explanation on the subject at this stage. There will be a proper occasion for a Ministerial explanation as to the course of business.

ELECTORAL ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McDONALD.—Have the Government decided whether they will introduce a Bill to amend that provision of the Electoral Act which prevents State members from contesting federal seats?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Steps were taken in some of the Parliaments of the States to prevent federal members from seeking election to the State Parliament, and when the Electoral Bill was before this House a provision was inserted in it making State members ineligible as candidates for the Federal Legislature. The whole matter involves a wide question of policy, and I am not at present prepared to say that the Government will consent to any amendment in the law, but the matter will be taken into consideration at an early date.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And heads counted.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. To count heads is the peculiar province of the Opposition.

PERMANENT STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. CONROY.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister when the adoption of the new standing orders, prepared last session, is likely to be moved?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have not discovered any such great difference between the standing orders provisionally adopted and those which have been prepared by the Standing Orders Committee—although the latter are, in some respects, an improvement on the former—as will warrant me in a session like the present, in taking up the time that I can see would be occupied in their discussion by putting them before honorable members.

COMMONWEALTH POSTAGE STAMP.

Mr. CLARKE asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Whether the Government has yet considered the desirability of introducing an uniform Commonwealth postage stamp.

2. If so, what is the result of such deliberations.

3. If not, will he consider the matter as soon as possible.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

(1) Yes, so far as the Commonwealth postage stamp can be made uniform during the book-keeping period.

(2 & 3) A decision will shortly be arrived at and made public.

RIFLE CLUB REGULATIONS.

Mr. FISHER asked, the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. When the new regulations re rifle clubs are likely to be issued?

2. Whether any of the new rifles are to be issued to rifle clubs?

3. Whether it is his intention to increase the price of ammunition to members of rifle clubs?

4. Why it is that requisitions for passes over Queensland railways may not be signed by the nearest Defence Force officer, as was the case prior to federation?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow :—

1. At an early date.
2. Yes, when available.
3. Not at present.
4. Inquiry is being made into the matter.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH : ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 2nd June (vide page 384), on motion by Mr. L. E. GROOM—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted :—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—I should have been very willing under ordinary circumstances to co-operate with other honorable members in saving the time of Parliament by curtailing this debate, even to the extent of refraining from making any observations, were it not that I feel that although the leader of the Opposition has not tabled any motion in the nature of a challenge to the Government, I could not, in view of my duty to my constituents and in self-respect to myself, forego making certain observations upon the administration of the Government since the conclusion of last session, and upon the Ministerial programme contained in the speech of the Governor-General. I feel sure that every one who heard the speech delivered last night by the honorable member for Wentworth must feel that the most serious and most damning case was made out against the Minister for Trade and Customs as the direct administrator of his department, and against the Government as a whole. Ministers have not denied the challenge of the honorable member that they have all individually taken exception to their colleague's administration, and yet have allowed him to continue in his control of the Customs, to the detriment and discredit of the Commonwealth. Any one who reads that speech must admit that the Ministry stand committed for trial before the bar of public opinion. I desire in the first place to deal with one or two questions of administration, and I shall afterwards direct my attention briefly to the programme put forward by the Government. In the first place it is to be noted that when Parliament prorogued the Prime Minister had not returned from England. It will be recollected that a number of honorable members of the Opposition, myself in particular, had taken most marked exception to what I have never had any hesitation in characterizing as an immoral breach of political obligation on the part of the Prime Minister in connexion with his Maitland manifesto. I do not wish to go over the old ground again, although some honorable members on this side of the House have thought it desirable, but I desire to repeat my belief that quite outside of the tactics of politics, for which I am prepared after twenty years of political experience to make great allowances, the Prime Minister has by his action forfeited all claim to respect. Great as was my admiration for the Prime Minister, and willing as I was to stand by him and help him to consummate the great scheme of federation, I say now, and I shall say to the end of the chapter, that he went right beyond the bounds of political allowance with regard to party movements, and committed a great moral delinquency in deceiving the people of New South Wales in regard to the Tariff. It is all very well to say that the fiscal question should not be raised in New South Wales to-day. I admit that if the Maitland manifesto had been carried out in its letter and spirit, we, as a party, would have no right to disturb the commercial and industrial affairs of the Commonwealth by again bringing that question before the people; but when we can prove out of the mouth of a member of the Government, that the Maitland manifesto was intended as, and was taken to be, an assurance to the people of Australia—because Maitland was, so to speak, the Mount Sinai of the Commonwealth—that the fiscal question was not to be raised, and that, therefore, it ought to be put aside as irrelevant to the election, the charge goes home in such a way that it cannot be refuted. I need only refer to the statements reiterated by the Vice-President of the Executive Council that we ought not to allow the wretched fiscal issue to enter into our consideration, but choose the best men, not from the fiscal point of view, but in every other sense of the word to take part in the great and responsible work of carrying on the business of the Commonwealth. If further proof were wanted of the impression that was created by the Prime Minister's speech, is it not contained in the memorable event which took place in this Chamber when the honorable member for Kooyong, the honorable member for the Grampians, and the honorable member for Flinders, who were intimate friends of the Government and sat on the Government benches, speaking in pathetic terms, told us that they had been deceived by the Prime Minister and the Government, and that, in order to put their protest into the most definite and dramatic form, they would cross the House and sit in opposition? Does it need any torrent of language to bring the position home to the minds of the public? I started upon my federal career with a fixed determination to help in the carrying through of the great work of federation, but when, after believing for years in the high ideals which the Prime Minister, above all men in Australia, had put before the public as to our future national life, I find him stooping down from his pedestal of perfection to act the groundling in political life, how can I repose any further confidence in him? I shall continue to lose confidence in him. I have watched to see how far he has realized his own high standard of political idealism. The Prime Minister proceeded to Great Britain as a kind of emissary from the Australian people, to represent them at what may be looked upon as an initial form of Imperial Council, which may in future years determine the destinies of the Empire, of which we are a part. I watched to see how far he would show himself fit to occupy that high position. We all remember—and it has a bearing upon our present day politics—reading his utterances as reported in the English newspapers from time to time. It has been claimed as a subject for credit that he spoke frequently at great functions, and that he never in the whole course of his circuit of representation committed Australia to a single opinion. I submit that this reflects no great credit upon him, because, although he was not authorized to commit this Parliament to any particular measure touching the interests of the Empire or the Commonwealth, he had full authority to express his own opinion as to what ought to be done. We find, however, that from first to last there was a series of swollen speeches, speeches full of swollen Imperialism, regarding what ought to be done in the interests of the Empire, in absolute forgetfulness of the fact that the policy of his own Government was calculated to completely undermine the union of the Empire. What could one think? I was reminded of the process adopted by some enterprising butchers when they want to sell veal. They blow it out for exhibition in their shop windows. That seems to me to afford a forcible illustration of the kind of utterance we had from the right honorable gentleman. His speeches were redolent of Imperialism of the most swollen character, as if he had not a thought for that insignificant corner of the world called Australia. The Empire was to be everything, and yet the right honorable gentleman had brought forward a programme under which the subjects of his own King were absolutely barred from passing from one part of the Empire to another. Afterwards we find him actually stooping, in deference to the socialistic party in this country, to shut out for days together men of his own flesh and blood coming from the very country in which these swollen utterances of his were delivered. We are told that under the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act the Prime Minister's hands were tied, but the section which it is said prevented him from exercising a discretion, and which should not have been passed, was accepted in the most mild and meek manner by the Attorney-General without reference to the Government, because the honorable member for Bland had suggested it.

MR. KINGSTON.—Was the honorable and learned member in the House at that time?

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—No; but I have read Hansard with great care, and I know exactly what took place. The leader of the labour party rose and said—"I have an amendment to make," and the Attorney-General said—"I should like to hear it." He did hear it, and it was accepted, and was passed into law. It has been said that once that section was passed the Prime Minister had nothing to do but to carry out its provisions; but what does the section provide? That no man who has been contracted for shall land in the Commonwealth unless the Prime Minister has first of all ascertained that he is required for the industrial purposes of the Commonwealth.

I have paraphrased the section of the Act, but that really is the effect of it. It was aimed at keeping out large bodies of men, who might be contracted for in other countries, and brought out under engagement against the interests of the working classes already here. It was quite open to the Government to say that they would be no party to such a provision. They might have said that they were entirely at one with the socialistic party in preventing men from being brought here under contract at rates of pay below those current here, and it would have been an easy matter for them to hold as null and void every contract which had been entered into in other parts of the world. Taking the section as it stands, however, the Prime Minister is made the arbitrator as to whether men, who are brought out here under engagement, are required in the country. Required by whom—by Mr. Anderson, or by the workmen? Was it ever intended by Parliament that the Prime Minister should, on every occasion that a man or a number of men happened to be landed here under contract, be constituted a kind of Royal commission to make an inquiry into the economic circumstances of the trade affected? That is what the Prime Minister undertook to accomplish. He undertook to solve the problem without making any inquiry of a widespread character. Thus these English artisans were detained for six days in a sort of moral quarantine whilst the Prime Minister formed an opinion as to whether half-a-dozen additional hatters were required amongst 4,000,000 of people. For the right honorable gentleman to adopt such an attitude after his grandiloquent utterances upon Imperial affairs in London was a fall for which no parallel is to be found in the history of public men. I have no desire to speak generally of the prohibition imposed upon the advent of black labour to this country. I merely say that that circumstance alone points to the right honorable gentleman in his speeches in London having played the hypocrite to a nicety before the British people. He may or may not have meant all that his utterances implied. It is much more charitable to suppose that he went to England and made his speeches with these provincial notions in his mind than that he made them in good faith, and upon his return suddenly fell from the lofty position which he had occupied. In this connexion it is worthy of note that quite recently the Government actually blocked the advent to the Commonwealth of three natives of a country which Australia very much desired should enter the Federation—I refer to New Zealand.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Does the honorable and learned member say that we attempted to block those men?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I say that they were blocked.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the Prime Minister to withdraw that expression.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not accuse the honorable and learned member of untruth, but I say that the statement which he made, wherever he got it from, is an untrue one. I do not in any way accuse the honorable and learned member of untruth.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am quite sure that the Prime Minister will set the House a good example by withdrawing the expression.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If you, sir, think that I ought to withdraw it in the face of what I have said I do so unreservedly. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, however, that the expression was not aimed at my honorable and learned friend, but at those who make such statements wherever they are to be found—probably abroad.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I quite reciprocate the Prime Minister's desire that we should not indulge in any personal altercation upon a question of this sort. I do not say that the right honorable gentleman blocked these men by physical force, but the administration of the Government certainly blocked them.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Has the honorable and learned member seen the papers bearing upon the subject?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I have seen the papers, and it is from them that I gained my information. I repeat that three natives of New Zealand are living in this country only upon condition that they remain here for a limited time to assist in a particular entertainment. Good God! to what a state of things have we come in Australia when, on the eve of entering into a great partnership with the British Empire for Imperial purposes, the natives of a country close to our shores, and with which we have sought a local partnership, are permitted to enter the Commonwealth only upon condition that they do not permanently remain here. In my early days I may have formed altogether too high ideals of public life and public men. I may have built up expectations in regard to State and Commonwealth politics that the big men of Australia would gradually come to the front, and that the leaders of the people would endeavour to conduct the affairs of this great country upon lines which reflected credit upon us as a State, and upon the Empire to which we belong. But can decadence, can personal declension, have a finer illustration than is afforded by the spectacle of the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth preaching this Empire ideal in England, and returning to Australia to carry out a policy of wretched, miserable parochialism that would be unworthy of the smallest South American republic? I admit that I have formed too high ideals, and that, after twenty years of political experience, I shall have to lower the standard which I had set up. When I see important questions treated in this way—when I see our fellow beings—members of our own nationality, treated in this fashion, how, I ask, can a man like Mr. Chamberlain, if he knew the facts, hope that we shall sacrifice our miserable local ambitions to fall in with his great Imperial scheme? So far, he has only visited a Crown colony, and he does not appreciate the character of the public men with whom we have to deal when he imagines that we are ready to cast aside our local affairs and rise to the level of the Imperial policy which he pictured in his recent speech. So much for the general administration of this country. I come now to the question of the Customs administration. Although I have had many years experience in different phases of commerce, I do not intend to enumerate all the cases of Customs persecution—I do not hesitate to describe them as such—which have taken place under the régime of the present Government. I have heard of many instances of hardship some of which are stronger than those which have been placed before the House. When the Customs Bill was under consideration I remember that I was one of the first to draw attention to the clause in it which reversed the old time-honoured provision that a British citizen was presumed to be innocent of any crime until he was proved guilty. I commented strongly and frequently upon that principle, and received satisfaction only when the House was assured by the Minister of Trade and Customs, in the most merciful language, that although this arbitrary law was being placed in his hands it would be exercised with discretion, and that justice would be tempered with mercy. What has been the result? The right honorable gentleman is reported in the British Australasian as stated by the honorable member Mr. Wentworth in the speech which he made last night—to have admitted his regret that the great bulk of the merchants of Australia are honorable men who give a credit to Australia and to the British Empire. Yet, although a similar provision was contained in the Victorian Tariff Act of 1866, when its Customs laws were changed, no one in the history of that State has ever heard of any series of persecutions which approached in hardship those which have occurred under the Commonwealth administration during the last twenty years. I do not object to any provision for the detection and punishment of dishonest men. I have no sympathy—and I know nothing about the work of the Customs department—with merchants who attempt to defraud the revenue. I do not object to offenders in cases in which blank invoices are brought to this country for fraudulent purposes being punished, not by fine, but by absolute imprisonment. What I do object against is the fact, which was commented upon with so much eloquence by the honorable member for Wentworth last evening, that hundreds of highly reputable merchants have been hauled before the police courts with drunkards and criminals, compelled to stand there—sometimes hours—until they could be charged, and fined £5 for having committed a miserable error which the prosecution of the Government has admitted did not contain an element of fraud. What is the effect of such administration? Its effect is to put the rogue upon an equality with the honest man. Not merely is a member of this great and honorable class of the community treated as a rogue, but the honest man, who ought to be punished by imprisonment, is practically consoled by being reminded that hundreds of reputable merchants are upon an equality with him. In addition to the insult which has been offered to the mercantile classes of Australia, the Government have offered an incentive to crime in that they have made less heinous and objectionable. It is the circumstance that there has been introduced into the Customs administration of this country a man admittedly of very high ability in his own walk of life, and no knowledge of commercial practice. I ought to know to the contrary, the fact may be a very excellent advocate of the Government in his own State, but I say only that it was a mistake to introduce a gentleman of his calibre and training into the mercantile operations of Australia, and that he could not possibly have acquired any knowledge of value concerning mercantile practices. To me it is perfectly clear that a man who has had years of command and legal experience, that the right gentleman entered upon the work of the department in the full conviction that the mercantile classes of Australia were a party of principled individuals who were at no time to rob the poor man by evading the duty of duty upon their goods. No one has listened to his deliverances upon the Customs Bill and the Customs Tariff without feeling that he entertained the highest opinion of the duty that he was called upon to make provision against a class which was cunning to a degree, and that he was a dignified policeman or detective appointed by the Commonwealth to catch

MR. DONALD.—He was right.

MR. RUCE SMITH.—The honorable member for Southern Melbourne knows less of commercial affairs than does the little boy who is the Minister for Trade and Customs.

MR. DONALD.—But I know something of common honesty.

MR. RUCE SMITH.—If that is the question, which the right honorable gentleman has upon undertaking the administration of the Customs department—

MR. KINGSTON.—Is the honorable member referring to any particular case of mine?

MR. RUCE SMITH.—No. If I were to judge from the utterances of the Minister, I should not be able to catch my train of thought, as I intend doing, to-day. I have other occupations besides politics, and I am pleased that I have; I should be dependent upon the latter. What I say is that it is not the attitude in which to appear before the mercantile classes of this country. It has been the result of all this administration? Honorable members ought, in their earnestness, to ask themselves whether in the whole of the two years during which the right honorable gentleman has been at the head of the Customs administration of Australia one substantial case of fraud has ever been brought against any member of the mercantile community. I know that the Minister will mention the Queensland case, and, no doubt, that is a case for which he may take some credit. It was a very complicated case, and whether or not the offence was driven home to the head of the firm I am not prepared to say. But if we compare the administration during the last two years and a half with £32,000,000 of imports per annum, what have we as the result of this wild and savage administration? People have been prosecuted for a series of petty errors, so clearly errors that the Crown Prosecutor has over and over again had to admit in court that there was no charge of fraud. Yet, in these cases, it was asked that a fine of £5 should be imposed, and, without it being realized what it meant to the heads of great firms who have enjoyed an unblemished reputation for perhaps half a century—from a time when the Minister himself was in knickerbockers—these firms have been brought into police courts and subjected to this humiliation. The Minister may depend that the people of the Commonwealth will not forget his administration. There is no doubt that when the Government next appeal to the people for an endorsement of their administration, the effect will be felt—perhaps silently—but it will astonish Ministers as showing how what may appear to be little things lead to great results. I now pass to one other matter under the head of administration. We all remember that when the Customs Bill was under discussion, we understood that a distinction was to be made between sugar grown by black labour and sugar grown by white labour. It was perfectly clear to me—though there may have been some subtle language used—that the intention was that every ton of sugar should pay an excise duty of £3, but that where it was grown by English or white labour there should be a rebate of £2. We find, however, that thousands of tons of sugar which have not been grown by white labour but by black labour—the mere harvesting being done by white labour—have earned this rebate over and over again. Although I do not like the law, when a law is once made I like to see it honestly administered. But we find that in the case of hundreds of thousands of tons of sugar the rebate has been allowed, although, as I say, only the harvesting has been done by white labour?

MR. CONROY.—Does the honorable and learned member make the charge that the rebate has been allowed to people not entitled to it?

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—I say that the rebate has been allowed to people who are not entitled to it, and the matter has been commented on in the columns of the Times, from which I get my information. That is an act of administration which ought not to be tolerated. If we make a law, no matter how objectionable, it should be carried out; but I say that in this relation the law has not been carried out, because side by side with the drastic provisions on which I have commented, we had an undertaking from the Minister that this enactment would be used only in case of actual fraud.

MR. KINGSTON.—The honorable and learned member never had anything of the sort, and I defy him to point it out.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—I now pass to the Government programme contained in the speech of His Excellency. My first observation is that the speech, in its very opening, contains a remark of a very prominent character, which I say is unjust towards the free-traders of Australia. The paragraph of His Excellency's speech to which I refer begins thus—

It was found impossible, by reason of the exhaustive discussion of the Federal Tariff, to deal with any but the most urgent of the proposals then brought before you, and renewed demands must now be made on your industry and patriotism before the Commonwealth machinery can be deemed complete.

I ask any members on this or any side of the House to put fairly to themselves the question—What was the cause of nearly two-thirds of last session being occupied over the Tariff? We have had a boast in the interval, by the Prime Minister and by the Minister for Home Affairs, that the present Tariff is a fair compromise. But where does that lead us? Does it not lead to the conclusion that it took twelve months of protest and debate on the part of the Opposition in order to produce a fair compromise?

MR. MAUGER.—The Tariff, as introduced, was a fair compromise.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—I am not talking of what the honorable member for Melbourne Ports may think. I am talking of what the Prime Minister has said. I am further talking of what the Minister for Home Affairs has said, and the claim made by these right honorable gentlemen is that the present Tariff is a fair compromise. Why did it take twelve months of hard fighting on the part of the free-traders to produce a fair compromise? Was it not because of the notable breach of faith by the Prime Minister—a breach of faith which the members of the Opposition and the people of the country who support them protested against? Were these twelve months not occupied in trying to bring the Government to a recognition of the promise which was made at Maitland? It is true that we did not succeed, though we obtained recognition to a certain extent. It is certain, however, that the question will be raised at the next general election. The leader of the Opposition has given due notice to the people of the country that it will be raised. Are the Government not in a logical cul-de-sac when I put this question to them, protectionists as they may be—Why should it have taken twelve months to get this Tariff, except for the fact that it was, when introduced, not a fair compromise? It was only by twelve months' protest and debate that it was put in the condition now boasted of by the Prime Minister. There is another aspect of His Excellency's speech to which I would like to refer. It will be remembered that when the original programme of the Government was put forward, the people of Australia were told that there was to be an old-age pension scheme. I quite recognise that that was merely the political cheese for the trap—that it was merely the old practice of offering the bundle of political carrots in order to attract the unthinking portion of the population. But now that two years have passed away, the Government had dropped this particular bait, and the matter of old-age pensions is not mentioned. But the question was not dropped until it was pointed out to the members of the Government that such pensions were impossible, for the reason that it would be necessary to raise £2 in taxation for every 10s. required. We find the speech of His Excellency, which is the programme of the Government, full of padding. Half of the speech, at least, promises measures which even the least intelligent member of the Government must know to be a farce. There is an endeavour to catch the crowd, and persuade them that after all the Government is a liberal Government, because it promises 20 or 30 measures in the near future. We see here pursued the same old practice of—I am now talking of State politics, and of practices which I thought would be abandoned in the federal atmosphere—proposing everything it is possible to conceive, in the hope that some day the opponents of the Government may adopt the programme, and lay themselves open to the charge of stealing their proposals. No one who knows the Constitution, and who read the original programme of the Government with care, can have failed to see that every conceivable legislative measure was crammed into it, whether or not there was the means of carrying it out, in the hope that the Government might hereafter be able to accuse the Opposition of taking part of that programme. That is a very old trick in State politics—an old trick in the lower grade of politics—but it was adopted at the beginning by the Federal Government, and is repeated now. Who can say, for instance, that the Inter-State railway to Western Australia is likely to be carried out during the reign of this Government or of this Parliament?

Mr. CROUCH.—We should like to have it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—We should all like to go to heaven, but whether or not we shall all get there is another matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The leader of the Opposition said that he would carry the work out at once.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Who can say that the question of rings and trusts, which presents one of the greatest problems of the present day, will be taken into serious thought by the present Government during their term of office? Who can suppose for a moment that the enactment of the navigation laws—which are modestly put down in His Excellency's speech as a matter in regard to which the Government are not sanguine—will be seriously attempted by this Government? Who can suppose for a moment that banking laws for all Australia will receive serious consideration? Who can suppose that the Bonus Bill will this session be the subject of any serious effort on the part of the Government? I have a very low opinion of the faculty of the Government for estimating public feeling, but I do not think their faculty is low enough to induce them to try another and a third fall in regard to the Bonus Bill. Who can suppose for a moment that the question of preferential trade will be introduced by the Government? This reminds me of the extraordinarily paradoxical attitude of the Prime Minister. The right honorable gentleman took part in a discussion in Great Britain with the Premiers of the other dependencies on this subject of preferential trade, and he gave an assurance that he would make a proposal to his Parliament with a view to its adoption. Where is that proposal? A long cablegram was sent, no doubt at the expense of the Commonwealth, to Mr. Chamberlain, informing that gentleman how much the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth approved of this magnificent Imperial scheme of preferential trade.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable and learned member was not present when I denied that I had sent any telegram to Mr. Chamberlain, and when I said that the telegram was sent by a press agency after an interview with myself. The telegram was sent entirely at the cost of the press agency.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That only refers to the cost of the cablegram.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There was no telegram sent by me to Mr. Chamberlain. The honorable and learned member's remarks are full of misstatements.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Will the Prime Minister deny that the words contained in the telegram were from an interview with him, and that they involve his own personal opinion on the question?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Exactly; that is so.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Then the dilemma is just as important or just as fatal to the Prime Minister. What does it matter whether the £10 or £20 which this cablegram cost was paid by the press agency or by the Commonwealth, whether it was addressed to Mr. Chamberlain directly or to the British press, so that he might see it? I ask what sentiment or opinion it expresses on the part of the Prime Minister? And I couple it with the assurance to Mr. Chamberlain in England that he had the support of the Prime Minister. But now the right honorable gentleman has counted noses. He is aware of the reception which the proposal is likely to get in this Chamber, and he has therefore quietly left it alone. It is quite possible that his assurances when in London as to his intution to introduce the matter to the notice of the Commonwealth Parliament may have given Mr. Chamberlain some hope that he would meet with that reciprocity which we are told to-day he looks upon as indispensable to his scheme; but he has now learned through the press that in the speech of the Governor-General, which contains the Government policy, the matter is one which has been left to the sweet by-and-by. So we have the announcement made by this man, who now stands at the very apex of the British Government, that he cannot go on with the scheme unless he has the sympathy and reciprocity of the British colonies. But he has not got it. He finds that the Australian statesman who faithfully promised to recommend the scheme to his Parliament, and who inspired the telegram which went to the English people to show that he is in favour of it, has not the political courage to introduce it in this Chamber. We are coming to a pretty state of things in Australian politics, when the head and front of our political life goes to England like a great ambassador, and leads the people and statesmen there to believe that we are prepared to join in this great Imperial policy, to rise to this great Imperial height, and, when he comes back, is afraid to introduce the subject to Parliament. The measures which I have mentioned are mere padding, not in the sense that there is no merit in them, but because they have been crammed into the Government programme with no possibility of realization. Just as a miserable tradesman will dress his shop window with empty biscuit tins, or cigar boxes, to make a show to impress his customers, the Government, to impress the public, not to impress the members of this House, place a number of empty promises in their programme, merely to be able to point to the large stock of legislative measures of a practical character they say they are going to pass. In addition to those I have mentioned, we have the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company's agreement, legislation upon the banking laws, and legislation in regard to preferential trade and the conversion of State debts. Out of twenty proposals which are solemnly put forward as if they were really part of a practical scheme of legislation which the Ministry intend to introduce, ten are palpably impossible of realization this session. The Government, however, think that in this way they can mislead the people of the country. I like now to say a word or two in measures which I think are of a character. I take first that which, in my mind, is of the most importance. It is the mere choice of a capital site. It is important, but I consider it of the most found importance to the whole Commonwealth that its Parliament should be in any one of the State capitals. If I were meeting in Sydney, I would be as satisfied with the arrangement as I am to our meeting in Melbourne. As the representative of another State, I have seen the great disadvantage which is done to the interests of the Commonwealth by having its Parliament immediately under the criticism of the press. I have seen, too, the effect of the present arrangement upon the attention of honorable members. While the Statesman which I come is entitled to a representation of something like one-seventh of the members of that of Victoria, the actual attendance of honorable members last session gave a representation of something like one-tenth more than that of New South Wales. Is the capital kept in Melbourne? Is it because of the action of Victorian Statesmen that nothing has been done. But the Minister for Home Affairs and his colleagues know that within half-an-hour a Victorian supporter can be rung up by telephone and brought here to vote in a matter while it takes the representatives of the other States, such as Western Australia, who have to come thousands of miles to reach Melbourne, days and weeks to get here. It is a crying disgrace to the honorable member's department that the capital question has not been dealt with further.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Where is the necessity of building a capital to come from?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I deprive the States of statements which have been made in regard to expenditure of millions of money necessary to create a federal capital, because I believe that £50,000 will do all that will be required for the purpose; but I am averse to the idea of the Parliament of Australia being in one of the State capitals, where it is largely influenced by the local politics, where its members are placed in a position that one State gets a large and proportional representation than it should have, while another State is proportionally under-represented. What has occurred to years to justify the delay in the question? What has been done in that time to settle it? Two years ago the Government were given of a full and most able report of the sites in New South Wales which had been submitted for consideration. All that has happened since is that there have been two excursions to the sites, in which a limited number of members of both Houses took part. I said, Mr. MAUGER, that the visits of honorable members to the sites would be useless, and I gave an illustration to show why they would be useless. One cannot by a cursory view of any site judge of its fitness. Take the matter of the water supply. A party of members visited the sites on a very bad day, and the people of the district were so struck with the unfairness of the Government's judgment upon the suitability of the site that they have since protested the day upon which honorable members visited it was not a fair day by which to judge.

Now, if the weather, which we cannot live in, cannot be judged by a reading over one, two, or half-a-dozen days, how can an opinion worthy of being formed of the water supply of the district, or the character of the soil, which is a matter for chemical analysis, be formed by a cursory visit of a few members going there with every comfort and convenience? The arrangement was a failure from the beginning to end. Put that aside, and what has been done in the last two and a half years? A commission was appointed of gentlemen taken from the United States, whose president, Mr. O'Malley, a very capable architect, when seen from the point of view of the Government of his own State, and in comparison with Mr. Oliver, is not a fit person to be appointed by the Government of the Commonwealth to draw a conclusion on the matter. So far as the Government is concerned, absolutely nothing has been done for a period of two and a half years. No one can help drawing but one conclusion from this delay, and that is, that the policy of the Government is a protectionist policy. It is to their interest to set their feet on a move from undoubtedly the protectionist corner of Australia, and remain until they are forced out of it by a charge of dynamite. This policy, which affects the whole body of the Commonwealth, has been going on from week to week, from month to month, and from year to year, without any attempt on the part of the Government to settle it. Then the question of conciliation and arbitration is mentioned in the speech. As a free-trader, I do not want to be suspected of taking a bigoted, individualistic view of that question. Personally I expect no good from it ultimately; but it is a question which involves so many aspects that I have always been prepared to hear all that could be said on its behalf, to consider the opinions of all outside authorities upon it, and even to go the length of watching with great care its actual operation in countries like New Zealand and New South Wales. These reasons carry great weight with me, quite apart from the actual merits of the question looked at economically. The working classes of the United States and the British workmen will have none of it.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Because they do not like it. We are now ascertaining what certain large nations of workmen think of these questions, and it is a suggestive, if not a conclusive, fact that in a country which is essentially a commercial and industrial community, having a population of 80,000,000 people, the workmen will have none of it.

Mr. MAUGER.—They give their reasons for not accepting it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Within the last few months, a very valuable commission, composed of 23 trades unionists, was sent from England to the United States to ascertain how far and in what respects the conditions of the workmen of the United States differed from those of the workmen of Great Britain. In an edition of the Times issued a few weeks ago, there is a most interesting summary of the evidence taken, and of the report of the commission, under the heading "Relations between Employer and Employee—Boards of Conciliation." A Mr. Mosely was charged with the conduct of the commission.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—He paid its expenses.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes, and he is regarded by the Times as a most able and competent guide for the 23 trades unionists, who were selected as representatives of the more important industries of Great Britain. They were taken in November and December of last year on a tour of the United States, that they might have an opportunity to see for themselves something of American industrial methods, and of the relations between capital and labour in America. In a two-page summary of the result of that commission, published by the London Times, I do not find a word about compulsory arbitration. There are, however, some very significant remarks, which show that the United States workmen assume towards employers of labour an attitude entirely different from that taken by the working classes of Australia. One of the delegates says—

There was a time in our trades union movement when a jingo spirit was dominant. Saner methods now prevail.

I would commend that to the working men of this country. The 23 trade unionists who formed the commission must have had a distinct bias in favour of the working classes, but we find this very significant statement by Mr. Mosely—

In many trades a joint committee of employers and employes meet periodically to settle rates for piece-work by mutual consent, and if such an arrangement were adopted all round I am sure it would be found beneficial: and this is what is practically done in all American industries.

In wages disputes and the relations between employers and workmen's organizations they have much to learn from us. It would be helpful if a committee of the leading trades' union leaders were to come over and make a personal investigation into our trade union methods and their relationship with the employer sections. There was a time in our own trade union movements when the jingo spirit was dominant. Saner methods now prevail, and a strike over a wage question is the exception rather than the rule.

I do not make my observations upon this question without having great experience to guide me. I was one of the two originators in Victoria of the Employers' Union of Australia. I was president of the Employers' Union of Australia during the whole of the time I lived in Victoria. I was one of a body, composed of representatives of the Trades Hall of Melbourne and of the Employers' Union, who drafted a constitution for a voluntary board of conciliation between employers and workmen. I have sat in the Trades Hall, Melbourne, as president of the Employers' Union and as president of the Conciliation Board, and I have, together with the workmen of Melbourne, settled on the most amicable lines quarrel after quarrel between employers and employees. Without any legislation whatever, only the exhibition of a fair and liberal spirit between employer and employee have witnessed the amicable settlement of what promised to be some of the bitter industrial struggles in Victoria. In my experience I have gained a great knowledge of unionists and of employers which is not altogether useless to me. I am endeavouring to think out this question and with such experience, backed by years of economical reading, I assure you is the same thing that I have described to be done to-day if only the jingo spirit was not so dominant in this young country. It has disappeared from the United States and from Great Britain, and when it appears from this country, and then we must recognise that capital is, after all, in the same relation to the workman as the plough to the farmer—the instrument which he carries on his work—we must see that instead of treating capital as an antagonistic element which should be driven out of the country, it should be treated upon as a friend to be courted, invited to stay and try its hand in furthering the interests of the community. It is no days for compulsion in anything to appear. It must be taken as an essential part of the political economy that capital is as the shyest of game. It can be won not upon wings, but upon cable and wire. It may also be laid down with equal certainty that capital will never stay where it does not receive the best treatment. The best treatment is the most conciliatory and the fairest attitude towards it. If this is the fact why should the jingo spirit be displayed? Cannot our men see that in showing themselves as they are merely discouraging the growth of new capital, and encouraging the departure of old capital from the country, and so forcing themselves to return to primitive principles and elementary forms of production? The capitalist puts his money into a business admittedly in order that he may receive a reward for the use of it in the form of profit. The workmen of Australia say to the capitalist—"It is your capital which you put into this business, but we are not going to allow you to manage it. We are going to appoint a board—it does not matter whether it is called a Wage Board or Arbitration Court—to determine the wages which you shall pay to your

We know that you can go to other countries, such as the United States and Canada, and there find employment for your capital, but you happen to be in Australia and your draft for £1,000 is here. We therefore ask you to put that money into an industrial undertaking, and we shall manage it for you. We shall decide the rates of pay to be given to your workmen, the number of apprentices which you shall have, and the number of hours which your workmen shall be called upon to work. All these things will be decided by three men." Now, who are these men? Not great industrial masters who have had years of experience. In New South Wales one of them is a Judge of the Supreme Court—a lawyer—possibly, a man who has no more notion of practical commerce than has a clergyman. I am not referring to the sitting President of the Arbitration Court in New South Wales, because it so happens that that gentleman had some storekeeping experience before he went to the bar. I am speaking of what may happen.

Mr. FOWLER.—Is it a fact that the Arbitration Court manages the business? Is it not true that it simply decides questions of justice between the two parties?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I say that it determines the rates of wages to be paid, and the honorable member will admit that this must prove a very important factor in determining the prosperity of a business. The Arbitration Court also determines how many apprentices the employer shall be allowed to train for carrying on the industry, and also the number of hours for which the workmen shall be employed. In fact, it would be difficult to name a single feature in the conduct of a business which does not come within the province of the court. Let me give an instance. In the southern coal mining districts of New South Wales, only within the last six months, a mine manager found himself called upon to dismiss a certain number of hands. The question then arose whether he was the proper person to determine which of his hands were of least use to him, and which it was most desirable to retain. The question was brought before the Arbitration Court of New South Wales, which solemnly declared that the manager of the mine must, perforce, discharge the men last employed.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is the general custom.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What would become of our general commerce under such conditions? Who is to have the management of our businesses? I am pointing out what will be the effect upon the management of business when capital is supplied by an experienced individual, and when the management is taken out of his hands, and left to a body of men who may have no knowledge of business. I am giving instances of the comprehensive way in which the management of a concern is taken out of the hands of the owner of the capital, by the decision of the Arbitration Court, that, although an employer may consider that A and B are the least competent men in his employment, he must not discharge them, but must choose from others, because they were the last taken on.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Even though matters of life and death may be involved, as in the case referred to.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes. Although an employer may consider that certain men have been careless, and are not as competent as others to conduct their work with safety to their fellow employes, the court has said that the men who were last employed must be first discharged. Would any honorable member who is not steeped in bias say that that is not practically managing the whole business of the capitalist for him, whilst requiring him to supply the wherewithal to carry it on. I ask honorable members who are very much attracted by the compulsory arbitration scheme to first of all admit that capital cannot be controlled, that it can come or go at will. Unless we are going to pass a law laying an embargo upon all capital that comes into the country, the capitalist is free to take away his capital or leave it with us. We want it here. We cannot carry on our mines, or our shipping trade, or our manufactories without it. We can do nothing but scrape the earth with our fingers unless we have capital, because even a spade or a plough represents capital. With a full experience of trades unions and their methods, and of employers generally, I assert most positively that it is suicidal for the working classes of any country to take up an attitude of antagonism towards capital, it is calculated to cause those who have money to invest it in other parts of the world where they are treated more fairly and more in accordance with the traditions of British commerce.

Mr. FOWLER.—Should there not be a spirit of reciprocity between the two parties?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes, I think there should be. We cannot look to the experience in Great Britain or the United States without finding that where employers have accumulated great wealth, they have displayed the utmost magnanimity, and the same spirit will be evinced all over the world under similar conditions. The moment, however, that the working classes adopt a jingo attitude towards their employers, the breeches pockets of the latter are buttoned up, and they say—"You shall have your pound of flesh, but no more." I have watched the progress of industrial movements very carefully, and I can see the jingo spirit everywhere in Australia. We saw it displayed during the last great strike in Victoria. The jingo spirit will never generate in the employer those kindly feelings which lead to the expenditure of money in providing for the comfort and happiness of employes. When, however, that spirit disappears from Australia, as it has done from England and the United States, and we have a voluntary system of conciliation, such as has been adopted elsewhere, there will be a sort of millennium in industrial matters. It seems to me a very feasible and practicable millennium, in which the employer and employe will shake hands, as I have seen them do in the Melbourne Trades Hall, and become the best of friends. But I have also observed—and this is part of Victorian history—that as soon as the president or secretary of a union abandoned their jingoistic attitude, and adopted a more moderate tone towards their employers than did their predecessors, they ceased to satisfy the younger jingo spirits of the next generation, and their places were filled by some much more intractable individuals. Thus this feeling of antagonism was perpetuated.

Mr. MAUGER.—Surely that cannot be the case when the officers of the unions change every twelve months.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—During the term that I have mentioned the most harmonious relations existed, and even the Melbourne Age declared that I had been the greatest menace to the working classes of this country. But so far did I engender a feeling of good-will in this State that upon leaving it I carried with me one of the most complimentary letters from the president and secretary of the Trades Hall that a man could carry—a letter stating that I had brought about a better feeling between the two classes than had ever existed before. Although Arbitration Acts are in existence in New Zealand, New South Wales, and Western Australia, honorable members are aware that quite recently, at a large meeting of trades unionists held in the first-named State, the Act was denounced as the greatest legislative curse which they had ever known. Those very words appear in the report of the proceedings published by the daily newspapers; and so strong was the feeling of trades unionists in regard to several decisions, that Mr. Seddon informed them that unless they exercised greater care they would break up the whole institution. We have the further testimony that quite recently in Western Australia the Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution, the effect of which was that as its members were compelled to tolerate an arbitration board for a certain period, and to pay the artificially high wages which it produced, they did not see why the whole of the Commonwealth should not submit to the same ordeal.

Mr. FOWLER.—That was the Chamber of Manufactures.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Its members wished the system to be extended to other States, not because of its beneficence, but because they had to tolerate its effects in artificially raising wages. If the result of such legislation in Western Australia is to artificially raise wages, thereby placing the employers of that State in an unfair position, what would be the effect of similar legislation upon Australia in its relations with the outside world?

Mr. FOWLER.—There are distinct signs of progress in Western Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—But it is still problematical whether that State will retain the capital which has hitherto been invested there. When we remember that this question is undoubtedly in its experimental stage, we ought to pause. I find that the New Zealand correspondent of The Times, in a letter which is referred to in a leading article, says—

Meantime it is patent to any impartial observer that there is a considerable amount of dissatisfaction with the working of the Arbitration Act, and once more the question may be asked—"If these things are done in the green tree, what may be expected in the dry?"

h I am not prepared to commit myself any definite statement as to the effect of this measure, the fact would practically compel the in- who provides the capital for any to submit the management of his to a board, whose members have no y with him, induces the conclusion he proposed legislation be enacted will cease to flow into the country ay that it has done, and much that y here will depart. I heard of a ident the other day in regard to which is worth repeating, especially a vouch for its truth. A repre- e of the company which manu- such splendid woollen goods in ealand visited this State soon Tariff was passed. He had autho- look around Victoria, and ascer- it were possible to embark 0 in a similar industry here. Whilst attention was directed to the exist- vages boards, which are equivalent bitation Court of New Zealand. A t after commencing his inquiries, in a question put by a friend, he used polite language—"Not one damned will be sunk in the industry in this

LAUGER.—Yet he has to submit to cration Court in New Zealand.

BRUCE SMITH.—That is so ; but the £100,000 will be invested in ealand I do not know. I repeat honorable members ought to pause attempting to extend this system to e of Australia. I know that the a is to make it applicable only to al disputes extending beyond the any one State ; but I hold that we well defer the consideration of it ascertain whether the operation of measures in New Zealand, New Wales, and Western Australia can rded as a success. Passing from ection, I come to that of the ate Commission Bill. Most honor- members must be surprised to at, notwithstanding all the pro- de by the Government regarding iency of the Bill submitted to Par- last session, they have tardily ad- hat it was wrongly conceived in that ions were made applicable to ocean- amers. They now confess that it was attempt a sort of inquisition into the financial arrangements of the different com- panies whose steamers ply between other coun- tries and Australia. The objectionable pro- visions referred to have now been eliminated from the Bill. In this connexion I feel some- what complimented that a little production of my own, which was republished by the Shipping Federation of Australia, pointed out the enormity of those proposals. The idea that, in order to guarantee the equitable adjustment of freights between the different States, we should have arrogated to ourselves the right to control such great companies as the Messageries Maritimes, the P. and O., and Orient, and to pry into the whole of their financial conditions, was a preposterous one. Those provisions have now been abolished, and the measure, I apprehend, will come forward in a somewhat similar form to that adopted in the United States. No one can question the wisdom of seeing that no means of carriage between one State and another is allowed to exist which would have the effect of neutralizing that absolute free- trade which we wish to establish. If the Bill, when it is submitted, is true to the principles which I have indicated, instead of opposing it, I shall do my best to assist the Government in passing it into law. At this stage I do not wish to deal with the question of preferential trade. I have com- mented upon the fact that the Prime Minis- ter had promised to submit some proposals to us in this connexion. I think that they ought to have been submitted. The Ministry, however, having resolved to keep them back, I should have been very glad indeed to have heard a speech upon the subject from the Prime Minister. My opinion is that by adopting preferential trade rela- tions with the mother country, instead of binding ourselves to it by means of stronger cords, we should have made use of a mechanical contrivance which would have been irksome. The ties which bind us to the mother country are those of blood, affection, and common interests, and these considerations are more elastic than would be any written agreement at which we could arrive. Mr. Chamberlain's attempt to introduce this system, however wise it may be upon high Imperial grounds, was quite premature as regards these States. We must remember that, so far, the Secretary of State has visited only what are practically Crown colonies, namely, the South African States. He has not had any experience of States like our own, where we have fiscal arrangements peculiar to ourselves, and which are not alterable at a moment's notice. I suppose that he was not aware that under our Constitution we were bound during the next seven and a-half years to carry on all the work of the Commonwealth Government and to provide the States with sufficient revenue for the maintenance of many of their institutions through the Customs department. Had he realized that twelve months or more were occupied in enabling members of this Parliament to agree to a so-called fair fiscal compromise, he would have understood the practical impossibility of the people of the Commonwealth re-opening the Tariff question at a moment's notice with the idea of settling it in two different columns—one for the British people, and one for foreign countries. I hold that the electors of Australia are too busy to rise to these great Imperial considerations at the present day. The change must come in a settled community, where there is a large majority of people of leisure. Then local affairs can for a moment be put aside, and great Imperial aspirations can be looked into and considered. To suppose that we can shut our eyes to the necessities that arise out of the Braddon clause; that we can sit down at a moment's notice and settle our Tariff in a double column to suit the British Empire on the one hand and foreign countries on the other; to assume that we expect Great Britain to change her fiscal policy and tax the whole of her foods to realize this aspiration, is ridiculous. I formed the opinion days and weeks ago, and I hold that opinion to-day, that the primary purpose of this proposal was that Mr. Chamberlain might offer a menace to the people of countries like Germany, who are trifling with the British people in regard to their Tariffs, and, secondly, that there should be a political move in anticipation of the next general election. When we see the landed classes of England offered a sop in the shape of protective duties on foods, which means an enhanced value to their lands, and the working classes offered an unconditional old-age pensions scheme, we can readily believe that Mr. Chamberlain considers he has laid the bait for the two great extremes of British society, and that he deems them sufficient to secure the success of the present Government at the next general election, which we may depend would have come much sooner if the bait had been taken, and if the people had responded to the call made on them. The scheme of Mr. Chamberlain is impracticable, and the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth and his Government think so. I am willing to indorse that view of the Government, but at the same time I think it is a great pity for Australia that the Prime Minister should have inspired a cablegram which seems to confirm the assurance he previously gave to Mr. Chamberlain that the people were with him, and that a sympathetic response might be relied on if the proposal were adopted by other parts of the British Empire. I have already said that the reference to the Inter-State railway to Western Australia is a part of the padding in the speech of His Excellency, and most honorable members will admit that I am right. I have seen the report of the gentlemen who visited Western Australia in connexion with this proposed railway, and I have spoken to some of them; but taking the report itself, what does it amount to? Months ago, when discussing the question, I said that such a railway would cost £6,000,000; and the report shows that, although the gentlemen to whom I have referred have never been on the line of railway except as approaching it from the great Australian Bight, and although they know nothing of the later capabilities of the route—they do not know to-day whether water will be found on any part of the line of railway—they, without that knowledge, and after making what is necessarily a wild estimate of the possible trade across this great continent, estimate the cost at about £5,500,000. We all know what estimates are when they are made in the dark, and this estimate is confessedly made in the dark. On the face of it this is an interim report made on the most meagre and insufficient data. There has been no survey, but if the Government are sufficiently impressed with the preliminary report of the commission to justify a further report, and if the further report is satisfactory, there may be entered on a survey which I am told, on good authority, will take years to make.

Mr. FOWLER.—No.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Such a survey would certainly take two or three years.

Mr. FOWLER.—A couple of years.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That depends on how many men are engaged on the survey.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The Minister for Defence is a man for whom I have the most profound respect, but I am afraid he has what Emerson calls “an inflammation on his mind,” and it is this Inter-State railway. We all remember the drastic way in which the Minister for Defence threatened to break up the Government and the Commonwealth if this railway were not constructed. That of course was done in the spirit of Gilbert and Sullivan, because we know that such a line is an impossibility.

Mr. FOWLER.—Starting simultaneously from each end, the survey could be made in a year easily.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I admit that in the future this railway may be constructed ; but to speak of it as required for defence purposes is to advocate it on its weakest ground.

Mr. FOWLER.—Military authorities regard the line as necessary to defence.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—In order to construct a railway capable of carrying troops across, what I shall not call a desert for fear of offending the Minister for Defence—

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Call it waterless country.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—In order to construct a railway across waterless country for a distance of something like 2,000 miles—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No ; no.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am taking the whole distance from Fremantle to Adelaide, and I say that to use the defence argument in favour of its immediate construction is to put the question on its weakest and most laughable ground. There is no doubt that in the future a railway to Western Australia, like a railway connecting Adelaide with the Northern Territory, or a line from Bourke across to the north-western corner of Australia, may be constructed. But it is of no use for the Government to play with the Western Australian people by pretending that this Inter-State railway is really within the domain of practical politics.

Mr. FOWLER.—The right honorable member for East Sydney says that the line is within the domain of practical politics.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—In my opinion, the right honorable member for East Sydney is no authority on such a question. The right honorable member, when he expressed the opinion, was a guest of the Western Australian people, and we all know that it is one of the conventions to say pleasant things to one's hostess or host, even if we stretch the truth a little.

Mr. FOWLER.—Western Australia will not forget the expression of opinion.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am sure that none of the honorable members for Western Australia regard the promise of the Government as a serious one. However glibly, with their tongues in their cheeks, they talk to their constituents about the time when the great west shall become connected with the great east, they know in their hearts that such an undertaking is for future years. It is for that reason, I say, that the reference to the Inter-State railway is a piece of padding in the speech of His Excellency the Governor General. I do not want to go on at much greater length, but I should like to say a word about the mail contract. We are told that great companies like the P. and O. and the Orient companies are to be compelled, if they are to retain their present subsidies, to change their black labour to white labour. I can quite understand, although I cannot altogether sympathize with the desire to keep Australia pure. That is an aspiration as to which I may keep my tongue in my cheek ; but for electioneering purposes it is a very fine cry. We have now measures designed to preserve a white Australia, and I hope we shall be all the better for our racial purity ; but it is proposed to take a step further in a direction which no man can call practical. It is ridiculous for us to say—“We are not content to keep Australia free—not only from alien races, but from our fellow subjects in other parts of the Empire—we must also insist on our shores not being contaminated by a steamer with black men aboard.” Is that not a most degrading sop to the wildest socialism of Australia ? Why do we not say that we will not use anything touched by black hands ? Why not, just as Mahomedans do in regard to Christians, refuse to touch a plate from which an alien has eaten ? Why not go to these wild extremes ? These great steamship lines do not depend on Australia for their great profits.

Mr. THOMAS.—Does Australia depend on them ?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—No ; but we must depend on somebody to run our mails, and it is a question whether this cry for racial purity is going to be carried to such an extent that we shall be compelled to pay £200,000 or £300,000, or perhaps only £100,000, more in order to prevent any steamer coming to our ports with black men in the fore-castle.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—This matter does not affect our racial purity.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The law was not passed on the ground of racial purity.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—On what ground was it passed?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—On the ground of getting British ships manned by British seamen.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Are British ships now manned by British men? If the honorable member for South Sydney will look up any recognised authority, he will find that a large proportion of the mercantile marine of England is manned by Germans, Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, and Scandinavians generally. That only shows that the British ship-owner has to run his ships on the most economical lines in competition with those of other countries. It means that the great national asset of England, her mercantile shipping, of which we are never tired of boasting, must, if the conditions are unfair, go to the wall, and the marines of other countries be allowed to dominate us.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—White labour on these vessels is advocated by some of the most influential newspapers in England.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That may be so, but I do not think much of the advocacy of newspapers; it is usually coloured by subscribers and the editors' motives.

Mr. KINGSTON.—And by advertisements.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—And by advertisements. The success of the merchant shipping of England depends on its being able to compete with other countries, and carry on its work with a moderate profit. We know that if instead of using foreign sailors, who seem to suit better and do the work for less wages, ship owners were compelled to take Englishmen at higher rates of pay, it would mean that on one side of the balance-sheet there would be a much larger debit than there is at present. That increased debit must mean that the ship-owners cannot compete with foreign ship-owners, and that the latter must finally dominate the shipping interests of the world. Do we want that? Is our desire to avoid contamination and to see ships manned wholly by white men so strong that we are prepared to pay £100,000 or £200,000 a year more to the mail steamers? Are we satisfied to see English shipping go to the wall in competition with the shipping of other countries? Are we satisfied to see the carrying trade in the hands of German and French steamers, which are subsidized to three or four times the extent of the P. and O. or Orient steamers?

Mr. FOWLER.—The German and French steamers are manned wholly by Germans and Frenchmen.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Very likely; but I am talking of the business aspect of the question. Let ships be manned by pure Germans, pure Frenchmen, or pure Japanese; but it must be remembered they come here in competition with British ships. We propose now not only not to subsidize British shipping companies, but to place an incubus on them, and render their position more difficult than before. I may, of course, be wrong in the views I take. I know I am out of touch upon many of the great problems of the day with ninety-nine hundredths of honorable members, but this I can bear with the utmost good nature. I know that in many cases I beat the wind in this Chamber, and I sometimes feel like a child crying in the wilderness; but I think I do sometimes strike a key-note which may send home an honorable member who will think that at least I mean what I say, and that there is, may be, some truth and genuineness in the suggestions I make.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I would like to say, in order to put the other side of the shield, that I shall have the utmost pleasure in supporting the High Court Bill. I do not know whether honorable members think that after the speeches of the kind I make, there is much chance of any return being made to me for my support. I think not; at any rate I do not want any return. I shall give my hearty support to the proposed increased contribution to the naval defences of the Empire. I cannot get over the great looming fact that Great Britain spreads her protecting wings over us, as she does over all parts of the Empire, and that she spends annually about £32,000,000 on her navy. Great Britain has a population of about 40,000,000, and the annual expenditure upon the British navy is about £34,500,000. If we take the white population of the Empire outside Great Britain at about 13,000,000, it will be seen that it is, roughly speaking, one-third of the population of Great Britain itself. Now, if we recognise that the Imperial navy, whatever may be the purposes of England, has the effect of guaranteeing the safety of our shipping, as well as that of England, to us and to every other part of the Empire, and of enabling us to live in quietness, without the fear of invasion by any one of the many peoples whom we by our legislation so openly insult, we must admit that our contribution should approach in some way a fair proportion according to population. But hitherto we have contributed only £120,000 a year, and it is now proposed that we shall contribute £200,000 a year, which is, roughly speaking, only one-fifteenth of what our contribution should be according to population.

MR. CONROY.—But we have no voice in determining questions of peace or war.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—If it is contended that there should be no contribution without representation, or that the contribution must be in proportion to representation, I ask what would be our proportion of representation according to contribution? On our present contribution we should have only one representative in the House of Commons. But the views expressed by the representatives of Australia at the great Imperial consultations which are held from time to time, and at which both the head of the Government and the leader of the Opposition have within the last few years been present, exercise a far greater influence in the councils of the Empire than would be exercised by our proportional representation in the House of Commons. Why, then, should we quibble upon the question of representation? If we contributed in proportion to population, we might ask for an Imperial Parliament in which Australia should be represented; but if we were so represented we should be absolutely bound by the decisions of that body. Now, however, we are in the happy position of being able to offer advice and counsel to the Ministers of the Empire without responsibility. We have only recently had an instance of such action. The head of the Government promised the Secretary of State for the Colonies that he would submit his preferential scheme of duties to this Parliament, but he has not done so, and who can make him do so? But if an Imperial Parliament in which Australia was represented had taken the matter in hand, its decision would have to be complied with, and who can picture the friction which would have occurred here when it was found that we were bound at its dictation to consider the matter of preferential trade. The natural sympathy between Australia and the mother country will be a sufficient bond between them for many years to come. We are not concerned with the desire of a great statesman to consummate his magnificent career by some large scheme if it does not coincide with our interests. I join heartily with the Government in their desire to increase the naval subsidy, and I hope that the time will not be long before we shall offer, according to our means, a much larger sum than we are offering now. Who can doubt that the people of Australia, taking into consideration the condition of the daily lives of our population, are better able to contribute to a fund of this sort, man for man, than are the people of England, with their carping poverty and distress? That being so, are we not wanting in that great Imperial spirit of which we so often boast, when we fail to come forward and say—"We will contribute our proportion to this great fund from which we derive so much comfort in the protection of our personal interests?" I shall be very happy to support also any Defence Bill which is founded upon the recommendation of the most skilled men the Government can find, and to vote for the establishment of a High Commissioner in London. I favour, too, the adoption of uniform patent laws. We are apt to under-estimate the importance of uniform patent laws to the whole of Australia; but the difficulties which, personally and professionally, I have known men to suffer in connexion with the registration of patents in Australia show me that much disheartenment and disappointment occur under the present system. A very simple Bill, to which no opposition could be urged, might be passed, and its effect should be to encourage the inventive genius of the people of Australia, and to give us a better chance of industrial success in the future. With these comments I conclude my remarks. Speaking generally, I shall be very glad, apart from the criticism I have offered, to give the Government every assistance—"When I am here," the Minister for Trade and Customs will say. He has the magnanimity never to fail to remind my constituents that I do not attend the meetings of the House as often as he does, but when, like him, I am offered a salary of £2,500 a year, I shall be willing to put aside my own private business, and devote myself as entirely to Commonwealth affairs as he does.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia—Minister for Trade and Customs.)—With regard to the concluding sentence of the honorable and learned member for Parkes, I should like to say that I have never, when on the platform, made any references to his absence from this House, though in an exchange of courtesies now and again in this chamber I have called attention to the fact that he is not here so often as we should like to see him. I do not think that he need take exception to that statement.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Of course the right honorable member regrets the fact.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do. When he rose he indulged in remarks of a character which induced me to think that they called for some retort, but his subsequent observations were much more pleasant, so that I do not now think it necessary to reply to him in kind. The criticisms in which he indulged at the expense of the Government were of a very general character. His remarks ranged from the actions of the Imperial Government, and of one of the most distinguished statesmen of modern times—the Secretary of State for the Colonies—to those of our humble selves, and perhaps we should be pleased to be grouped with the Imperial Government, even in depreciatory criticism. In my opinion we have reason to be proud that a statesman of the calibre of Mr. Chamberlain has addressed himself to the question of preferential trade between the various parts of the Empire. The criticisms of gentlemen who have accepted the theory that in trade nothing but cheapness is to be valued, and who decline to give the slightest consideration to questions of Empire and kinship, are not likely to induce Australians to come to a wrong conclusion as to the value of the action which is evidently now contemplated by the British Government. Sentiment, they say, rules the world, and sentiment, practically expressed, appeals to all; but sentiment which finds no expression in action is worthless. What is the value of the talk about Imperial sentiment and of the ties which constitute the Empire in which we all believe in our hearts, if we are to know no citizenship so far as trade is concerned, and to recognize no distinction between those whose hands may be, and have been, raised in our defence in times of distress and difficulty, and those who at the earliest opportunity would drag the national honour in the mud, and destroy our traditions and reputation? May the time speedily come in which, as regards trade affairs, we shall be found willing to make some little sacrifice for those who rightly claim to be our kith and kin, who subscribe to the same conditions of commerce and labour as we do, and with whom practical expressions of friendship should exist. It is a source of great disappointment to many that hitherto no preference has been shown by Great Britain to her colonies, or by her colonies to Great Britain; but may the time speedily come when some arrangement in that direction may be made which will be satisfactory to both the contracting parties. I do not forget our difficulties in the way of revenue, but it is patent that we might give the United Kingdom preference over foreign countries without any inexpedient loss of revenue by keeping our duties as they are, so far as England is concerned, and raising them against others whom we have no reason to similarly favour. What is the value of our patriotism and imperialism if we do not differentiate between our brothers and the citizens of the mother country, and those who would willingly bring about our downfall at the earliest opportunity? Those who brag about the connexion with the Empire, and refuse to give her people the slightest consideration, are undoubtedly open to blame. Consideration of the present position is being forced upon Britain by the action of Canada, and I venture to think that British statesmen will rise to the occasion. What is the position? Canada gave a preference to Great Britain without receiving anything in exchange.

Mr. CONROY.—She had the benefit of open ports.

Mr. KINGSTON. — She received nothing in a protectionist or reciprocally preferential commercial sense. What was the further result? The benefits which Canada had previously enjoyed in relation to foreign trade, and which Great Britain had also enjoyed and continued to enjoy, were taken from her by German retaliation. Thus Canada's preference for her own mother country resulted in her being deprived of privileges which she had formerly enjoyed, and being subjected to disadvantages to which she had not previously been called upon to submit. Under such circumstances, British sentiment in relation to her colonies has found practical expression in the words of the Prime Minister of England and Mr. Chamberlain. We find moreover that Germany has practically retired from her position, and that Canada is not likely after all to be seriously penalized for the magnanimous attitude she assumed towards the mother land. The time has come of which we have every reason to be proud. We have also reason to regard with pride that statesman who has taken such a prominent part in this movement. The honorable member for Parramatta referred to Mr. Chamberlain as having resorted to a political dodge. The honorable member may know all about dodges, but he does not know very much about Mr. Chamberlain. I hope that there will be no uncertain sound in this connexion, and that it will be made known, despite the outcry of free-trade faddists, that Australia appreciates what is proposed by Great Britain, and that she will welcome the day when the details can be worked out, and some satisfactory arrangement arrived at. At present the Government are subject to adverse criticism, because they have not proposed this, that, and the other; but our present duty is to wait. The British Government intend to appeal to the country, and I venture to think that our duty is to wait, and to wish, and to hope, and to hold ourselves in readiness to support the mother country in every possible way. We should make it known at the earliest possible moment that Australia will be only too glad to take advantage of the opportunity which Britain proposes to give us. The Empire which does not recognise, in matters of this kind anything in the shape of citizenship, but treats the enemy of to-morrow in the same way as its friends and citizens of to-day, which does not concede the right of mutual consideration between citizens and mother country, which does not mark the distinction between foreigners and those who belong to it, cannot stand. Therefore, let us hope that such conditions of instability as do exist may be replaced at an early date by a better state of affairs, in which the national sentiment shall find practical expression by assent to proposals which it is evident the British Government propose to make at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. WILKS.—The British Cabinet is divided on the subject.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Really, after the statements which have been made by the two gentlemen who are at the head of the British Cabinet, it would appear that the honorable member has spoken without reflection. When a declaration has been made on the floor of the House of Commons by Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain, telling the whole world that the Cabinet are in agreement, what is the use of the feeble pipe of the honorable member for Dalley?—for whom, personally, of course I have the greatest respect.

Mr. WILKS.—The ballot-box will not speak with any feeble pipe.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! I must direct the attention of the honorable member for Dalley to his frequent disregard of the standing orders relating to interjections. I must ask him to discontinue these interruptions.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The British Government have acted in view of the elections, and have unfolded a programme of which their announcement relating to preferential trade will form a leading feature. Knowing what we do of the astuteness and statesmanship of the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain, it may be taken for granted that he feels that the Government programme is one which will appeal to the great heart of the British people. I venture to think that that programme will be appreciated, as it ought to be, here in Australia, and in the other colonies of the Empire, which have too long mourned the absence of some such proposal as that now put forward. I had intended to allow myself to say a few words at the expense of the honorable and learned member for Parkes, but in his absence I scarcely care to do so. I might, perhaps, say that it is a pity that the remarks of the honorable and learned member should be characterized by what is apparently—of course I may be mistaken—insufferable egotism. The honorable and learned member has associated the word “hypocrite” with the Prime Minister. Who believes for an instant that hypocrisy is a characteristic of my right honorable friend? Then the honorable and learned member talks about “swollen” utterances. I do not know what is the worst thing that one could behold in the way of “swelling visibly.” I believe that there would be a close contest between a pouter pigeon and a poisoned pup; but these two representatives of the animal kingdom would hide their diminished heads in a competition with the honorable and learned member for Parkes when he rises to let himself loose. "Hypocrisy!" "Swollen!" Do honorable members think that these are proper words to use in that connexion?

Mr. WILKS.—They are quite as fitting as the right honorable gentleman's reference to a poisoned pup.

Mr. KINGSTON.—On a dog matter, no doubt, the honorable member may be an able judge. The arguments of the honorable and learned member for Parkes were most inconsistent. First he found fault with the Prime Minister for administering the law, and afterwards rated him from a different point of view altogether for not administering it. The arguments of the honorable and learned member were mutually destructive. I contend that if a law is proposed in this House, those who are opposed to it should get up and fight against it. Do not let one honorable member say—"I was asleep," or another say—"I was not here." It is the duty of all honorable members to be awake. It is their duty to be here. And if, as the result of their somnolence or absence, legislation is passed with which they cannot agree, or which, from their point of view, is injurious to the Commonwealth, they are all the more to blame. It does not become them to attend here at rare intervals, and then rate their fellow members who have been applying themselves to their work and who agree with the law. The honorable member for Parkes said that the law provided that immigrants were not allowed to come in here under contract unless the Prime Minister had ascertained that they were required. That is the law. Anybody who finds an expression of the popular will embodied in a Bill, and who disagrees with it, should strike at it immediately. If, however, the measure becomes an Act, no Minister can hold his seat and refuse to execute it without being a traitor to his country and the law. That law was intended to be executed.

Mr. THOMSON.—It is not being carried out now.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It is. I venture to say that the law is being as thoroughly and faithfully executed as any Act ever was. Has the Government failed in its duty? We have the law for our direction, and it is interpreted by the honorable and learned member for Parkes as requiring the Prime Minister to do what he actually did. My right honorable colleague would have been a coward and a traitor if he had not done what he did. There was no dispute as to his duty. Are we to pass Acts simply to tickle the public ear, to offer the people something, and then snatch it from their grasp? I say "No." I am proud to serve under the Prime Minister, who is determined to keep the word of promise to the hope as well as to the ear. I desire to make some reference to the remarks which have fallen from honorable members as to certain Maoris having been prevented from entering the Commonwealth. The Prime Minister had nothing to do with the action that was taken in regard to them. He did not know anything about it until it was all over, because the stoppage which was suggested was of the purest technical character, and all those concerned were more than pleased with what was done. These Maoris were members of Fitzgerald's circus troupe. On their arrival at night they were refused admission by the Customs officer, but when the matter was referred to the Collector of Customs next morning an exemption certificate for three months was issued immediately. What more do honorable members want? The Customs officer executed the law, and the next morning an exemption was granted by the collector. A telegram which was received on the subject goes further, and states—"Fitzgerald Bros. express themselves as perfectly satisfied, but wish extension for twelve months." The extension was given immediately, and a further notification was conveyed to Messrs. Fitzgerald that if they wanted anything else in that connexion it would be done. There is no doubt about our sentiments in connexion with the admission of immigrants. Of course, Maoris are treated in a manner entirely different from aboriginals of Australia. We have specially exempted them, and very properly, from the prohibition which attaches to aboriginals in connexion with the franchise. As regards the fuss which has been made in this connexion, I say that it clearly reveals the fact that the Prime Minister did his duty; aye, and he is always prepared to do his duty.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—Under what authority is a temporary permit granted?

KINGSTON.—Under the authority of the Immigration Restriction Act. I avoid laughing when the honorable member for Parkes, who went to know all about history, betrays so like it, sneered at Mr. King, and asked—"What does he say that he has visited only Crown Colonies? Good gracious! What about New South Wales and Natal? Are they merely colonies?"

HON.—Their Constitutions are so that the honorable member was perfectly correct.

HON. MEMBERS.—No, no.

KINGSTON.—I think that the honorable member for Coolgardie will find my statement is incorrect, and that the colonies possess constitutional govern-

HON.—Their Constitutions were altered during the recent war.

KINGSTON.—Do they not possess self-government? When Mr. King was there, were they not so?

HON.—I do not know.

KINGSTON.—The honorable member knows, and ought to acknowledge it so. Open confession is good for the soul, and I believe that the withering stigma cast upon Natal and the colony by the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for Parkes that the Crown colonies, will be perceived by him with all possible despatch. In many times various hard things have been said about myself. I have listened to a number of them, and I tried to say a word or two in regard to criticisms. I confess that I was annoyed to find that, though the criticism used by some of my critics was to be severe, the reception given by the House showed unmistakably that honorable members were not disposed to say that I would wittingly treat one colony differently from another.

JOSEPH COOK.—Hear, hear.

KINGSTON.—I feel certain of that, and wonder, therefore, why one or two honorable members did not say a little less for me. The principal suggestion that has been made is founded upon a differentiation presented by the Colonial Sugar Company. The effect of that suggestion is that in the collection of excise upon sugar I have treated one company differently from another. All I can say is that I have never done anything of the sort.

Mr. THOMSON.—I made no insinuation that such treatment was intended. I stated that I did not know the facts.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am not complaining of the observations of the honorable member for North Sydney. I know perfectly well that he did not suggest an improper act, or that I had dealt with one company in a way different from that in which I had treated another.

Mr. CONROY.—Some people suggest that.

Mr. KINGSTON.—And it is not worth while taking any notice of some of these people. The allegations contained in the petition from the Colonial Sugar Company is—

That whilst stocks of purchased sugar held by the company in their free stores were seized and levied on, no excise or other duty was levied on stocks in other factories, expressly referred to as coming under the operation of the Excise Acts, nor were such stocks seized, though those in breweries were under Customs supervision, and were subsequently used in the production of beer, under Customs authority.

That although the company's stock of refined sugar in their free store was seized and excise levied thereon, a larger quantity, the property of the Millaquin and Yengarie Sugar Company, and other white sugars, made and owned by Gibson and Howes, H. E. and A. Young, the Nerang Central Sugar Mills, and Wood Brothers and Boyd, all at the time in the stock, custody and possession of the said manufacturers respectively, were not seized, but were permitted to be delivered free of excise, such sugar amounting in all to over 9,000 tons, and liable therefore—if your petitioners' stocks were rightly seized—to duty in the amount of £27,000 was allowed by an officer of Customs to be sold and distributed in the State of Queensland without the payment of excise which was levied on the stocks of your petitioners, and without, so far as your petitioners can ascertain, any inquiry by the Customs department as to the quantity of sugar thus held, or the places in which such sugar was stored.

I am sure that honorable members will not come to the conclusion that the Millaquin Company, Messrs Gibson, Howes, and others, were allowed to clear their sugar free.

Mr. THOMSON.—Not clear it.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am satisfied that honorable members will not believe that any differentiation was made between the mills. If I were guilty of such conduct as that, I would not stand here. I would not face the House. I say, further, that if I thought any section of the House worthy of the name, believed that I could be guilty of such conduct I should be sorry indeed, and glad enough to justify myself at any time or place. This matter has been repeatedly explained. It was the subject of discussion time and again last year in the Senate.

Mr. THOMSON.—Who gave the explanation of it?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The Vice-President of the Executive Council. It was on the 8th of October, 1901, that we imposed the sugar excise. That was the date upon which the Tariff was introduced. Part of the 1901 season, therefore, which commenced in June or July, had expired. There was bound to be some sugar which had passed into consumption, and which it was impossible to pursue into the teacup, or even into the private store. What we decided to do was to seize all that was in the factories or in stores belonging to them.

Mr. THOMSON.—The law says in the "stock, custody, or possession."

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member will recollect that on the 8th of October, 1901, there was no law in existence. We did not enact legislation upon this subject till some months after. The Tariff Excise Bill was not drafted until some time early in 1902. Therefore, we had to consider what we should do. It was a moot question whether or not we should collect duty upon sugar which had been manufactured prior to the introduction of the Tariff. We therefore decided advisedly to seize all the sugar in the excise factories and refineries and in the mills belonging to them, and resolved, as regards the other, to await the authority of Parliament, which we hoped to receive in due course—

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Was that fair to the other companies?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes. We could not pursue sugar which had gone into consumption before the 8th of October. We could deal only with that which remained for consumption.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The Minister has given his whole case away.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member for Wentworth will allow me to finish my remarks before he comes to such a delightful conclusion upon the whole subject. I was informed that the Colonial Sugar Company complained of some action of mine in this connexion.

Mr. THOMSON.—On the 18th of October.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not think it was so early as that. What was done? The Comptroller-General, who heard of the matter in Sydney, telegraphed at once that no difference was to be made between the treatment accorded to the Colonial Sugar Company and that meted out to any other company. When it got to my ears—

Mr. CONROY.—Did not the Minister know of it before?

Mr. KINGSTON.—When the matter reached my ears I spoke to my officer in warm terms, which are not likely to be forgotten. I issued instructions that the same treatment was to be accorded to all, and that course has been adopted from beginning to end.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—It is questionable whether that instruction was carried out.

Mr. KINGSTON.—When the petition was forwarded in September last, Mr. Lockyer was Acting Comptroller-General, and he telegraphed—

Mr. THOMSON.—That was after several communications had been made upon the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would point out to honorable members that several attacks have been made on the Minister during the course of this debate, and, for example, no later than last evening, there was not a whisper heard when the honorable member for Wentworth was speaking. In common fairness I ask that the Minister shall be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I have searched high and low for all the communications that it is possible to obtain in this connexion. I have a number of them here, and I think I shall be able to show enough of them to satisfy honorable members generally. The sting of the petition is to be found in the allegation that certain men have been singled out for special treatment. Nothing of the sort. All have been treated alike. As I was saying, the Acting Comptroller-General wired—

Colonial Sugar Refining Company have petitioned Governor-General re excise on sugar charged on stocks of raw and refined sugar manufactured and purchased by company before date of introduction of Tariff, and held by company in Queensland in free stores, which were not subject to customs or excise control prior to introduction of Tariff. Petition sets out that while the company's stocks were charged excise, the stock-of sugar in breweries and other excise factories mentioned in the Excise Act were not charged excise. Petition further alleges that a large quantity of sugar, the property of Millaquin and Yengarie Company, and other white sugar owned by Gibson and Howes, H. E. and A. Young, the Nerang Central Mill, and Wood Bros. and Boyd, all the time in their stock, custody, and possession on the introduction of the Tariff, was not charged excise, but was delivered free. Petition states this sugar amounted to over nine thousand tons. Minister desires immediately full report as to these allegations, especially re that of discrimination between the mills, which he cannot believe has occurred.

The following reply was sent by Mr. Irving:—

Brisbane, 20th September, 1902.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your wire of the 16th instant re the petition of the Colonial Sugar Refining Company to the Governor-General, and the Minister's instructions for a full report upon the allegations, and especially that of discrimination between the mills.

1. "That while the company's stocks were charged excise, the stocks of sugar in breweries and other excise factories mentioned in the Excise Act were not charged excise."

In reply to the above I have to state that, on the receipt of a confidential wire dated 3rd October, 1901, from the Comptroller-General, viz., "Act as if excise duty will be collected on sugar from 9th instant, and see necessary arrangements for officers taking stock, &c., are made."

Officers were instructed accordingly on the 8th October, and the stocks of sugar were taken in all factory and refinery premises in the State on the morning of the 9th idem.

Do honorable members see what that means? Just fancy an officer discriminating, or an instruction being given to treat one mill differently from another! Show me the man who ever dreamt of such a thing and you show me a dishonest man. The communication continues—

The total quantity of sugar ascertained to be in the factories was 16,803 tons 17 cwt., distributed as follows:—

Colonial Sugar Refining Company, Brisbane.
	Tons.	Cwt.	Qr.
Raw Sugar	5,194	19	3
Refined Sugar	824	3	0
In process of refining	364	1	0
	6,283	3	3
Millaquin and Yengarie Sugar Company Limited, Bundaberg.
	Tons.	Cwt.	Qr.
Raw Sugar	7,713	18	1
Refined sugar		Nil
In process of refining	570	0	0
	8,283	18	1
Sugar in 58 factories	2,136	15	0
	16,803	17	0

That is a large quantity. The Millaquin and Yengarie Company had 8,283 tons, and it is difficult to see where there was any preference. We are further informed that the sugar in 58 factories amounted to 2,136 tons, and that the total collection, noting the holding, was on 16,803 tons. There was absolutely no discrimination whatever; indeed, if anything, the facts show that the Millaquin and Yengarie Company were harder hit than were those who called attention to the matter.

Mr. THOMSON.—That firm could not be hit harder if it had the quantity of sugar.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I mean the firm were hit harder in that duty had to be paid on nearly 8,000 tons, whilst the company who complained had to pay duty on only 5,000 tons.

Mr. THOMSON.—What about the 9,000 tons?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Probably this sugar was got out before the 8th of October; we know how smart merchants are, and we did not feel justified in seizing sugar which was not in the factory or its store. It is one thing to go to a mill store, and another thing to pursue sugar all over the country into merchants' private stores, or into private houses. We did what was right when we took that which we could get, and which bore on its face prima facie evidence of ownership by the manufacturer. We did not try to do what was unreasonable or impracticable, but we did what was our duty. If we find out that there was any dutiable sugar belonging to any mills at that time, we shall be only too pleased to collect the revenue without a moment's delay.

Mr. THOMSON.—May I point out that all that is asked for is an inquiry?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am now giving the results of an inquiry; at any rate this matter has been inquired into time and again. The question was fought out in the Senate, as the papers in my possession prove, in June, 1902, almost a year ago. The following question was asked in the Senate:—

1. Whether it is true, as alleged by the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, that no excise duty was levied on large quantities of sugar in stock, custody, or possession of, or belonging to, the manufacturers thereof, and stored in their premises at Bundaberg and Brisbane, on the 8th October last, while the sugar in the possession of the said company was made liable to the excise duty paid on the above date.

2. If so, what was the reason for such differential treatment.

The reply was—

There was no differential treatment. Customs control was taken of all sugar in the possession of manufacturer on their factory premises. It was not found practicable to do this as regards sugar which had left the factory, and which appeared to have gone into consumption except on Inter-State transfer.

Mr. THOMSON.—The sugar referred to had not got into consumption.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I know the honorable member for North Sydney is a reasonable man, and I know he will follow me when I say that there was a risk of losing our proposal for the duty on the stuff which had been passed into consumption before the 8th of October; and we were perfectly justified in doing what we did in regard to the sugar in stock. To follow the sugar into the merchants' stores is a step which I am sure the honorable member would not have cared to take unless fortified by legislative authority.

Mr. THOMSON.—Will the Minister allow me? We are not concerned with sugar which had gone into merchants' stores, but with sugar which was in the refiners' possession.

Mr. KINGSTON.—As to that, the Sugar Company admits that they had 50 tons of sugar which we did not touch, because it was not our policy to interfere with what had gone from the mills or their stores.

Mr. PAGE.—Why not make the petitioners give evidence?

Mr. KINGSTON.—If I can find there is any sugar which, under the larger powers given by the Act, we can take, and which has not been taken, it shall be taken. It is absurd to suggest that I exercised a preference for somebody of whom I had never heard: indeed, had I heard of him, it would only have made the matter worse. My desire, as every one knows, is to get the revenue due to the Commonwealth, and it seems so preposterous to haul me over the coals for acting upon that desire, that I might almost apologize for lingering longer on the subject. My policy is to get revenue anywhere I possibly and rightly can, and the man who can justly lay a charge against me of any laxity or want of vigilance must have found me in a mood altogether unusual. This matter has been discussed almost to nausea elsewhere, and I think I have a right to complain of the suggestions which undoubtedly have been conveyed to the House.

Mr. WILKS.—By whom?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I mean speculating in the presentation of the petition.

Mr. WILKS.—That is another matter.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not blame one, but I feel sure that no member would have sent a party to the presentation of the petition, if he knew that the matter had been taken out.

Mr. THOMSON.—What was the result of the threshing out?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I have the duty on sugar, and I should like to show the member for North Sydney with which this complaint has been connected. Any honorable member, I care on which side of the House, who sent an accusation of the character which has been made against my administration, would do well to remember that on the 15th of May last year an honorable member of another place asked why a particular company should be singled out for duty, every other company and importer being exempt. Is that allegation borne out by the facts and figures I have to-night laid before the honorable members? The Collector of Customs in Queensland was brought down to the House, in order that this matter might be fully explained. Senator Millen in his place said—

Duty was not collected on similar sugar which was held in Queensland by the Millar and Yengarie Company—which, I understand, is really the Queensland National Bank and A. Young, Gibson and Howes, and Bros. and Boyd. These people I understand had between them 8,000 tons, and while that duty was allowed to go free of excise duty, a quantity of 2,584 tons, held by the Colonial Sugar Company, was charged duty.

Further on, Senator Millen said—

In the absence of a specific denial of my statement, I venture to say that even Senator O'Connor will not attempt to defend an act of discrimination which shows such partiality or favoritism.

Senator O'CONNOR.—There was no duty on sugar in stores, but the sugar in all mills and refineries were levied on.

Senator MILLEN.—Of course a great deal depends on what is the definition of a store in this particular case, a duty was levied on sugar which were in a store, and not in a bond.

Senator O'CONNOR.—I draw no distinction between stores and factories. Sugar in stores connected with factories or refineries was to go free.

What more explanation is wanted than was given a year ago? Senator O'Connor said—

But at the same time the Sugar Company was not entitled to be placed in a different position from any other body, or corporation, or individual, and I propose to deal with the matter simply as if it were an individual who thought he had a right to some redress for some injury.

what he also said during the discussion of the Bill in the Senate :—

“I take it that under constitutional law on the 8th October was an excisable article, therefore, subject to this law, and according to the exact letter of the law, sugar, it was, and could have been followed, whether it was in private houses, or shops, or stores. That, in the first place, was necessary. It was also unworkable and unable to carry it out with any sort of fairness, therefore, had to be drawn for the benefit of the revenue.”

KINGSTON.—Yes; but that was the original provision on the 8th October. We had not then formulated what we were going to do; but we had an easily explainable and just seizure. To continue the quotation from Mr. Irving's letter from which I was

“All sugars were all placed under Customs on the morning of the 9th October, and delivered for home consumption, were subject to excise duty.”

“The sugar we seized, including the sugars belonging to the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, went into consumption and excise duty was paid.”

KINGSTON.—I do not think so. The proceeds—

“As regards to stocks of sugar in breweries on the 8th October, these were not to my intimation had been received to that no copy of the Excise Tariff Act was sent to me until 1st July, 1902, which was done by Melbourne by the Comptroller-General.”

“The opinion of the Attorney-General as to the true interpretation of the Excise Tariff Act as regards to the dutiability of sugar in the hands of a brewer, because I wanted to know the law to recover any amount for which I was liable. The Act imposes duties of excise on—

“Sugars, when sold, or delivered, or stored, or in custody, or possession of, or belonging to, by a brewer, distiller, manufacturer, or dealer.”

“The words ‘thereof’ were not in the Act. I take it that sugar in possession of a brewer would be dutiable, but it apparently refers to the whole group of excisable articles, so that the section seems to speak of beer in the possession of a brewer, tobacco in the possession of a manufacturer, spirits in the possession of a distillery and sugar in the possession of a factory or refinery. That is the way in which we have administered it. Mr. Irving goes on—

“In my wire to you of 24th July, 1902, it was stated that the breweries held 219 tons 10 cwt.”

“We would have levied the duty if we had been entitled to it. He continues—

“My letter of 28th August brings this under your notice in connexion with the Excise Tariff Act, and asks for instructions. There was no sugar in the distilleries on 8th October, molasses only being used by spirit-makers in this State.”

Mr. Irving then deals with the following statement :—

2. “That a large quantity of sugar, amounting to over 9,000 tons, the property of Millaquin and Yengarie Sugar Company, and other ‘white’ sugars owned by Gibson and Howes, A. H. and E. Young, the Nerang Central Mill, and Wood Bros. and Boyd, all the time in their stock, custody, and possession, on the introduction of the Tariff, was not charged excise, but was delivered free.”

In reply, he says—

“I have to state that all sugars found in the factories or factory premises of the persons referred to by the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, was taken possession of on the morning of 9th October, and found to be as follows :—

Millaquin	8,283 tons
Gibson and Howes	230 „
A. H. and E. Young	5 „
Nerang Central Mill	25 „
Wood Bros. and Boyd	15 „

“None of this sugar was delivered free of Excise duty; no discrimination was made between any sugar factories and refineries.”

“No one reading the petition, and particularly the references which contrast the attitude adopted towards the Colonial Sugar Refining Company, with the way in which these sixty other people were treated would believe for a moment that they were treated as this letter shows, all in the same way, and in the only reasonable way in which they could have been treated. No doubt a considerable quantity of sugar got into consumption before the 8th of October.”

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—What does the right honorable member mean by “consumption”?

Mr. KINGSTON.—It was sold, or got to places where it would not be worth while to follow it. It was not in any factory.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The right honorable member does not refer to sugar in a store!

Mr. KINGSTON.—I would not hesitate to charge duty upon sugar stored by a manufacturer. If the sugar crop in Queensland in that year was 120,000 tons—though I do not think it was so much—would it not have been only natural that at least 20,000 tons would have got into consumption by the 8th October. My officials have gone thoroughly into the matter, and we cannot find that more than 15,000 tons had got into consumption by that time, though we can account for pretty well the whole of the crop for that year. Mr. Irving continues—

With regard to the quantity of over 9,000 tons of sugar said to be in the possession of the persons named on the introduction of the Tariff, and delivered free of duty, a large quantity of sugar, estimated to be 16,000 tons (see my wire of 17th instant), had been removed from the factories, and was stored in merchants' premises and other places, not being factory premises, throughout the State; but the department has no knowledge to whom it belonged. This sugar was not taken possession of on the 9th October, and in connexion therewith I beg to refer you to the following wires between the Comptroller-General and myself:—

Of course, directly I heard the suggestion that there had been discrimination, I gave instructions that a full inquiry should be made. This is the first telegram, which was sent by the Comptroller-General from Sydney, on 28th October, 1901:—

Stated that some persons have large stocks of sugar which are escaping Excise whereas Colonial Sugar Company are charged. Is this so? There ought to be no distinction. Reply to Melbourne.

To that telegram Mr Irving sent the following reply:—

Re sugar stocks removed from mills prior to 9th instant, and stored warehouses, wharfs, &c., have not been treated as liable to Excise. See your wires of 9th and 10th instant. Colonial Sugar Company had large stocks in their refinery, which have been detained in common with stocks in other factories. See also my letter 22nd October, 1901, re Gibson's applications.

Mr. THOMSON.—It was not all actually in the refinery, but in the premises adjoining.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The Excise Act gives this very wide definition of a factory:—

"Factory" means the premises on which any person is licensed to manufacture excisable goods, and includes all adjoining premises used in connexion therewith or with the business of the manufacturer.

I think that that definition abundantly justifies all that we have done.

Mr. THOMSON.—Was not some sugar taken out of the refinery before the duty was imposed, and brought back afterwards?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am obliged to the honorable member for reminding me of that fact. It got out before the 8th October, 1901, but when I saw Mr. Gibson and Mr. Young during my Queensland trip, I was not aware that I had impounded their sugar. However, here is my ruling on the subject, in my own handwriting, which he who runs may read—

If, as I understand, this sugar was manufactured by Messrs. Young Bros. before the 8th October, 1901, and that on the 8th October, 1901, it still belonged to them, it is undoubtedly dutiable under paragraph (b) of section 5 of the Excise Act 1902. This applies to all sugar belonging to the manufacturer thereof on the 8th October, 1901, notwithstanding it may not be in his possession on that date or afterwards returned to his possession.

Mr. Young promptly paid the duty, and we are doing our best to find out any other sugar that was removed while it still belonged to the manufacturer.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is what is asked for.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am only too glad to do this, but I am afraid we shall not find very much.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Sugar Company and the Sydney Chamber of Commerce are willing to assist the Minister by giving evidence on oath at any inquiry he may hold.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I shall only be too glad if they will give us any information that may be in their power. It would be idle for us to appoint a Royal commission to hold an inquiry. If we have a willing horse we do not need to flog him, and those who are willing to give information can supply it by making a statutory declaration. Do honorable members suppose that I do not wish to catch those, if any, who are escaping the payment of duty? My desire is to make the Customs revenue look as well as I can, and I venture to apply to my right honorable colleague the Treasurer for a certificate on that point.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The right honorable gentleman has been so vigilant that he has quite upset my estimates.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes; because I brought in more revenue than was expected. I would ask honorable members to consider the attacks to which I have been subjected by some of my critics here. I am not complaining—

HOMSON.—The Minister can give a for an Oliver.

KINGSTON.—I am not going to about the honorable member for Sydney. I wish I was able to obtain other honorable members benefits to those which I derive from experience of the honorable member, know is always at my disposal. ous statements have been made g me as a Minister. I take some the position I occupy, and I desire to collect all the revenue that and I know neither friend nor foe in n with my office. I have made my ion, and I feel convinced that e members will consider that not the discredit attaches to me. I need , further, that it was not without iculty that we made up our minds proper way in which to treat this I conferred with some of my col- n the subject, and we came to the n that the plan that was adopted ls seizing sugar in factories which made before the Tariff was brought ration—when we knew where it to whom it belonged—was the one to adopt. We have the work upon now, and as soon as ssed, the Collector of Customs for nd was informed, and I believe has faithfully carried it out ever f, however, there is anything that to be collected it will be brought revenue as soon as possible. With the general criticism to which the administration has been subjected, take up my parable from some of s which were used by the honor- learned member for Parkes. He an understanding was arrived at ouse that no prosecutions should ed upon except in cases of fraud. as nothing of the sort, and there er any ground whatever for that n. The Bill was framed on an er different principle, because it ated between cases where there was d those in which there was no fraud. d a double penalty was provided, and required to expressly allege fraud r it was intended to suggest it. If charged fraud in the various cases ve been referred to, I should have uthy of the criticisms in which some e members have indulged, but in y cases, indeed, has fraud been charged. On the contrary, I have been ac- cused of having initiated prosecutions in cases where no fraud was suggested, and time and again the counsel for the depart- ment has announced in court that no fraud was charged. I arranged for this from a consideration of the first criticisms which were passed upon me, in which it was stated that unless the fact that no fraud was charged was mentioned in court, the public would not know whether there was fraud or not. Instructions were issued that the position was to be stated in court, although it was not necessary that such a course should be taken.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Does the Minister contend that the Act must be put into force in every case?

Mr. KINGSTON.—No, I do not.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Then I do not see the relevance of the right honorable gentleman's explanation.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not see the force of my honorable friend's interjection.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—What I say is that if the Minister could exercise discre- tionary power and refrain from taking action in the courts, why did he force people there in cases where no fraud was alleged?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Because in some cases hideous carelessness was indulged in.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—In one case out of many involving altogether the pay- ment of £25,000 to the revenue.

Mr. KINGSTON.—My honorable friend's memory is very much at fault. I desire to call his attention to the fact that I have been taunted with prosecuting in cases where there have been errors on either side and a balance in favour of the department. That charge was made against me in another place, and it was supported by the quoted testimony of the honorable member for Wentworth that this had happened to him. That statement has been repeated time and again, even to my own colleagues, and I assert that it has not an atom of fact to support it.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The Minister is not stating the case correctly. The Minister knows that although it was stated that the case was connected with my own firm, I said that it belonged to another, but the facts remain the same. It was a pure error when it was represented that the matter was connected with my firm in Sydney.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Senator Pulsford first referred to the Fuller Carrying Company, and as an additional make-weight, he quoted the case of the honorable member's firm, but the honorable member freely admits now that that was a mistake.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I did so, long ago.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes, after months of delay and repetition.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—No, at the very moment I found out.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member went away to England first.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—No; I admitted it before I went to England. The Minister is mistaken.

Mr. KINGSTON.—It was when the Minister for Defence came back from England. Senator Pulsford referred to the Fuller case, which was really the only case in which even a pretence could be made that there was a balance in favour of the Customs. Let me say further, that it was not proved that there was a balance of error in favour of the Customs.

Mr. THOMSON.—It was admitted.

Mr. KINGSTON.—No; it was not admitted. We could not go into the matter. The prosecution was instituted in respect to a short payment, and it was not until we got into court that anything in the shape of a set-off was urged. That matter could not be investigated, because the point should have been raised when the goods could be inspected. No claim could have been entertained for the refund of the money, and the suggestion of the error in favour of the Customs appeared to be a lawyer's device, resorted to at the last gasp. The issue as to the over payment was not tried, but was rejected by the court. The sworn testimony in the shape of the entry had been accepted, and there was a short payment, which we proved up to the hilt; but at the last moment the solicitor's ingenuity suggested an over-payment which would more than counterbalance the shortage. The court would not look into the matter, but fined the defendant in respect to the shortage.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the Minister look into the matter?

Mr. KINGSTON.—No. I could not do so, because certain goods are charged at a certain rate of duty, and when a point of this kind is raised, we want to see the goods and find out what they are.

Mr. THOMSON.—Not if it is a matter of error.

Mr. KINGSTON.—We accepted the entry, but for the sake of discrediting our own entry, the defendant proposed to prove the correctness of that to which he had referred. I say that that was the only case of it, and Senator Pulsford was entirely wrong in saying that, not only was there the case, but also that of McArthur and Co. The testimony of the honorable member for Wentworth, in a matter of this kind, would, no doubt, carry great weight. The tale as told by Senator Pulsford spread all over the place, and I was unable to trace it to its source until I reported of a debate which took place in Sydney, and noticed that an old friend of mine had been making some most extraordinary statements about men having been sued when the balance was on the side of the Customs. I wrote to him about these statements, and found that they were supported by an authoritative announcement by the honorable member for Wentworth. Hence the statement of Senator Pulsford regarding McArthur and Co., whereas the only case was that of the Fuller Carrying Company. I do not suggest that the honorable member for Wentworth would wilfully state what he did not believe in, but the circulation of such a report shows that the world is often father to the thought, and one often imagines wrongs that do not occur. I do not know that I have necessarily introduced personal remarks affecting politics into this discussion. Probably the honorable member for Wentworth will seize an early opportunity to mention that what is alleged did not refer to him, as the people of Sydney, from whom I have heard, undoubtedly believe to be the case.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I obtained evidence of certain cases. I do not interfere with my own business in this House.

Mr. THOMSON.—The case existed in the same way.

Mr. KINGSTON.—There were many cases but only one, and that was the case, which I have already disposed of. The suggestion that the Act was to be confined to cases of fraud was never made. On the contrary, express legislative provision was made for differentiating between the various classes of cases. I have pointed out, and again, that in very few instances proceedings instituted for fraud.

MCDONALD. — What about the Reid case?

THOMSON. — That firm was not with fraud.

KINGSTON. — I say that the firm was charged with fraud, and the jury found it guilty of the charge against it. I do not intend to make as to blame, and it is not my business to bother my head beyond the limits of my duty. In the discussion of these cases, I have not exhibited bitterness against any individual, I feel sure. I simply intend to faithfully discharge my duty. I received instructions that a man is not to be charged with fraud unless upon clear evidence, but that in such cases no pains are to be spared to punish the offender. I wish to discuss anything in the nature of personal matters, but I may be asked to ask what was the way in which it was met a year or two ago in the nature of this question when I brought the name of Robert Reid and Co.? It was attacked for instituting proceedings against this firm for the recovery of what was put? The idea that that firm would be guilty of any irregularity was as preposterous. I believe that it did upon that occasion was right, and the merchants of Tasmania spoke in a good cause, although at the time I suggested that I was little less than competent for upugning the action of the question.

THOMSON. — If that were a case of the Minister ought to have taken action.

KINGSTON. — There was not sufficient evidence to prove fraud in that case, in the light of subsequent evidence, how can I taunt against me lie in the mouths of those who criticised me? The firm has proved guilty of fraudulent practice. In such circumstances, how long shall I be charged with the cry—"It is a question of long standing and integrity; let it be." "

THOMSON. — That was never suggested.

FISHER. — Why, the Chamber of Commerce declared that it was a persecution.

MCNEIL. — There were a thousand reasons for not prosecuting in that case.

WILLIAM McMILLAN. — As the Minister probably occupy some considerable time in completing his speech, probably this is a convenient opportunity to adjourn the day.

Mr. KINGSTON. — I shall feel greatly obliged if that can be done.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The House will no doubt extend to the Minister the courtesy which was extended last week, under similar circumstances, to the leader of the Opposition.

[Mr. Speaker left the chair at 6.8 p.m.; sitting resumed at 7.30 p.m.]

Mr. KINGSTON. — The honorable member for North Sydney threw some little doubts on my suggestion as to the use which was attempted to be made of the name of the firm of Robert Reid and Co., when the Tasmanian case was under discussion.

Mr. FOWLER. — The doubts have all been dissipated.

Mr. KINGSTON. — As the honorable member for Perth points out, the old doubts at this particular moment have all been dissipated, but to prevent their return I should like to place on record the facts. When I spoke of the Tasmanian case I was by no means attempting to impugn the honour of any person or firm, but I did not hesitate to point out that I was justified in saying that the revenue was "got at." There was immediately an attempt made to scout the idea on account of the respectability of the firm, a respectability which to all outward intent I was content to admit. I referred to Robert Reid and Co. as a firm held in as high honour as any, but I was justifying their being tackled, when the necessities of the case appeared to require it, as I hope I shall always do, whatever firms, big or little, may be involved. Speaking on that occasion, I said—

What happened? A declaration was made as regards about £16 worth of goods that were intended to be sent to Tasmania, that they consisted of £3 worth of imported material, and that the added value given to them by the Victorian manufacturer was £13. That was not true.

Mr. THOMSON. — There was only 6s. difference.

Mr. KINGSTON. — We may regard the trade between Victoria and Tasmania as of a retail character, and our attention was called to this case because it was found that Tasmanian merchants were being "got at," owing to their being deprived of the protection to which they were entitled under the Constitution.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — Does the Minister mean that Messrs. Reid and Co. deliberately did this?

Mr. KINGSTON. — I mean to say that they did "get at" the Tasmanian merchants, whether they intended to or not.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN. — That is absurd.

Mr. THOMSON. — If that is the view the Minister takes, it shows where the trouble comes from.

If that is not attacking me for suggesting that this firm was capable of "getting at" the revenue, I do not know what it is. I do not believe that that criticism would be indulged in to-day, when I feel still further justified in the action which I then took. On that same occasion I called attention to the reports of the Tasmanian State collector, Mr. Barnard, who stated—

If the quantities and values taken out by the experts here are correct— with regard to the item on the attached copy of certificate— it would show that some of these certificates are totally unreliable; and in the interests of this State some action should be taken against those persons who make these declarations falsely. Otherwise the revenue of this State must be seriously affected.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—What does he mean by "falsely?" Knowing them to be false?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I will read what Mr. Barnard said—

In the case in point, the dutiable material from which the cotton apparel is stated to have been manufactured, is declared to on the certificate as of value £3 2s. 11d., and the cost of manufacture at £13 11s., whereas the experts here agree that the material used cannot be of less value than £6 18s. 6d., taking the value at bare American cost, thus defrauding the revenue of the duty on £3 15s. 7d., plus 10 per cent.

That, I think, would prevent the two honorable members to whom I have referred, indulging in similar criticism to-day; and in the light of subsequent events I feel even more justified in the course which I then took, and which the House was prepared to indorse. It is no pleasure to me to institute prosecutions. I do not want the fines, and I do not care to see men disgraced by convictions for fraud; but, holding the position I do, my duty is clear, and I will do it, looking to the House for justification. Those who assert that I proclaim myself the only honest Minister say that which is not true. There have been many honest Ministers who have done their best, but having the benefit of the advice and the experience available to an Australian Minister responsible for six States—advice and experience which were not available in the case of State Ministers—I see more of what goes on and know more of what ought to be done than was naturally the case in the isolated States. I do not for one moment attribute to Australian merchants any general failing in comparison with British merchants. Australian merchants are worthy of the highest reputation which British merchants deservedly enjoy; and those who say that I have spoken ill of my Australian friends and the people to whom I belong, in the way of making comparisons with the merchants of other countries, say that which is not. I am proud of the country to which I belong, and have every cause to be proud. I am proud of our merchants and all classes and conditions of men within the Commonwealth. But we all know that in the matter of smuggling and offences against the revenue there is a lax idea in nearly all communities which we do not find in connexion with other matters. "Getting at" the Government has been thought to be a comparatively venial offence. I do not know what may generally be thought of such offences, but a Customs Minister ought to lay himself out to prevent them.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But not to trap people.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I have been clothed with the necessary power, and I regard it as a trust to be honestly and vigilantly exercised.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—With common sense.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes; with common sense, in order to prevent not only fraud, instances of which of a deliberate nature I am happy to say are comparatively few, but also to prevent carelessness, incompetence, and recklessness, which are all too frequently exhibited in connexion with the preparation of Customs entries.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—In one out of ten thousand entries.

Mr. KINGSTON.—What are customs entries? A man pledges his oath and his honour.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Rubbish!

Mr. KINGSTON.—Honour is not rubbish, and an oath is not rubbish, and every entry which requires an oath involves a man's honour.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I did not mean what the Minister thinks I meant.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I will not press the point, as the honorable member says he did not mean his words to be taken in that light.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I was referring to what the Minister previously said.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Many people think lightly of Customs offences, and we know how entries are scamped in the hurry of the moment; but that is not good enough, and the Customs have a right to require more. Importers should employ competent hands at good wages to do this work.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Not boys.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Boys should not be employed.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Nonsense.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The House marked its intention in this respect in the Customs Act, but time and again we have been told of boys being sent up to pass entries. Dr. Wollaston, who is the highest authority in customs practice in Australia, and who is a worthy recipient of the Imperial Service Order, informs me that it has been too long the custom to send boys to do this important work. Where the oath of an importer is concerned, and the reputation of his firm may be involved, competent men at decent wages should be employed, and not boys in knickerbockers.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Rubbish.

Mr. KINGSTON.—As a fact, however, boys, whose heads are not up to the shoulders of an average adult, have been entrusted with this business, and, so long as I have the honour to be in my present position, I shall not allow the practice to go unchallenged.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—How many cases of fraud have been discovered?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Not many—six or seven. But when we find fraud amongst the highest firms what are we to think, and what care ought we not to exercise?

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Nobody blames the Minister for that.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am sure they do not. The honorable member for Wentworth knows that the Customs authorities have to be very careful, and that a line cannot easily be drawn between one class of firm and another. The great majority of the merchants are honest men, but they are perhaps not quite so careful as they are honest. There are some few who defraud, but they cannot be marked off with a line: and firms in high repute to-day, may to-morrow be detected in a long series of frauds. We have to be vigilant and treat all alike, and no man should be allowed to escape on account of previous good character. No fraud ought to be charged, unless it is capable of proof up to the hilt.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Is it possible to avoid error in any business?

Mr. KINGSTON.—It seems to me that there are errors and errors.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—And the Minister wants to call them fraud.

Mr. KINGSTON.—That is not so. I am not going to justify my administration by reference to cases, all of which are publicly known.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Has the Minister not found the bulk of our mercantile community honest?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Indeed I have; the great bulk are honest. But the honorable member must not think that he has now extorted from me an admission which I have not previously made and gloried in.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I do not think the Minister started with that idea.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I did start with that idea, and I repudiate indignantly any suggestion that I ever defamed my countrymen, of whom I am proud. I never suggested that Australia compares unfavorably in this respect with any other country in the world; on the contrary, I know the fact to be otherwise, and have so expressed myself time after time. To endeavour to make out that I am a slanderer of my countrymen is to talk nonsense. I do complain that there is not more care shown in the charges which are brought against me. I will not return to that charge, with which I have already dealt, and in which my honorable friend admitted, like the honorable man he is, that he had made a mistake. I think it was Senator Pulsford who said that in a case in which there was a difference as between £34 7s. 6d. and £37 4s. 6d., and in which nothing had occurred more than a mere error, of which it was not worth while taking notice, I caused a prosecution. I did nothing of the sort.

Mr. THOMSON.—There have been prosecutions for loss.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The fact is that there was a case brought before me in which there was a difference or shortage as between £62 and £150, and at the same time the other case, to which Senator Pulsford referred, was mentioned. But it came before me, not as a difference of £3, but as a difference of practically £91. I ordered the prosecution, and the two cases were taken as practically one matter. The defendants pleaded guilty in regard to the big case, and the other was withdrawn.

Mr. THOMSON.—Has the Minister seen Senator Pulsford's letter?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Yes; and Senator Pulsford has every reason to be ashamed of himself for it.

Mr. THOMSON.—He examined the depositions in the police court.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I will give honorable members the facts. The plea of guilty was entered in regard to the larger charge. The defendants wanted it to be entered as regards the smaller charge, but we would not agree to that. I may say at once that there was no charge of fraud. This is the letter of the Crown Solicitor—

I have the honour, with reference to your letter of the 22nd inst., relating to two prosecutions against Farmer and Co. on the 24th September last, to inform you that, although my papers do not disclose the subject-matter of the charge upon which the conviction was obtained, the prosecuting officer distinctly recollects that the plea of guilty was accepted in respect of the charge concerning twelve cases of furniture. He informs me that, the day before the cases came on for hearing, Mr. Shorter, solicitor for the defendant company, saw him in reference to such cases, and asked if the department would be prepared to withdraw one of the charges in the event of his pleading guilty to the other. Mr. Shorter was told that a definite reply would be given at 10 o'clock next morning, and at that time he expressed a desire to have the plea recorded in respect of the charge relating to one bale of rugs. The prosecuting officer declined to accede to this course, and eventually Mr. Shorter pleaded guilty to the other charge.

I made that statement, or one to the same effect, at the Town Hall. Mr. Pulsford heard what I said, and went to the court. He then proceeded to write that he visited the court, and that the docket showed that the conviction was upon the smaller charge. That statement is a half truth, the sort of fib which is the hardest of all to fight. He makes no mention of the fact that the clerk told him that there was a confusion in the papers, and that in all probability the plea of guilty was entered in the larger case. In ignoring that information he, it seems to me, has wilfully misled the public. This case shows the sort of treatment to which I am subjected. If I make a mistake, I am not above owning it, and I think that others might do the same.

MR. THOMSON.—I have no doubt that Senator Pulsford will reply to the Minister's statements.

MR. KINGSTON.—I hope that he will, and that at length the truth will be made plain.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—Senator Pulsford is a more accurate man than the right honorable gentleman ever was.

MR. KINGSTON.—I do my best to be accurate.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—So does he.

MR. KINGSTON.—I do not wish to suggest that he does not; all I desire to say is that he did not treat this case with the candour which is probably his characteristic, but from which on this occasion he suffered himself to lapse.

MR. THOMSON.—Where is the evidence that the clerk said?

MR. KINGSTON.—It was contained in the following letter, which is signed P. Minns, P.M., acting C.P.S., and Chief Magistrate:—

With reference to the communication by Senator Pulsford and the deposition clerk, it appears that the latter saw Mr. Pulsford inspect the papers, and explained to him that "all the 'furniture' summons attached to the 'rug' information was marked 'withdrawn'." It was almost a certainty that the word "drawn" referred to the information to which the summons was attached.

All that we have heard about the case of charging fraud against this, that, and the other man is, so much fudge. A charge of fraud is preferred only when there is ground for it. In all other cases no statement is made by the prosecuting officer but that we do not charge fraud, as a concession to the wish of many, that we should do not charge fraud, we shall declare that we do not. With regard to the statement of persons charged with Customs offences, I point out that in South Australia, where I have neglected to register his dog, a man has to rub up in the court a "drunk," just as he might do in the street. Though I am not an advocate of intemperance, however much the consumption of spirits may benefit the revenue which I cherish so dearly, I think that, in the sight of Heaven, for a man upon a jovial occasion to exceed, so that when rolling home afterwards he is run in and fined, is a venial sin compared with that of the man who robs me of my duties. We are all liable to make errors, and if we do, it is suggested that we should go into the courts to receive punishment without being contaminated by the presence of "drunks" there. There is much nicety in these complaints. A man in Victoria does not vaccinate a child he is taken to the police court, but he believes that a member of this Parliament has been so treated. Was he contaminated by that?

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—He feels out of it, and is writing to the newspapers to vent his feelings.

MR. KINGSTON.—But I guarantee that he has too much good sense to object to what has been done to him on the ground was brought into contact with " Perhaps he did not appreciate the sentiment from the people of another country. We need not be ashamed, except of our own sins; and though we may be scariously for the enormities of it is really our own affairs that concern us. Now it has been said that there is no considerable trouble in connection with Customs administration before the Minister. If there was not there ought to be. I think I know something to the contrary. Do not honorable members think that we had not been six months since as a federation before the cry in Queensland that serious customs were taking place, and we were to help the authorities there?

JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister will be able to stop the leakages, notwithstanding all his heroic measures.

KINGSTON.—The Brisbane Courier of August, 1901, contains a report under the headlines, "Unfair influence of laxity—Customs leakages—deputation Queensland Treasurer." This was a motion to direct attention to the customs and the need for reform, and among those who attended I find representatives of Messrs. Stewart and Hemmant, gentlemen whom I can speak in the highest terms, who were called upon to afford me information, and their best to show that what they were actually a fact, and I feel sure they were actuated by the best principles in doing what they did. There also the names of Messrs. D. and W. Fraser and Co., Robert Reid and Co., R. Armour and Co., and A. M. and Co. Three of these firms have since been themselves in collision with the authorities, and have been dealt WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Hear, hear, Minister's own condemnation. Were there such cases?

KINGSTON.—I do not lightly charge fraud.

WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I doubt if the Minister has the right to mention their names.

KINGSTON.—Regarding one of the cases mentioned, an allegation was made that they were tried and fined that their mistake was shown because they had made charges against themselves. The mistake against themselves amounted to 10s., and the mistake against the revenue to £10. I am not suggesting fraud in that case, because, as I say, I shall not charge fraud lightly. When I charge fraud, honorable members may depend upon it that there is some ground for it, and that we are likely to reach the offender.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—Does not the Minister ever make an error in his own accounts?

Mr. KINGSTON.—Does the right honorable member for Wentworth often have accounts sent to him showing that he owes less than the amount due from him to his creditor. I do not mean to say that all mistakes are made against the Customs, but it is very nice to be able to point to a mistake against oneself, and say, "See how honest I am." In regard to such mistakes the merchant will not forget to call in afterwards and collect the overpayment, but if we passed the mistakes against the Customs, where should we be? According to the report to which I have just referred, Mr. Alexander Stewart did not hesitate to give it as his opinion that—

The leakage in the Customs revenue from soft goods alone during the past three years has been fully equal to half the amount of the existing deficit—namely, over £250,000. And Mr. Stewart asked—"Can we assume that other trades are honest, if this sort of thing goes on in the drapery trade?"

I specially refer to the gentleman who introduced the deputation, because I feel sure that he is absolutely public spirited. It is very pleasant to have to do with a gentleman who not only speaks boldly, but gives every assistance to the Customs. It cannot be doubted that the members of the deputation were in a position to know what was going on, and to give reliable information. Some honorable member asked me a question regarding this matter, which was also mentioned in the Queensland Parliament in the following manner:—

Mr. Macartney asked the Treasurer—

1. Has he seen a statement referring to an alleged leakage in Customs revenue attributed to Mr. Alexander Stewart (of Messrs. Stewart and Hemmant)?

2. Is there, in his opinion, any foundation for such statement in fact?

3. Has any action been taken in the matter?

Mr. Cribb replied:—1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. The alleged leakage in Customs revenue was brought under the notice of the Treasurer on 7th June last. Steps are being taken to prevent such leakage.

I communicated with Mr. Cribb on the subject, and he replied on 8th August as follows:—

I have the honour to inform you that in the month of June a deputation of Brisbane merchants waited on me, stating that they had good reason to believe that considerable leakage occurred in the Customs revenue of this State. It has been the practice here to allow firms conducting business in other States with branches in Brisbane to pass import entries at English or foreign cost, plus 10 per cent., but it was represented that the invoices presented with the entries did not always show the true English or foreign cost, and that due care was not exercised to see that they did so. This privilege of passing entries at 10 per cent. on English or foreign cost was not intended to apply to houses which do not keep stocks in this State, but simply sell through agents on samples. The deputation further alleged that some firms were in the habit of passing entries for goods which were not properly defined in the declaration. For instance, under the head of "Pins," which for use in apparel are free, hair-pins, curling-pins, &c., are included; and saddlery buckles, which are free, are made to cover many varieties of buckles. There appears to be substantial grounds for the statements made by the deputation, and when the new Tariff comes into force there may be further inducements for unscrupulous traders to attempt to pass goods from State to State without payment of duty. I am desirous that all reasonable care should be taken that the revenue of the State should not suffer, as well as that merchants who conduct their business in a fair and legitimate manner should not be placed at a disadvantage, and I should be glad if you would give this matter your attention, and issue instructions which will insure close scrutiny of invoices, and more frequent examination of goods in this State, with a view to preventing the abuses complained of and protecting the revenue.

At the instance of a committee of merchants in Queensland, the powers of the Commonwealth were invoked for the purpose of preventing abuses, which were stated to be of a very grave character, and this circumstance added strength to the information of which we subsequently became possessed, and confirmed us in every action. Inactivity in such a case would have been a grave offence, and I am determined that such a charge shall not lie at my door. I said a little time ago that I was not requiring information which was not within the complete control of the merchants themselves. I am not troubling merchants with regard to the classification of goods for duty. I do not care what mistake they make with regard to the duties. There may be cases in which it is difficult to say to what particular duty goods are properly subject, but what I have said time and again is—"Give me the nature of the goods, give me their value, give me proper invoices, and you need fear nothing—you will not be prosecuted."

Mr. THOMSON. — Does not the Minister know that a great many prosecutions have been instituted after such information has been given?

Mr. KINGSTON. — No, I know to the contrary, and I am going to prove it. This is what the Sydney merchants asked for when I last saw them, and when I pointed out that they had it already they were delighted. Possibly mistakes have been made, but they have certainly not been justified by the facts. In cases where £90 was involved, it has been represented that only £3 was in question, and I have given an instance in which certain things were represented as having happened to more than one individual when there was only a solitary case. I do not suggest anything beyond an honest mistake, but still it is annoying to have matters misrepresented. I wrote to the Sydney Chamber of Commerce on 27th June last, and said—

What precautions are usual and proper to be taken has long been settled by the practice of States situated in similar circumstances.

Two things are chiefly essential—a true description of the nature of the goods, and their value, supported by the production of the genuine invoice identified by the importer's declaration.

So long as the nature of the goods, and their value, &c., are fairly stated so that the duty can be accurately assessed and the proper invoice is produced, no importer need fear anything. Certainly he will not be prosecuted for any error on a really doubtful matter of opinion.

Mr. THOMSON.—They have been prosecuted.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am not speaking without book. I know how exact my honorable friend is, and I am going to prove everything up to the hilt. Instructions were issued in September under my signature.

Mr. THOMSON.—That is nearly twelve months after the Tariff was enforced.

Mr. KINGSTON.—In June I made the promise to which I have referred, and by which my officers were bound, and on 2nd September I gave instructions which were put into formal circulation, although they had been previously acted upon. I could not go back upon a letter such as that written by me to the Sydney Chamber of Commerce. This was my instruction—

1. As to entries, I do not wish prosecutions when the nature and value of the goods are fairly disclosed in the entry, so that acceptance of the entry will not necessarily cause loss to the revenue—if the officer does his duty.

2. I specially desire that no error of classification by the importer in the entry shall alone render him liable to penal consequence if he has in the entry disclosed the true nature of the goods so that they can well be identified for Tariff purposes by an officer familiar with the Tariff.

What I say is that I am entitled to two things—the invoice and the entry. The entry is an oath to which the importer swears. I say to him—"Let me have the invoice and entry, the nature of the goods and their value, and you may make as many mistakes as you choose regarding the duty and you will not be punished." That is the position which I take up. I want my officers to look after the duty, and not to rely too much upon the inexperienced classification by a merchant. We are more competent than he is to decide what duty should be imposed, but he is more competent to say what is the nature of the goods and their value. When he gives us that information, together with the true invoice, he need fear nothing. This is what was circulated with the memorandum by the Acting Comptroller-General, Mr. Lockyer, one of my most careful officers—a gentleman who has raised himself to his present position as collector in Sydney by high ability. What does he say?—

Herewith are enclosed for your guidance, directions by the Minister in regard to the dealing with misdescription of goods and errors of entry by importers and agents. A careful inspection of many of such cases which have, by direction, been submitted for the personal consideration of the Minister, has disclosed in many instances, to say the least, the most culpable carelessness in the presentation of the important particulars necessary for the protection of the revenue.

Here, I say, time and again I get the excuse of gross carelessness. I say to the merchants—"Before you swear to any statement, employ some one who will not be grossly careless. Protect the revenue, and honest and careful merchants." The communication continues—

It is possible that many of these errors are the result of the employment of incompetent and inexperienced clerks.

I believe that they are. But I hold that the offence is rather aggravated by the employment of boys or of men, often at very small salaries, to do work which they are not capable of satisfactorily performing. The Acting Comptroller-General continues—

It is quite clear that in many instances the attention and care which are considered imperative in ordinary commercial transactions, have not been extended to and observed in dealing with the department. There is undoubted evidence in many cases of inexperience, want of care, and incompetence in the preparation of entries, which, in the interests of the revenue, cannot possibly be tolerated. It, therefore, now rests with you to see that there is no lapse of vigilance on the part of the officers, or want of care and attention on the part of importers and agents in all that is necessary for the furnishing of full and accurate information. The entries should be clearly written and fully completed, the goods accurately and truthfully described, and due regard given to the importance and very serious nature of the declaration subscribed.

An entry involves an oath. I think that fact is too frequently forgotten. It is regarded merely as an idle form, judged by the want of attention given to its preparation, and the facility and recklessness with which it is sworn to.

The Minister particularly directs—"In all cases of false statements on entries as to the value of goods against the revenue which might have been avoided by proper care by competent clerks, proceedings to be taken when more than £1 duty is involved, or irrespective of amount where the case is not the first against the same importers. The Comptroller-General may sanction any proceedings, irrespective of amount, in any case when the special circumstances appear to require it.

Mr. THOMSON.—Does that apply to fixed duties?

Mr. KINGSTON.—It applies to all. Even in the case of goods which are not delivered before they were weighed, there is no trouble. I have taken pains to inquire by telegram within the last ten days whether there has been any breach of the order to which I refer, and I have received an assurance from each of the State collectors that nothing of the sort has taken place. Under these circumstances, how does it lie in the mouths of those who suggest the contrary to justify their attacks? Let them bring forward one case which will justify them. Such a case has never occurred, and cannot have occurred, unless my collectors have stated what is not true; and I know that I am supported by an honorable staff which would not, on any account, wrongly advise the Minister's office. There I am content to let the matter rest. I am delighted to have an opportunity of making this explanation. I have had other opportunities in various places, and at different times. The last one—and perhaps the one which I most enjoyed—was at the interview which I had with a deputation of merchants at that great centre, Sydney. (What was the result of that interview, even according to my severest critics? One of those critics—the Sydney Morning Herald—which had prepared me for all sorts of dull and dreadful things, headed the report of the proceedings of the deputation—"The Minister in a conciliatory mood"—I am always that—"Amicable assurances on both sides." At first there was a little loose sparring, but when we got to close quarters we found that we thoroughly enjoyed each other. The report in question states—

At first there was a little disagreement regarding the precise subject to be brought forward by the deputation, but an understanding was soon arrived at, a conciliatory spirit was shown on both sides, and the discussion was carried on in the most friendly spirit

There is nothing of the prize-fight about that.

Mr. THOMSON.—The Minister has since stated that the deputation misunderstood his promise, and that he did not give the promise which satisfied them.

Mr. KINGSTON.—All I can say is that this is the report of the Sydney Morning Herald upon the matter. I suppose that will be accepted as an authority in New South Wales.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The Minister does not accept its statements himself.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Not as to statistics especially as to shipping which is decorated. In such cases if one obtained 6-47ths of the truth he would be lucky. But the report of the proceedings of the deputation seems to be all right.

Mr. THOMSON.—I quoted from it the other night and the Minister said it was wrong.

Mr. KINGSTON.—Then the honorable member must have quoted a portion which I have not seen. The members of that deputation reminded me of what I had said, but they did not assert that I ever declared I would not institute prosecutions except in cases of fraud. They agreed that I was right in what I wanted. In the House of Representatives, said Mr. Barre Johnston, Sir William McMillan had asked the following question :—

Would not the Minister permit a Customs official to allow the rectification of a clerical error?

to which the Minister had replied—

We are not laying down the rule that persons must be prosecuted and penalized for the smallest clerical error, such as might take place in an arithmetical calculation ; but in collecting duties, as I have stated in communication with chambers of commerce and other bodies interested, a right to know from the importers what the nature of the goods they are importing, and is the value of those goods.

When they put it that they wanted to abstain from prosecutions where questions of duty were involved, I told them that had been adopting that practice throughout. The report proceeds—

On the point that Mr. Wall and other men have raised, as to men being prosecuted making wrong statements of duty charged, I wrote to your chamber some time ago that such was not my wish, and I gave instructions to the contrary months ago. I hold in my hand the instructions signed by me on 1st November. I look to my officers regarding the duty of rates—(Hear, hear)—and Mr. Lockyer he believes the fullest effect has been given to these instructions. In the second clause of the instructions I specially desire that no classification by the importer in the entry alone render him liable to penal consequences if he has in the entry disclosed the true value of the goods so that they can be identified by the Tariff purposes.

All the members of the deputation smile at the benedictions, the clouds which had previously overhung the meeting were dissipated, joy and happiness reigned supreme. On that occasion I also emphasized a declaration which I made in June last, to the effect that the importers need not trouble themselves about the duty which is to be paid. They have only to speak the truth in the matters within their knowledge, and state the nature of the goods, their value, and the invoices. I will undertake to see that after the duty. Every member of the deputation left the room perfectly satisfied.

Mr. THOMSON.—Did not the Minister the other night, when I was quoted, extract from that very newspaper, that the deputation had misunderstood him?

Mr. KINGSTON.—I cannot tell whether the report in my hand was read by the honorable member was reading it. There is no doubt, however, as to the point which I took up, and there is no content to allow the matter to go. Since that deputation waited upon me, the Tariff guide has been completed. That work I think supplies a wealth of information not only to the common public, but to the Customs officials. It enables them to avoid that reference to the quarters which has necessarily been associated with its absence. I do not hesitate to admit that in the past too many fairly find fault. But there are other departments of the State quite as important, if not more so, to the people than that of the Customs. There is the Postal department, which touches people more intimately than the Customs. I tell the Government in all friendliness that if they are to continue in office it will be necessary for them to look closely into the administration of the Postal department. As one from a distant State, I know that most aggravating delays occur before the Department can be induced to carry out the slightest work. Some of these works were projected before the Commonwealth took over the department, and yet they are still at the stage when tenders are being called. That is the result of red-tape, and I respectfully suggest the advisability of shaking up the officers, so that the people in the interior portions of Australia, who are opening up and developing the country, may obtain postal and telegraphic facilities. In my opinion the department is run a little too much on commercial principles, the idea of the Minister apparently being that each service must pay its way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Why should the Postmaster-General not get revenue, if the Minister for Trade and Customs gets it?

Mr. MAHON.—I do not object to that view, but up to this time the post-office has always been used as an auxiliary in the development of the country. It is monstrous to expect that every new service must pay its way from its inception, and if the present policy is continued it will seriously retard settlement and development in the interior. Then, I want to know the reason why these extravagant demands for guarantees are made in the matter of telephone and telegraphic communication? If I desire a telephone to be constructed between two towns, I must give a cash guarantee to cover any loss that might occur.
Under the Western Australian law, municipalities have no power to give these guarantees, but must spend every shilling of the rates, except 3 per cent., on municipal improvements. It is the opinion of those who interpret the law that the municipalities are thus debarred from giving guarantees to the Federal Government in connexion with telephone and telegraphic extension. And I want to know how it is that in these matters some States are served differently from others?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — All States are treated alike.

Mr. MAHON. — That is not so. An honorable member of this House, who represents South Australia, and has an influential newspaper at his back, was instrumental in obtaining the construction of a telegraph line to Tarcoola, at a cost of not less than £14,000, without any guarantee being given to the Federal Government. I understand that, in the first instance, it was represented to this House that this money would be deducted from South Australian revenue as part of the expenditure of a transferred department; but now the claim is seriously raised that this is part of the new expenditure which must be borne by the Commonwealth generally. This is a matter which seems worth inquiring into. How is it that an honorable member from one State can have a large work like this done at a cost of £14,000 without any guarantee, while a Western Australian member, under similar circumstances, is asked to deposit a certain amount in cash? There is another point requiring notice in connexion with postal administration. This is in respect to the refusal to deliver letters addressed to Tattersall's. That step has caused an enormous loss of revenue, and the statement I made at the time that the section would prove a failure is borne out by the fact that Tattersall's sweeps are now filling as well as ever they did. The House as well as the Government deserves censure for this. This is what may be called hypocritical legislation.

Mr. McDONALD. — Why so? We might as well say the honorable member was guilty of hypocrisy in voting against the clauses.

Mr. MAHON. — It is pure cant to pretend to legislate for the suppression of gambling, when we know that it cannot be suppressed in that way. What I said in the House was that if we desired to legislate against gambling we should do so directly, and not in an underhand manner, which is always more or less hypocritical. As regards the transcontinental railway, I notice that some honorable members are opposing its construction on grounds of economy. One of the South Australian members the other night gave, as his principal objection to the line, the enormous cost it involved, but I notice that when the same honorable member advocated the extension of the Tarcoola telegraph line made no inquiry as to the expense recommending the project to the I. Another honorable member observed that the Western Australian Government should give the Esperance line before South Australia gives permission for the transcontinental to pass through her territory. It was within the recollection of honorable members that during last session I submitted a motion in favor of the construction of the Esperance railway, but I think these subjects stand on different footings. They are both worthy of being completed, but there is no reason why the non-construction of the Esperance railway should retard the construction of the transcontinental. I regret very much that some effort is not made to prevent the Parliament of South Australia from giving the necessary consent to the construction of the Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie railway. If ever a Government pledged itself to anything beyond recommendation, the Government of South Australia are pledged to give permission for the construction of this transcontinental line. To prove the truth of what I say, I have only to refer to a letter written to the Premier of Western Australia by our Speaker, when he occupied the high position of Premier of South Australia. The letter is dated 1st February, 1901, and is as follows:—

Following our conversation as to the proposed blocking of the construction of a railway line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta by the Federal Government, by South Australia refusing consent, rendered necessary by section 34 of clause 51 of the Commonwealth Bill, to the construction of the line through her territory. I regard the withholding of consent as the most improbable thing, in quite out of the question. To assure you of my attitude in the matter, I will undertake that as soon as the federation is established, and South Australia both being States of the Commonwealth) to introduce a Bill for giving the assent of this province to the construction of a line by the federal authority, and pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill in your Parliament.

I find also that your successor, Mr. Speaker, in the Premiership of South Australia, wrote on 31st July, 1901, to the Minister as follows:—

In reply to your letter of 23rd inst., I have the honour to inform you that prior to the submission of the Commonwealth Constitution Act for the approval of the people of Western Australia on the 1st February, 1900, the Honorable Premier (then Premier of South Australia) had written to the Premier of Western Australia (copy of letter herewith) undertaking on specified conditions—only condition specified in your was that the Western Australian should simultaneously pass a bill through their House. Now we are to understand, however, that certain conditions were mentioned, and the Mr. Jenkins proceeds—on taking on specified conditions to in-ill formally giving the assent of this construction of a line of railway to an Australian border. On the 11th graphed to the Western Australian follows :—

It was most wait until now to suggest new cond- to raise new objections to the But we find an explanation of that cumstance in the fact that South appears to have set her heart er transcontinental line, though to think that, when the ditions under which it is to build that line are known, cate will be foolish enough ke the work. It is proposed to a syndicate for the building of territory almost as large as the Victoria. The railway, when not to be handed over to the South Australian Government, but is to continue the property of the syndicate. That seems to me a most inequitable proposal. I know of two similar private railways in Western Australia, but they are both miserable failures.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Are they failures so far as the promoters are concerned?

Mr. MAHON.—They are failures so far as the country is concerned. The most miserable railway journey a man can make in Australia is that from Perth to Geraldton, on the Midland Company's line.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is that worse than the journey from Albany to Perth?

Mr. MAHON.—Yes, far worse; there is no comparison between the two. The trains run at the rate of about 15 miles an hour, and in the 318 miles, which comprise the whole distance, there is not a place where one may procure a decent meal, so that those who travel on the line invariably take their own food and liquor with them. But the secret of the South Australian objection to the Western Australian transcontinental line will be discovered in the report of an interview which took place in London between a newspaper reporter and a gentleman who claims to be the power behind the throne in South Australia. He is not the Premier, but he informs all and sundry that at any time he likes he could turn the Government out. This is the report of an interview with Mr. Darling, the leader of the Opposition in South Australia, the gentleman to whom I refer—

Although his coming to London had no official connexion with the promotion of the scheme for building a railway from Oodnadatta to Pine Creek, still, he had made "casual" inquiries amongst bankers and financiers. "They seem to be agreed," continued Mr. Darling, "that the state of the money market and the disposition of capitalists generally are not altogether too favorable at the moment. They seem to think, however, that it is one of the ventures that might well be taken up by London capitalists when better times arrive." The South Australian afterwards proceeded to show what the expression "better times" meant in his mind. "The Commonwealth," he said, "is at present entirely opposed to the introduction of coloured labour into any part of the island-continent. If that course is persisted in, then the tropical resources of the Northern Territory cannot be profitably developed. It is no use blinking this fact. What I would suggest is the introduction of Indian coolies under an indentured system, which has worked so well in other parts of the British dominions. I believe that the people of Australia will, in the course of a few years, come round to this view."

The railway is to be made by a private syndicate ; and, as a concession, they are to receive a territory as large as Victoria, and are to have the right of running the line, and, apparently, of charging what rates they like on it for all time. I believe, too, that they are to be exempt from State taxation. But Mr. Darling has given the project away when he says, in effect, that this territory can be made profitable only by the employment of coloured labour. I think that this Parliament will prevent Mr. Darling or his syndicate, if it is foolish enough to undertake the enterprise, from employing coloured labour. Possibly the syndicate has not been told that the Federal Parliament may impose taxation upon property ; although, so far, we have imposed no direct taxation, we have the right to place a tax upon land. I apprehend that when those facts are made known to London capitalists they will hesitate for a long time before proceeding with the construction of the line. The correspondent from whose report I have quoted goes on to say—

I reckon that if Mr. Jenkins' land grant railway to Port Darwin is not built until the Australians have turned their back upon white labour, then the man is not yet born who will travel on the line.

And I quite agree with him. I think that when the question is fairly put before the people of South Australia they will not be guilty of a repudiation in the nature of a breach of faith. Despite what the politicians and leaders of Parliament may say, I should be perfectly willing to submit the issue to the people of South Australia, putting before them the promise which was made on their behalf by their Government. I intended to speak at some length upon the other questions dealt with in the Governor-General's speech, but no doubt other opportunities will in due course arrive when the various measures in the Government programme are brought before the House. Although I am inclined to consider the High Court a necessary part of the federal machinery, I fear that as proposed it would be too expensive a luxury at the present time. I should like instead to see some arrangement whereby one federal Judge could be appointed to sit with the Chief Justices of the States whenever occasion required the services of the Federal High Court, because it does not appear to me that there will be sufficient work for five Mahon.

Judges. I believe, however, that the matter is one that we might fairly postpone for the present. With regard to the capital site, I think that, in justice to South Wales, we should proceed to its selection as soon as possible, but I should be in favour of commencing the building of a federal capital while money is so dear in London, because no Government can profitably borrow at 4 per cent., and it is not possible to get money now at lower rates.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not much would be required.

Mr. MAHON.—No ; but as this House has already objected to the borrowing of money for necessary works, such as telephones and telegraphs, I think we should not borrow to build a federal capital. We want telegraphs and telephones for the development of the back country more than we want a federal capital. However, I might be to get away from Melbourne and recognise that this is not the time to increase the burden of the taxpayer by borrowing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it not the time to carry out a bargain ?

Mr. MAHON.—The construction of a transcontinental railway was an important bargain with Western Australia, the terms of which are unfortunately not in the constitution, but they would have been made had those who represented that State been alive to the interests of their colony. When will the hon. member be ready to carry out that bargain ?

Mr. CONROY.—Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. MAHON.—No doubt that is so, but that statement makes our work less hard to bear. I am rather disappointed with the declaration of views of speakers concerning preferential trade relations with the other parts of the Empire. I was surprised to hear the Premier pronounced upon Mr. Chamberlain to-night by no less a person than the Minister for Trade and Customs. It is a singular thing to find one who is widely regarded as the darling of Australian democracy praising a man who in England has been a traitor to democracy. Possibly the attitude of one of the Melbourne newspapers in regard to Mr. Chamberlain may have influenced the mind of the Minister. The paper is a harsh critic of the Minister for Customs, and his hostility to it may a

I merely the Constitutions of Natal and only had been suspended during the South Africa. What I should have that the right of the Parliaments colonies to meet had been suspended the war.

PROY.—That is practically a suspension of the Constitution.

CHAMBERLAIN.—It is really a distinction a difference, and the Minister for Trade and Customs devoted more attention to a trivial matter than it warranted. I am surprised also to hear some of the expressed from the opposition side of Chamberlain with reference to preferential trade. The leader of the Opposition said that if we were to have a protective Tariff we should close the doors more tightly against the colonies than against England. I do not see much difference between what the right honorable gentleman said and what the Minister for Trade and Customs has suggested. The statements of the leader of the Opposition are in accord with the Cobden idea of free trade. Cobden held that, although a protective Tariff might injure the country to which it was directed, it would also injure the country which imposed it. If we ask how can the leader of the Opposition deny himself to become implicated in the imposition of protective duties?

PROY.—He would lessen them as far as possible, if he could not remove

CHAMBERLAIN.—There is the alternative offered by the Minister for Trade and Customs of increasing the duties upon imports, and leaving them as they stand with regard to those which come from Great Britain. Personally, I should prefer to see the duties entirely abolished so far as imports from the mother country are concerned, and revenue imposts collected upon goods from foreign sources. I was surprised that the Minister for Trade and Customs should become so enamoured of Mr. Chamberlain, because he must be perfectly aware that that right honorable gentleman has proved a traitor to every political party with which he has been associated. Mr. John Morley, who, as a statesman, a literary man, and a democrat, is far and away above Mr. Chamberlain, in writing the life of Cobden some years ago, practically foresaw the present proposal for preferential trade, or, as it was then known, fair trade. This is what he says—

Nobody has fully grasped the bearings of free-trade who does not realize what the international aspect of every commercial transaction amounts to; how the conditions of production and exchange in any one country affect, both actually and potentially, the corresponding conditions in every other country. It is not free-trade between any two countries that is the true aim; but to remove obstacles in the way of the stream of freely exchanging commodities, that ought, like the Oceanus of primitive geography, to encircle the whole habitable world. In this circulating system every Tariff is an obstruction, and the free circulation of commodities is in the long run as much impeded by an obstruction at one frontier as at another. This is one answer to an idea which has been lately broached among us, under stress of the temporary reaction against free-trade. It has been suggested that though we cannot restore protection in its old simplicity, yet we might establish a sort of National Imperial Customs Union among the English dominions. The territory over which the flag of Great Britain waves is so enormous and so varied in productive conditions, that we could well afford, it is urged, to shut ourselves within our own walls, developing our own resources, and consolidating a strong national sentiment, until the nations who are now fighting us with protective Tariffs come round to a better mind. The answer to this is that the removal of the restriction on the circulation to a more distant point would not affect the vital fact that the circulation would still be restricted and interrupted. To induce our colonies and dependencies to admit our goods free would, of course, be so much gained; just as the freedom of interior or domestic commerce, which was one of the chief causes of the early prosperity of Great Britain, was by so much a gain over the French system, which cut off provinces from provinces by customs barriers during the same period. But freedom of internal commerce, whether within an island or over a wide empire, is still not the same thing as universal freedom of exchange. An interruption, at whatever point in the great currents of exchange, must always remain an interruption and a disadvantage. England is especially interested in any transaction that tends to develop trade between any nations whatever. We derive benefit from it in one way or another. The mother country has no interest in going into a customs union with her colonies, with the idea of giving them any advantage, or supposed advantage, in trading with her over foreign countries.

I do not know that I need weary the House by continuing this debate. I should not have spoken but for some remarks which were made regarding the transcontinental railway to Western Australia. I hope that in discussing the various measures which are to come before us, we shall display the same good feeling and friendliness that was shown in connexion with every measure except the Tariff last session. If the Government will direct their attention to securing a proper administration of the Postal department, they will perform as great a public service as has been rendered by the Minister for Trade and Customs in his department. I honour the Minister for what he has done, and I believe that the people of this country, almost to a man—certainly those in the back country of Western Australia—approve of his administration. Although I sit in opposition to the right honorable gentleman, I concede the fact that his dealing out of even-handed justice to the weak and the strong must meet with all-round approval, and that his action in bringing to justice men who held their heads high in the community, and regarding whom no suspicion was previously entertained, redounds to his credit. I hope that he will continue in the course which he has hitherto followed, but that he will make a strenuous effort to avoid the irritating delays which have caused so much loss and annoyance to merchants in the past. I rose mainly to deal with the objections regarding the transcontinental line to Western Australia, and to urge the Government to give more attention to the administration of the Postal department, and to conduct it upon principles other than those which appear to actuate the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—I do not intend to go over the ground which has been traversed so often by other honorable members. I should be glad to say a word or two in defence of the attitude of the Parliament of South Australia in reference to the transcontinental railway to the Northern Territory, but, unfortunately, I am unable to do so. It seems to me that the granting of such a large concession to a private company for them to build a railway for the convenience is altogether indolent. With reference to the attitude of South Australia towards the Western Australian railway, I think that the honorable member for Coolgardie is hardly doing justice to the Premier of the former State. The Australian Government have not stated that they will not carry out the proposition; they have stipulated that the proposed line should be constructed in a certain manner.

Mr. MAHON.—There was no condition made in the first instance?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—No, but I will give an explanation for that. During the time which elapsed between the communication sent to the Premier of Western Australia by Mr. Speaker when he was Premier of South Australia, and the letter sent to him by Mr. Jenkins, the present Premier, the gold-fields were discovered, and the people of South Australia are now very anxious that the line should pass so near to the vicinity of those fields that, as suggested, some distance south of them. This would relieve the South Australian Government of the necessity of carrying out an almost parallel line to Tarcoona. The proposed deviation will not add 25 miles to the total distance to be covered by the railway, and the condition laid down is a reasonable one.

Mr. FOWLER.—I do not think that the people of Western Australia will object to the condition, but we are informed that there are all sorts of other conditions are suggested.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that the people of South Australia will go back upon the undertaking entered into first by the Minister for Trade and Customs when he was Premier of that State, and afterwards by Mr. Speaker when he was Premier of a similar office. But before that line of argument other conditions may prevail. I think that the people of South Australia will go back upon their undertaking, because Mr. John Darling, or even one or two individuals, may think it is worth while to do so. I say this without in any way suggesting that either South Australian or Western Australian representatives are necessarily in favour of the line. But that is a very different matter from declaring that if the line is to be undertaken, South Australia will not stand in the way of its construction in her territory. I suppose that the honorable members would smile if I suggested

Mr. TUDOR.—Could we not compel the owners of vessels which trade here to pay the increased rate of wage?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I very much question whether we could. It seems to me that it would be far better to introduce a separate Bill for the purpose of covering these special disabilities. I know that the Minister for Trade and Customs does not care about devoting himself to a short measure of this kind. He would prefer to thoroughly master the whole question, and then draft a measure to meet the necessities of the case. If honorable members study the figures contained in a blue-book which was presented to the House of Commons last year in regard to this matter, they will be disagreeably startled. Those figures show that a large increase has taken place in the number of lascars and foreigners employed upon British ships, and a corresponding decrease in the number of Britishers so employed. During the past ten years I find that the lascars upon British ships have increased by 12,288, and the foreigners by 8,750, a total increase of 21,038 seamen, whereas the number of Britishers so employed has decreased by 7,155.

Mr. CONROY.—May not that be due to the fact that the men can do better than go to sea?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The real reason is that the labour of the lascar is cheaper. These figures, I submit, are sufficiently startling to merit careful consideration, unless the whole of the mercantile marine of Britain is to be manned by foreigners and lascars, which would be a particularly serious matter for the Imperial navy in the event of a naval conflict. In the course of his remarks, the honorable member for Parramatta spoke of the agreement which had been entered into with the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company. He declared that it was a matter for congratulation that the interminable agreement which previously existed had been amended, and an arrangement for ten years substituted. From my stand-point I am unable to discover any cause for congratulation whatever. As a matter of fact, the old agreement gave the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company nothing, but bound it to give to the contracting States a continuous reduction in cable rates to the old country.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A similar covenant will be contained in the new agreement.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—But that agreement is only for ten years.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—What about the right to open offices?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That arrangement means nothing at all. In the absence of the Pacific cable, tenders for the construction of which had not been called—

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—But the agreement had been made.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—At the time the agreement was made the Pacific Cable Company had not called for tenders for construction.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—But the British Government had agreed to join with the States, otherwise the Eastern Extension Company would never have lowered their rates.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I admit that the Pacific cable project assisted to make the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company decrease its charges. It would have been a splendid lever to have held for an indefinite period, but I submit that as an actual fact the construction of that cable has been a bit of a blunder. What has been the immediate result of the undertaking? It has involved a loss of £90,000, of which £30,000 is to be borne by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—We have saved the subsidies which we would otherwise have had to pay.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The subsidies were wiped out in the agreement.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member wants to obtain all the good and reject all the bad.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That would have been the sensible course to adopt. One method would have been to use the Pacific cable scheme as a means of dealing with the Eastern Extension Company in the event of the latter charging more than fair rates.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — That would have been a breach of faith with Canada.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—There has been no breach of faith so far as South Australia is concerned, and that State was perfectly satisfied.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And West Australia was perfectly satisfied.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — We remember that under the sliding arrangement, prices over the Eastern extension cable had to be reduced when the revenue of the company reached a certain figure, and that but for the establishment of the Pacific cable, and the subdivision of the business, we should have been able to send messages at 2s. per word instead of 3s. It was a contention on the part of the honorable member for Parramatta that West Australia and South Australia, who had entered into no arrangement in connexion with the Pacific cable, should now not only bear the loss of revenue which its establishment has caused them, but should assist the eastern States to pay the cost of the loss.

Mr. McCAY.—That is only the federal spirit."

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I wonder whether the eastern States, in the case of an arrangement being made on the Pacific cable, would hand over a share to the western States. I mention the observation of the honorable member for Parramatta, because in the absence of anything to the contrary the Government might think it reflects on the opinion of the House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The liability of the eastern States was taken over by the Commonwealth.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—And during the book-keeping period those States must either rise or fall by their agreements. South Australia cannot complain of the fact that a portion of the business now goes over the Pacific cable, but we should regard it as inequitable if we were now called upon to meet the loss on that line.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Does the line from South Australia pay?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It pays fairly, but in the old days it was a very heavy burden on South Australia; and including payment of interest, has not been made up.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Would it be an arrangement as to the Cape cable to have the effect of taking away the telegraphical work from South Australia altogether?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—No, it would not. Under the interterminable agreement

Australia, and also Western Australia, entered into, the former State gave, and got a considerable reduction rates. Messages by the Cape cost much as those by Port Darwin; the amount received by South Australia the same irrespective of the line

GEORGE TURNER.—But the Port line would not have been used.

BATCHELOR.—That does not because the landing facilities at Adelaide and Glenelg would have been. We have no right to complain of the Extension Company trying to defeat but we must complain of an attempt on part of the Commonwealth Government to unduly favour the Pacific line at the expense of the former company. Three Eastern States are concerned in one and the western States are concerned, and the postal authorities have that all messages, the routes of which are not indicated by the senders, must be sent by the Pacific cable. That appears to be a necessary action in order to force as business as possible to the Pacific line. Could unrouted messages handed in by the public be sent all the way round to the Cape, and thence by the Pacific line, when the quicker and quicker route, in which Australia is interested, is avail-

JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia is interested in that route.

BATCHELOR.—I do not use the word "interested" in the sense of partner-

JOHN FORREST.—It does not matter whether Western Australia which way messages I think they are sent by the line or the Cape. The messages go just as fast and at the same price, on both

BATCHELOR.—I have seen it in the newspapers, and have also very much authority for saying, that instructions have been given to the effect which I have mentioned; and this, of course, affects considerably the revenue of South Australia and Western Australia. A fair proposal would be to arrange that all messages should go by the quicker route, or by each alternately. Either method would be fair, but with the present arrangement the Government can fairly be accused of favouring the Pacific line. I should now like to refer to the public service regulations. These as a whole are fairly liberal, but there are a few to which exception may be taken. I shall not refer to details, because I think the public servants may be trusted to bring any disadvantages under which they labour under the notice of their superior, but there is one regulation which it seems to me ought not to be allowed in its present form. By regulation 41, officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss, or in any way to promote political movements. That is a very wide and sweeping regulation. Officers are further forbidden to use any official information for political purposes, or to disclose any such information without the express direction of the permanent head. These latter regulations are quite proper, and will meet with the approval of not only the public, but also of the officers themselves. Under regulation 41, however, public servants are unable to join any kind of organization whether of single taxers, free-traders, or protectionists, or in any way to promote a political movement. It may be said that the regulation is not to be interpreted literally—that it is a power which will never be exercised; but it is a very dangerous power to place in the hands of the Executive. I shall not go into details, but merely mention that recently we have seen a very extreme view taken of what a political association is. We have seen the most disastrous results in one of the States as a consequence of the adoption of that extreme view. Here, however, we have a much wider clause, and one which I think honorable members will agree should not be in the regulations. It was first published on the 23rd December last, and took effect on the 1st January of this year. There are other clauses in the regulations to which I should refer, but that I do not wish to keep honorable members at this late hour. I ask the Minister, however, to consult with the Public Service Commissioner to see if the regulations which I have dealt with cannot be modified, so that the public servants of the Commonwealth may enjoy as full rights of citizenship as those outside the service. There are one or two other matters upon which I wished to speak, but I shall leave them over until another time. I was exceedingly pleased to hear the explanations of the Minister for Trade and Customs in answer to the charges made against him during the debate. I feel certain that the public opinion of the Commonwealth will approve of his administration rather than of the criticism of some of his detractors. I hope that when the debate is concluded we shall get to work as speedily as possible, and that the session will not be unduly prolonged.

Mr. E. SOLOMON (Fremantle). — At this late hour it is not my intention to keep the House very long. I would preface my remarks by thanking honorable members who visited Western Australia to see for themselves the conditions of an important State, which in many respects, I am sorry to say, has been misrepresented. The people of our State, however, regretted that more federal members did not go there to inquire into our conditions, and to be witnesses of the prosperity which we are enjoying and shall continue to enjoy for a considerable time to come. As in 1892 our population was only 58,000, while in March last it was 219,000, honorable members will realize that the State has not stood still. On the contrary, it has progressed by such leaps and bounds as are phenomenal even in the history of Australia. I am aware that an impetus was given to our progress by the discovery of gold, but other reasons for it are the liberality of our laws and the generous encouragement which is given to settlement. The measures to which reference was made in the Governor-General's speech are of very great importance. It must be remembered that the conditions of the various States are very diverse. I may fairly say that there are not two States whose conditions are alike. Consequently the legislation which is proposed here necessarily provoked a great deal of discussion. We can only hope that the laws which are passed will prove beneficial, not to particular States alone, but to the whole Commonwealth. Last session we passed into law twenty-one Acts, apart from measures of a financial nature, so that our first session was not an idle one; and I feel sure that the legal foundation for the working of the Commonwealth which was thus laid will later redound to our credit. We have heard from some of the eloquent speakers in this Chamber that many of the Bills which are to be brought forward this session will be of the greatest importance to the future welfare of the Commonwealth, and no doubt they must. With regard to the establishment of a High Court of appeal, I feel that unless some economical plan is put before us I cannot support it. My idea is that the Judges of the courts will be sufficient for some time to come. There may be cases involving hundreds or thousands of pounds which come before federal courts, but, as the Chief Justices of the States might well be used for a year or two to conduct such a court. If that is done, there will be a great saving of expense, and it will be meted out to those who ask. With regard to the federal capital, I am sure, one, will not agree to the expenditure of any large sum of money upon building a new capital. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Parkes that it is a mistake for the Federal Parliament to meet in one of the capitals of the States, because its members must be influenced to some extent by the newspapers of that State. If a frugal economy were practised I think the necessary buildings could be erected without imposing too serious a burden upon the finances of the Commonwealth. The proposal is entirely in accord with the proposal to establish courts of conciliation and arbitration. We have just had an illustration of this State of how business and commerce are paralyzed when a large industrial dispute takes place. If a similar dispute occurred at one time in more than one State, the disaster would be very great. Any measure which will prevent strikes, and which will protect men, and especially women and children, from their effects, will be a good one. In Western Australia there were in 1900 several strikes which paralyzed trade, and honorable members can imagine the consternation and misery which was created by the stoppage of supplies to the gold-fields which are dependent for communication on the 400 miles of railway. I am also ready to support the proposed naval subsidy of £200,000 per annum. It would be a small sum for a country with a population of 2,000,000, like 3,800,000, to spend £1,000,000 upon the purchase of a battleship. We should still have its use to provide for, and it would practically give us no protection at all. I am sure, however, that under the proposed naval agreement we shall be well protected. I hope that the Government will see that the war ships are allowed to move from port to port. In the past the pe-

Western Australia, who have always contributed their share to the subsidy, have seen very little of the vessels of the squadron. The honorable member for Darling Downs spoke in favour of the establishment of a Federal Department of Agriculture. That suggestion was first made by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and it is a pity that it has not been carried out. Such a department need not necessarily be expensive, but it would do a great deal of good by its investigations into the capabilities of various kinds of soil, and by the information which it could give to agriculturists of all kinds. I wish to call the attention of the Minister for Trade and Customs to a case which I should like to bring under his notice. A firm in Western Australia some time ago imported some timber, and as the documents necessary to pass a Customs entry did not arrive with the timber, an arrangement was made with the department that a deposit of £50 should be paid, and that the entries should be made in due form when the proper documents arrived. That happened in due course, and something like £26 was paid in duty. But upon an application for a refund of the difference, it was stated that the money had been paid into the revenue account, and that the Customs Act did not allow any of it to be returned. I will read copies of the papers in the case which have been placed in my hands, the originals having been sent to the Comptroller-General of Customs. The first is a letter to myself, which I do not think it necessary to read. The next letter is addressed to the Collector of Customs, Fremantle, and is dated Fremantle, 6th November, 1902. It reads as follows :—

Dear Sir,—By the Wollourra, which reached this port in January last, at Adelaide, we had 1,215 pieces of timber transhipped from a vessel from America.

The papers forwarded to us were not sufficient to satisfy your department, and, by permission, we deposited the sum of £50 (fifty pounds) to obtain delivery, and to produce the specification and other information when received.

These papers have come to hand, and we desire to complete entries, but we are informed that the £50 has been paid into revenue. The amount of duty charged in the shipment is £26 11s. 4d., so it will be seen that a sum of £23 8s. 8d. is due to us.

We will be pleased to learn that upon our passing the necessary entries we may obtain a refund of this amount.

The reply was dated 7th November, and reads as follows :—

In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, I beg to inform you that the amount in question being on deposit over the period allowed, viz., 6 (six) months, was carried to revenue, and as your firm failed to produce the documents required by this Act within the prescribed time, I am unable to approve of any application for a refund of the amount overpaid.

On the 22nd November a letter was addressed to the Comptroller-General of Customs at Melbourne, in the following terms :—

We respectfully ask your consideration of a deposit entry made by us in January last, as per our letter to Collector of Customs here, and his replies thereto, as per copies enclosed herewith. We learn that according to section 17, Federal Customs Act, six (6) months is the period allowed for such deposit, but of this fact we were ignorant, and, therefore, under the circumstances, we trust you will deal justly with the case.

On the 4th December the Comptroller-General replied—

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst., for refund in connexion with an amount deposited by you with the collector, Fremantle, in January last, to cover duty on certain timber ex Wollourra, and in reply to inform you that the Customs Act does not permit compliance with your request.

I think that was really a hard case, because the firm affected was one of good standing, and handed over £50 as a deposit in order to secure duty which amounted to not more than £26. I direct the attention of the Minister for Trade and Customs to this matter in the best spirit, and I feel sure that that honesty of purpose which has distinguished his administration will prompt him to act fairly in this instance. A letter which appeared in to-day's Argus, signed by Messrs. Blogg Brothers, shows the difficulties and inconveniences to which manufacturers, even in Melbourne, are subjected—

Mr. KINGSTON.—I could say something very funny about that letter if I wished.

Mr. E. SOLOMON.—I do not think it necessary to read the letter, but simply direct attention to it. I desire to say a few words with reference to the trans-continental railway to Western Australia. Some honorable members, representing South Australia, seem to look upon this proposal in a very parochial spirit. They think that because the Western Australian Legislature declined to authorize the construction of a railway from Esperance Bay to the gold-fields, the South Australian Government should, therefore, withhold their consent to the construction of the line through their territory to Western Australia. The House has already been informed that distinct promises were made to the Minister for Defence and others before Western Australia entered the federation. It was represented by Sir John Forrest, who was then Premier of Western Australia, that South Australia was really in earnest in her desire to have the railway constructed, and if it had not been for such assurances, Western Australia would certainly not have entered the union. It has been stated that if a railway had been constructed from Esperance to the gold-fields, it would have greatly assisted South Australia, and apparently that State would prefer to have the local line rather than a railway which would connect Western Australia with the other States of the Commonwealth, and promote the general benefit. Would it not be better, after all, for South Australia if goods could be sent direct from Adelaide to Kalgoorlie rather than by steamer to Esperance and then by rail to the gold-fields? I was pleased to hear the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, say that he was favorable to the construction of the line, although he could not vote for it at present. We do not wish honorable members to pledge themselves to vote for the construction of the line until the necessary information, now under preparation, with regard to water supply and many other matters is placed in their hands, because we know that it would be suicidal on our part to urge the construction of the railway before its success could be fairly assured. The honorable and learned member for Parkes rather pooh-poohed the idea that the railway would be of any use for the purpose of conveying troops. I hope that many years will pass before any necessity arises for using the line for such a purpose; but I feel sure that we should act wisely in placing ourselves in a position to convey troops to almost any point of our extensive coastline, in order to meet a threatened invasion. It is questionable whether a railway from Esperance Bay to the gold-fields, such as has been ardently desired by the people of South Australia, would pay or prove of any real benefit to our neighbours in that State; in fact, it might have the effect that neither the present line from Fremantle or the suggested line would pay; so that I hope too much importance will not be attached to the refusal of Western Australia to construct the Esperance line. I hope the Government will push on with the line now being made in regard to the continental railway, and that the line will be surveyed without unnecessary delay.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I think in view of the long speech made by the Minister for Trade and Customs, it is fairly ask the Prime Minister to consent to an adjournment of the debate at this time.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I think the night might go on a little further to-night. I have been very considerate to honorable members in allowing early adjournments, and I think they should be satisfied if we close at a quarter to eleven.

Mr. BROWN.—In view of all the circumstances, the Prime Minister might fairly have consented to an adjournment, but I know that I need not expect much consideration from him, and, therefore, I am quite prepared to proceed. A variety of subjects have been dealt with in the course of this debate, but most of them are of the greatest importance, and I think the fullest consideration at our disposal. Therefore, I do not regard the time spent to their discussion as wasted. Neither the Government are anxious to close the debate, in order that they may avoid further caustic criticism, and enter on the work of the session without delay. One of the charges levelled against the Prime Minister is that he is not perfectly fair to the electors of the Commonwealth, and particularly to the electors of New South Wales, when he indicates to them the Tariff policy which he has intended to submit to this Parliament. The Prime Minister, in his reply to the leader of the Opposition, declared that there was no reasonable ground for the criticism that he was not perfectly fair to the electors of New South Wales in connection with this matter. But I am disposed to think that the criticism of the leader of the Opposition was perfectly justified. I would mind the right honorable gentleman that a very strong feeling existed in New South Wales over the question of the adoption of the Constitution. That feeling obliterated the old lines of difference between persons entertaining opposite views. If for no other reason than that the Prime Minister should have disclosed to the electors the character iff which he intended to submit to ament. At the conclusion of the test in connexion with the adop-Constitution a meeting was held st to consider the future position eral movement. At that meeting address I find that the Prime in addressing a Brisbane audience, orted to have said that the differ-ween the policy of the Government of the other side was only a eer—that it was not the wide fundamental distinction which is implied by a protective as distinguished from a free-trade Tariff. During the same campaign the Minister for Home Affairs is reported to have said—

He could only call it cruel to raise the fiscal question now, when the very Constitution itself rendered free-trade and protection alike impossible.

All these facts go to show that the fiscal issue was not submitted to the electors. I would further point out that Senator O'Connor gave utterance to sentiments similar to those entertained by the Minister for Home Affairs. The Vice-President of the Executive Council is reported to have said—

We ought not to allow the wretched fiscal question to come in, but we ought to choose the best men.

That was the original battle-cry. The men who were in sympathy with the federal movement were to receive first consideration, and the wretched fiscal issue was not to be raised. But what happened? After the elections had been won, the Government had to evolve their taxation proposals. In submitting those proposals to this House the Minister for Trade and Customs declared—

This is a protectionist policy. We were sent here by the people to support that policy, and we place it before you with the force of our majority behind us.

That is very different from the statement which was made throughout New South Wales prior to the elections. All things considered, I think there is very substantial ground for the criticism which has been levelled against the Government upon this particular matter. I regret to say that the high expectations formed of the first Federal Administration have not been realized.
Probably the reason for this is to be found in the fact that the Prime Minister selected his present colleagues very largely from the legal profession of the other States. The result is that in the administration of the affairs of government we get too much of legal technicalities and too little of common sense.
The result is that much friction has been caused throughout the Commonwealth by an incapacity on the part of Ministers to handle matters in a commonsense manner. Whilst I freely confess that I was in opposition to the Constitution
Bill, because I wished to see it more democratic in some respects, I think I have every reasonable ground for claiming that

I am as sincere a federalist as the men who fought for a conservative Constitution. I hope that federation will not be judged by the mismanagement of the first Federal Government. I join heartily with the mover of the address in reply in the hope that as time goes on those causes of friction will disappear, and that the great advantages to the whole of the people of Australia from this union will present themselves in so strong a light that dissatisfaction will be forgotten, and all will assist in upholding and supporting the federal movement. But it is a matter of great regret to every friend of the union that the Federal Government have made such a bad start. If even now the Government could see their way to clear themselves of the mere legal technicalities, red tape, and blue paper which, as it were, make the Federal Government stink in the nostrils of the average member of the public, they would serve the high purpose I have no doubt they have in view much better than they are doing at present. This weakness is seen right through the various departments, from that of the Prime Minister in the case of the half-dozen hatters, down to the administration of the Post and Telegraph department, and I am afraid that even the department of Defence is not altogether free from this irritating red-tapeism. As to the hatters, I wish to say that I supported the provision under which they were excluded, because I believed that a law of that character was necessary and desirable in the best interests of the people of Australia. And I am not prepared to go back on the stand I then took ; but it is most regrettable that the powers conferred by this provision were put into operation on this particular occasion. I admit that the papers which have been produced place a much more favorable light on the conduct of the Prime Minister than appeared when the question was exciting high feeling in the State of New South Wales. There was some substantial ground for the feeling of friction which was occasioned in that State. The Prime Minister in his reply seemed to wish to lead the House to suppose that the noise was caused by opponents of his Government, and of the principles of legislation of this character. But I remind the Prime Minister, that perhaps one of his strongest political friends in New South Wales is his late colleague, — Brown.

the present Premier of that State. That gentleman is not likely to lend himself to any expression of hostility towards the Federal Government on measures of this description, but he saw grave grounds for taking exception to the action of the Prime Minister. In the height of the disturbance, before the Prime Minister came to a decision, Sir John See telegraphed to him as follows :—

I sincerely hope your Government will see fit to release hatters on Orontes without further delay. Matter raising intense dissatisfaction here.

The following day Sir John See wired again—

Just received cable from Agent-General that action taken to prevent landing of British workmen seriously affects financial proposals of this State. Again strongly urge permission to land.

Mr. TUDOR.—Sir John See did not know all the facts of the case.

Mr. BROWN.—That was a request from the Premier of New South Wales, who is not in any way hostile to the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. Indeed, when the Prime Minister or any member of the Federal Cabinet addresses a meeting in Sydney the Premier of the mother State is able to join him on the platform and support the Government in matters of general policy. But he could not support them in the matter of the hatters. I am open to correction, but I am informed that Mr. Anderson also is a strong supporter of the present Government, and not likely in a matter of the kind to do anything to their detriment. Mr. Anderson spent something like £30,000 in Sydney in equipping a factory for the production of hats, and he was not likely to spend that sum of money for nothing. For his factory he required 72 skilled hands, and was prepared to give employment to about 200 or 300 other persons ; and, according to his own statement, he endeavoured to secure this skilled labour in the State of Victoria before he sought assistance from outside the Commonwealth. I find from a return prepared by the trades unions for the information of the Prime Minister, that in this trade there are 173 skilled hands in Victoria, twenty in South Australia, fifteen in New South Wales, and three in Western Australia, or a total of about 211 within the Commonwealth. Papers produced show conclusively that Mr. Anderson was not able to get anything like the number he wanted in Australia, and he decided to import hands. I understand the opposition which in quarters was shown to the importation men of this description. It meant of a new industry, and enlarging active powers of the Common-instead of making the conditions worse, it meant the opening up venues of employment. I have no with the cry that the population

Commonwealth should be kept down

Australia, but the possibilities

Mr. BROWN.—I have no doubt they were told something about the law in Melbourne.

Mr. TUDOR.—They were told before they left the old country.

Mr. BROWN. — This provision had never been exercised before. Mr. Anderson, according to his own statement, sought legal advice, and he was informed that the Act did not apply to men who were being brought out under the terms of his agreement. After considerable negotiation, after he had been put to the expense of journeying from Sydney to Melbourne to interview the Prime Minister, and after the Prime Minister had consulted a number of persons interested in the trade, it was discovered that the whole trouble was due to the fact that one of the blue paper forms of which the Federal Government is so fond had not been filled in. When Mr. Anderson was set on the right course, the Prime Minister discovered, as he wrote in his minute, that—

It is clear that Mr. Anderson cannot find his 72 men among the existing personnel of the Australian hat trade within the Commonwealth, and orders were issued to allow the men to be landed. Instead of being treated as they were, they should have been treated as the Sultan of Johore and the Maoris who came here were treated. It was most unwise to administer the law as it was administered. I am a friend of the Act, because I believe it to be a necessary one,

and I want to see its provisions carried into effect. But I say that it was unfortunate, in the interests of that legislation, that the incident happened. If the men had a right to come here, they should not have been placed in such an invidious position ; but, on the other hand, if they came out under conditions inimical to the public welfare, they should have been treated as undesirable immigrants, and not allowed to land. I believe that great damage has been done to the Commonwealth in the opinion of the old world by the action which was taken. I make that statement on the authority of the Premier of New South Wales, and of the Agent-General of that State, both of whom are personal friends and former colleagues of the Prime Minister, and would not say anything calculated to injure him unless they found it absolutely necessary to do so.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Let us adjourn now.

Mr. BROWN.—Shall I be allowed to continue my speech to-morrow?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—On this occasion I consent to the honorable member having leave to continue his speech to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that leave be granted to the honorable member to continue his speech to-morrow?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Debate (on motion by Mr. BROWN) adjourned.

Thursday, 4 June, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Senator FERGUSON presented a petition from the Brisbane Chamber of Commerce praying for the repeal of sub-section (g) of section 3 and of section 1 of the Immigration Restriction Act.

Petition received and read.

SENATOR SWORN.

Senator SAUNDERS made a statement and subscribed the oath and signed the roll.

COMMONWEALTH STATUTES.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I desire to know whether the members of this Parliament be supplied with bound copies of the Acts of last session, and if so, whether I also desire to know at what price copies of the Acts will be sold to the members.

Senator DRAKE.—The Government Printer states that only advance copies of the statutes for gratuitous distribution to Ministers, members of the Commonwealth Parliament, and heads of departments have been issued. The matter of issuing copies to the public is now in the hands of the Department of External Affairs for decision as to whether a charge to be made. The Government Printer has supplied that department with all necessary information as to cost of production, &c. The Department for External Affairs states that no decision has yet arrived at in the matter, pending the receipt of further information from the Government Printer, but it is hoped the matter will be determined within a week hence. Copies of all Commonwealth Acts printed and purchased at any State Government Printing office, at a cost of £1 6s. 7d. for a copy, are set.

PAPER.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table a Bill for Regulations under the Defence Act, 1903, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

PRESIDENT laid upon the table a report of the Standing Orders Committee on proceedings upon Bills which may not amend and on the appointment of a committee of disputed re-elections.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEES.

PRESIDENT reported the receipt of a letter from the House of Representatives maintaining the Senate that it had referred to its Printing Committee to report on the Printing Committee of the House and that its Library and House Committees had leave, under the Standing Orders, to confer with similar committees of the House.

PROTECTION OF PATENTS.

PULSFORD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Has any correspondence passed between the Government of the Colonies and the Commonwealth since the Colonial Congress held on the subject of the mutual protection of patents throughout the Empire? Is it the intention of the Government to have any correspondence on the table of the House?

DRAKE.—The answer to the senator's questions is as follows:

Communication has been received from the Government of the Colonies relating to the subject, which will, in due course, be laid upon the table of the Senate.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

PULSFORD asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

What was the aggregate amount paid during the year 1902 for the whole of the Government departments, telegraphic, telephonic, and postal?

What was the aggregate amount so paid what was the exact or approximate, debited as expenditure or credited as revenue to each State?

DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable senator's questions:

I regretted that the information asked was not available. The Post and Telegraph Department did not come into operation until the 1st of January, 1902. Prior to that date the practice of the State Acts and Regulations in the matter was very diverse, and in some of the cases payments were made for the services of the Post and Telegraph Department.

There is no information available to enable me to be replied to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Perhaps I may be permitted to ask the Postmaster-General whether, if the Address in Reply is adopted to-day, he will adjourn the consideration of Government business until next week, or whether he proposes to ask the Senate to sit to-morrow? I am quite sure that he will find great difficulty in getting a quorum to-morrow. It will be impossible to deal with the standing orders efficiently until we have an opportunity of reading them through. I went very carefully through the draft standing orders which were furnished to us last session and annotated them; but during the recess they have disappeared in a most curious way. I do not allege anything like petty larceny, because probably my annotated copy might have been regarded as of no use. But its loss is exceedingly inconvenient. We shall also have to consider the special report of the Standing Orders Committee which I have not yet seen. We shall require an opportunity of looking over it. A number of honorable senators are going away this afternoon, and very likely it will be impossible to form a House to-morrow. It is not worth while to bring us back unless there is some substantial reason for it. There is some private member's business on the paper to-day, and I should like to have my honorable and learned friend's view on that subject. It may be that some honorable senators will desire to take advantage of the opportunity of disposing of some of that business.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—In reply to inquiries from honorable senators, I have already mentioned that it is our intention to proceed with the standing orders as soon as the Address in Reply is disposed of. But of course I have no desire whatever to hasten the matter if it will be inconvenient to do so. I would, however, express the wish that if we do not this afternoon proceed with that business, the last report of the committee containing draft standing orders, and also, if possible, the special report submitted by the committee this afternoon, should be circulated among honorable senators, so that they may have an opportunity of reading them through, and preparing their minds beforehand.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is it intended to deal with the special report when we are dealing with the draft standing orders generally?

Senator DRAKE.—The proposal is to deal with the reports simultaneously, because I apprehend from conversations I have had with members of the Standing Orders Committee that the special report takes the form of an amendment upon the draft standing orders, which amendment has become necessary in consequence of legislation which has been enacted. I am in the hands of the Senate with regard to sitting to-morrow. Last Thursday I informed one honorable senator who has private business upon the paper that, if we did not sit last Friday, I would do nothing to prevent the formation of a House on Friday of this week. If honorable senators are disposed to sit to-morrow, I am prepared to sit and to go on with private members' business; but I should like to know, before to-day's sitting closes, whether there is likely to be a House to-morrow, because it would be unfair to a few honorable senators to ask them to wait here for the purpose of forming a House if it was evident that to-morrow there would not be sufficient members present to make a quorum.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then the honorable and learned senator will not take any Government business after the Address in Reply has been disposed of?

Senator DRAKE.—I will take nothing before the standing orders.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable and learned senator take them directly after the Address in Reply has been dealt with?

Senator DRAKE.—Not if there is a desire not to go on with them, but I should be quite willing to speak on the subject. I do not wish to speak at any great length. I have no desire to go on with Government business if the leader of the Opposition assures me that he is not prepared to proceed. There is no such pressure upon our time at the present period of the session as would justify us in hastening in such a way as would probably tend to prolong our debates eventually.

Debate resumed from 3rd June (vide page 442), on motion by Senator Sir JOHN DOWNER—

That the Address in Reply be adopted.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—A number of honorable senators to the length to which this debate has extended, have thought it necessary to apologize for doing what, to my mind, is their simple duty. It is the duty of every honorable senator, if he has any business to express in connexion with the Government that are to be presented to the Governor or if he has views to make known in connexion with the administration of the Government already in existence, to take the opportunity when it arises. It will be recognized that the debate on the Address in Reply affords one of those opportunities which honorable senators ought to avail themselves of. It would have been a great advantage to the community if Senator Pulsford had had an opportunity of bringing forward many grievances under which his constituents were labouring. I am sure that it would have been a calamity if he had not done so. Neild—I beg his pardon, Senator General Neild—

Senator BARRETT.—Lieutenant-General

Senator MCGREGOR.—It does not seem to me, matter in military affairs, that it is a great pity to see a man spend so much time how high you go above the rank of an officer; he is not a soldier. Probably if I were to say Senator Major J. C. Neild there might be some offence, but to my mind Sergeant Neild sounds just as fierce, and in the public opinion is of as much importance as Major Neild.

Senator DOBSON.—It is a very courteous.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We, in the past, were never favoured by the press. The Hansard staff by having our titles printed before our names, and consequently we have the right to feel aggrieved. I was saying that it would have been a calamity if the honorable senator to whom I have referred had not had the opportunity afforded to me to debate such as this of bringing forward matters in connexion with the administration of the Commonwealth. It is a duty to be congratulated upon the fact that which he has dealt with some of the grievances. He has my sympathy, and the sympathy of a number of other honorable senators, in connexion with some of the points he mentioned. It is the duty of every honorable senator to state the kind of legislation that he considers most suited to the conditions of the country which the people of Australia are living in, although in the opinion of some of this kind leads to the waste of time. What did the Australian—now the Australian States—federation. They must have had some reason must have been some inducement to the people to come together in a union. By listening patiently to the arguments of the honorable senators who have already spoken, and to all the States, I have come to the conclusion that each State expected something. I interjected when Senator Playford was speaking last night that they wanted to get half-a-crown in for two shillings, and were led to believe that they could do so. I know that the advocates of the Constitution which we are living to-day told them that they were eventually to gain in all directions, and that it was to the benefit of the isolated colonies to become part of this great Commonwealth. Let me say what the different States expected. They all expected something except the isolated State of South Australia—and I have not heard any one make any claim for half up to the present time.

Mr. PEARCE.—South Australia has been left out of it up to date though.

Mr. MCGREGOR.—That is because the arguments are judicious and favoured with success. I will begin with the island of Tasmania. What has she expected to get? That I have heard her whole difficulty of communication and steamship communication conjointly. Tasmania wants a telegraph service, and a more up-to-date mail service. What surprises me is the attitude of some of the Tasmanian senators, notably Senator Dobson and Senator Macfarlane. Those gentlemen, I believe, are always advocating enterprise. But they have had no enterprise in Tasmania, as far as telecommunication with the mainland is concerned, and they do not seem very well satisfied. They would not go in for a little of that abominable thing to their minds—State socialism. At the very commencement of the last century up to this very day, some representatives of the moral State of Tasmania have been arguing about cable communication, a position which that State occupies to the other States. I hope that the representatives of other States are not going to support the Tasmanians in getting the item of State socialism, they will give some little consideration to the requirements of the rest of Australia. Tasmania wants a cheap State-owned cable service, and a cheap, regular mail service. Her representatives do not care whether they are State or privately owned, but they want them. And I hope that these honorable senators will get those conveniences, and so far as I am able I will do everything in my power to help them. Then it is amusing to find that the representatives of Western Australia in another place, and in this Senate, have been labouring the question of a transcontinental railway, and they are quite justified in asking for the line, to gain which was one of the objects their State had in joining the Commonwealth. According to the documents which have been read in this and another place, those representatives have a right to expect some sympathy from the representatives of other States, who also in return expect something. Senator Styles attacked this simple request of the Western Australian representatives, and Senator Playford, although not in such a virulent manner, tried to throw cold water on the scheme as, I believe, other representatives of South Australia were prepared to do. These representatives of South Australia seem to be provincial and parochial when the little corner of God's earth in which their particular interests happen to lie would, in their opinion, be adversely affected. That is not in consonance with the grand federal spirit or the great Imperial spirit we hear of sometimes. Senator Styles told us that this is not a transcontinental railway, because it does not go from sea to sea. But there is a sea to the west of Australia as well as to the north, and a sea to the east as well as to the south. Do honorable senators lose sight of the fact that this railway, which is bound to come, will some day or other extend from Sydney to Fremantle—from ocean to ocean. If, after the arguments which have been deduced by the representatives of Western Australia, we decline to comply with their wishes, they will have good reason for blocking the desires of the representatives of other States.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable senator appears to want to do a bit of log-rolling.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Senator Playford probably knows a lot more about log-rolling than I am ever likely to learn in all my lifetime. I do not suggest for one moment that Senator Playford will be guilty of log-rolling, which is unfair; but we are here representing the interests of the different States, and we have as much right to consider the just claims of any State as we have to consider the claims of the States to which we ourselves belong. So far as the people of South Australia are concerned, railway connexion with Western Australia would be a great advantage. It would be an advantage to a section of the people in South Australia, in whom Senator Playford and other representatives of that State have always taken especial interest; it would be a great advantage to the producing classes, by whom I mean only those immediately connected with farming, grazing, and gardening. It costs, I believe, a very considerable amount of money to send produce from South Australia to Western Australia. We must have regard to the difficulty there is in getting produce from Petersburg, Jamestown, or any of these partially central places to Adelaide, and thence shipping it to Fremantle, where it has to be unshipped and conveyed by rail to the eastern gold-fields of Western Australia. Who has to pay the expense of that transit? Has it not to be borne by the producer and the consumer. It would be a good thing if this expense could be decreased in any way by the construction of a railway, that would prove of immense advantage to the poor miners, of whom we have heard so much, and who have been described to us as going about with tins of condensed milk hanging about their necks. To these miners it would be of great advantage to get from South Australia good beef and mutton, bran, chaff, and other products, and there would be a corresponding benefit to the producers of that State. Certain representatives have endeavoured to influence the minds of the people of Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and Tasmania on the question of the construction of a line from South Australia to Kalgoorlie. But what would be said if we were to so misrepresent the position that the eastern States turned entirely against the project? In such case Western Australia and South Australia would undoubtedly be the greatest sufferers. It is said, for the purpose of frightening the people of the eastern States, that the country on the route of the line is almost a waterless waste.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Those who say so know nothing about the matter.

Senator McGregor.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not know much about the country on the Western Australian side; and, of course, they are ardently in favour of the line, and they can to paint the brightest picture they do know, however, a good deal about the country on the South Australian side. I agree with Senator Playford that the project were considered merely from an agricultural or pastoral point of view, there would be very little hope of it being carried out. But every one who knows the continent of Australia must recognize that the people who make their homes in the interior never look to the central portions as a Garden of Eden. The Governments of the different States are constantly pointing out to the public in other parts of the world that we have rich mineral resources; and it is to these resources in the interior of Australia that we have looked for future development. It is, therefore, scarcely necessary to regard the connection between Port Augusta and Eucla as a farming or pastoral point of view. We must, however, look at the mineral resources. Senator Playford knows that at Gungahlin, which is nearly 100 miles from Port Augusta in a direct line, vast mineral deposits have been discovered, that only a slight deviation would be necessary in order to take the proposed line through this part of the country. At Gungahlin there are millions of tons of copper at the surface, and although it may be of a low grade, the ease with which it can be secured gives that district an immense advantage over other districts where mining is necessary. It can be seen that all that is necessary to make Gungahlin a prosperous copper-mining district is railway communication. I visit this place in company with other members of Parliament, and, even with no knowledge of mining, I can say that there are millions of tons of ore there which can be obtained without sinking more than 7 feet. With these facts before us, we can see that such a country is worth more than acres even of the fairly well grassed land which we have been told is found on the Western Australian side of the border. Again, 280 miles from Port Augusta, on the same line, there have been discovered what would undoubtedly prove to be gold-mines if there were only proper means of communication in order that the necessary and means of livelihood could be secured.

and cheaply conveyed. It is to sources that we must look for a pro- turn from a railway, and in the cir- cles there is no use whatever in asking the question from a pastoral or point of view. It would not matter any way went through the Desert of so long as it went in the direction of this description, which must be proved profitable. Senator Playford is very well that the Act authorizing the construction of the Broken Hill line was long before Silverton or Broken Hill was discovered.

MR. PLAYFORD.—No; Thackaringa was discovered before.

MR. MCGREGOR.—Thackaringa is near Broken Hill.

MR. PLAYFORD.—It is part of the same line.

MR. MCGREGOR.—Senator Playford says that this line was originally constructed for the purpose of bringing stock from the western parts of New South

MR. PLAYFORD.—That was the principal reason.

MR. MCGREGOR.—There was no question of mining development raised at first; but the line was not half finished when only silver and lead, but gold and other minerals were discovered in all directions. These discoveries would have been possible but for the construction of the railway. Having regard to what has happened in the past, there is ample justification for assisting the Western Australian Colonies in obtaining the little benefit they would reap from the construction of this transcontinental railway.

MR. PLAYFORD.—If that be so, why does the State construct lines to Mount Isa and Tarcoola?

MR. MCGREGOR.—The State should have done so. If it had had enterprise and foresight these lines would have been constructed many years ago. But it is hardly possible for South Australia at the present time, when the Government are so burdened, to get even a telegraph line to the most important places of that description.

MR. PLAYFORD.—They have got it.

MR. MCGREGOR.—They have got it only after a great deal of difficulty. The Western Australian representatives put their case very well, and, as a result, that it will be of benefit to South Australia, if any proposal is made to carry out a survey in connexion with that line, I shall certainly support it. A few have taken alarm, and I know that the feeling is encouraged in South Australia by short-sighted persons. There are people who imagine that if we construct a line from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, in a very short time New South Wales will connect Broken Hill with existing lines in that State; and instead of passengers and mails for Sydney coming through Adelaide, as at present, they will be taken across the continent by the transcontinental line described by Senator Styles—the line from the east to the west. But is such a thing likely to injure Adelaide or South Australia to the extent that some people imagine? Do honorable senators think that when the South Australian Government make reasonable provision for the accommodation of vessels, plying from other parts of the world and of Australia, to land their passengers and goods at Adelaide, trade will not go there? Do honorable senators not think that South Australia will always claim her fair share of the traffic; and is it not clear that if a few tons of mails and a few passengers are taken across the continent in the way to which I have alluded it will be a matter of very small importance to that State? Again, I say it is a reasonable thing that we should do all we possibly can to assist Western Australia. Up to the present time every one of the States of the Commonwealth, with the exception of the model State, has made some claim upon the Federal Government. Now what does Queensland want? Queensland did not come into the Commonwealth without expecting to benefit in some way or other.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—She wanted white-washing.

Senator MCGREGOR.—As Senator Staniforth Smith says, she wanted white-washing, because she was terribly piebald previously. But what evidence have we here that Queensland was in earnest in connexion with this question? We have the evidence of her representatives in another place and of her representatives here, that the electors who returned them to advocate a white Australia in the Federal Parliament comprised a vast majority of the people of Queensland.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—They will be returned again.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes, I hope they will. At the present, time, however, the State selfishness to which I have already alluded comes in again. We now hear the Treasurers in some of the other States complaining that there is a movement on foot to compel them to contribute a small amount towards the maintenance of this white Australia. Senator Playford is one who has very mildly objected to it, because after all the honorable senator is a fair-minded man, and he recognises that Queensland had reasons for coming into the Commonwealth, and that these were her reasons. So far as I can understand up to the present time, the whole difficulty is about the rebate granted to persons employing white labour in the growth of sugar cane, and the amount involved is something like £60,000. I saw the Treasurer of South Australia the other day, and he was like a bear with a sore head. He was in such a condition that he declared he was not going to look at a Federal Minister. Senator Symon is evidently imbued with a very similar spirit. The honorable and learned senator declared here that the people of South Australia were up in arms against the proposal. I have travelled a little in South Australia, and though I have met a number of the people of that State, yet, with the exception of the Treasurer, I have not heard a solitary individual in South Australia complain about it. What does it mean? So far as South Australia is concerned, the position will be this: The amount taken from the South Australian Treasurer will be about £5,500 a year.

Senator PULSFORD.—It may be £20,000 next year.

Senator MCGREGOR.—When it is £20,000 in the case of South Australia the population of that State will be so large that she will be very well able to afford it.

Senator PULSFORD.—No; it might be that with the present population.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not know whether Senator Pulsford has studied the matter for himself, but I desire to put the position fairly. I have said the amount will be £5,500. Without an exception the candidates for the Federal Parliament, when before the people of South Australia, declared themselves in favour of a white Australia. I with others did the same, and I was careful to point out that if the people of that State had to pay a little more in the way of Customs duties levied on sugar for the purpose of obtaining a white Australia, they would have no reason to grumble. I said unanimously, "Hear, hear. You be prepared to do it." But the Treasurer of that State is not prepared to do it. I wish to show the position in which the gentleman is. He is only going to lose but what does he gain? Prior to the duty on sugar in South Australia was £3 per ton. Wisely, I think, the duty raised by the Commonwealth Parliament was £6 per ton. The quantity of sugar in South Australia in 1901 was 16,000 tons, and in 1902 16,700 tons. Senator Pulsford may say that a lot of the sugar is Australian grown sugar, but according to the returns from the Customs department find that there was only about 10,000 tons—they calculate it in cwt. in South Australia, and I have reduced the duty to 500 tons. So that the honorable senators will see that there is a saving of only 200 tons in the duty cleared for consumption in those two States. We shall, therefore, in making the calculation be safe in fixing the amount at 16,000 tons. Sixteen thousand tons per ton comes to £48,000—Senator Pulsford will correct me if I make any mistake—and 16,000 tons at £6 to £96,000.

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes, but the total taxation on sugar.

Senator MCGREGOR.—If the honorable senator will listen he will find that that is what I am talking about. Previously the South Australian Treasurer was charged duty to the amount of £48,000. The Commonwealth Treasurer is receiving duty £96,000 from the same article. The people of South Australia, when they came to this Parliament, said that they were willing to sacrifice something for the benefit of Australia, but they have sacrificed nothing so far, because sugar is as cheap in Australia to-day as it was in 1899.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In spite of that it is exactly the same price.

Senator PULSFORD.—Sugar is cheap all over the world over, and the people are getting it for so many pounds a ton if it were not for the duty.

Senator MCGREGOR.—There is as much sense in that observation as there was in the yarn about little Jack which the honorable senator took so much trouble to repeat and the author of it forgot.

tor PULSFORD.—When the price of has fallen £3 and the duty has been £3 the original position is unaltered.

tor MCGREGOR.—According to the tion the Commonwealth returns urchs of the duty collected, and if any surplus afterwards it returns more. Senator Pulsford will not hat.

tor PEARCE.—It returns about seven-tor MCGREGOR.—I propose to leave le more out of the calculation alto- and to deal only with what the Con- n provides for, so that no mistake seur in the future. Four into 0 gives £24,000, and three times 0 amounts to £72,000. South Aus- then gets back 472,000 in Customs pon sugar, and deducting the pre- ture from the duty, £18,000, from 0, we find that State is still left profit of £24,000. Out of that she e to pay £5,500 in connexion with tes, and therefore, instead of the Australian Treasurer losing, he is o gain £18,500 and he has got a d about it.

or PULSFORD.—The honorable sena- got hold of a mare's nest.

or PLAYFORD.—The honorable sena- ld recollect that we have lost the or MCGREGOR.—Yes, I know great many people are sorry he tea tax, but is it not a fact he South Australian Treasurer n receiving as much from the Government as the State levied previously? In some instances he more, and in this instance he is go- receive more, because I notice in this e's paper that Sir George Turner has d poverty stricken Victoria that she to get nearly £200,000 more than ected. The position then is that Australia makes a profit on the trans- onected with the granting of a Australia, and the people of that e not asked to pay any more for the . I say, therefore, that South Aus- as nothing to complain about, and ht to be well satisfied that she is put Queensland into such a good . I have not lost sight of Senator e's argument—a nice little argument and very logical, too—that in the past the South Australian people did all they possibly could to keep South Australia white. She almost made a sacrifice to do it. Queensland never did anything of the kind. The Government of that State allowed this coloured curse to take firm root, and drastic measures had to be adopted to eradicate it. When the other States entered into a partnership with Queensland, were not the people aware of that fact? They were aware of all the conditions, and if not, they should have been. I should like to put the position in this way to Senator Playford: Supposing that when he was a young man he had married a young lady with a wooden leg, knowing all the circumstances, would it not have been very mean on his part, after a couple of years, to have called her "timber-toes"? I think she would have been quite justified in saying that a wooden leg was as good as a wooden head. South Australia and the other States have no right to complain now.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was never intended that any State but Queensland should pay this rebate.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It was always intended that it should be borne by the States.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Government charged it to Queensland.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We all know, and I believe that my honorable friend knows, that that was a mistake. The people of all Australia were firmly convinced that they would have to make some slight sacrifice to obtain a white Australia. They were prepared to make that sacrifice. They never asked Queensland or New South Wales to bear all the burden, and they are not going to do so. They have all benefited by the adoption of a white Australia policy, and although Queensland might have been spotted like the leopard before, I hope that her union with the other States will make her as white as the proverbial snow in the near future. I think I have shown conclusively that South Australia is not going to lose. The financial position of that and the other States has not only been maintained, but in some cases it has been improved to a very great extent. New South Wales will get more than even will South Australia; consequently I hope that we shall hear no more complaint from the States Treasurers, or from the narrow-minded, provincial, unfederal, unimperial representatives who come from States of that description ; I mean the little Australians. Why did New South Wales enter the union ? According to Senator Pulsford, the people of New South Wales were much more prosperous and happy in the days when the kangaroo was running over the silent bush ; when the convicts were rattling their chains near Botany, than they are in the civilised combination with their fellow British subjects. They are in a prouder and better position to-day. What terms did they want to enter the union ? In the first instance New South Wales was so unfederal as to refuse to enter the union. There was something that the tricky politicians made her believe she wanted. The Constitution provides that New South Wales shall possess the federal capital. She is not to get all she wanted. She wanted to have the federal capital in Sydney, but the members of the Convention were not prepared to consent to that. It was not clean enough round about Sussex-street, and there were too many rats in the harbor, and too much waste paper about the streets. In a general sense everything was not up to date ; consequently the Convention considered it would be much more healthy to have the capital in some other place. At the first referendum New South Wales would not consent to come into the Federation. The Premiers of the colonies met and decided to give New South Wales all the honour and glory ; to fix the capital in the State at some place not less than 100 miles from Sydney. It should be pretty healthy when it is so far removed from Sydney. It was decided to take another vote of the people of Australia. Previously we were all agreeable to federate. When this little sop of the federal capital was thrown to New South Wales, her politicians, who had opposed the Bill previously, turned round in their usual manner, and drove the other way ; and her people voted to enter the union. According to the Constitution, the capital of the Commonwealth is to be in New South Wales. The question with me is—Are the representatives of other States going to make a fair deal with New South Wales ? Are they going to carry out the contract which was made by the whole people of Australia, and as soon as possible give New South Wales the satisfaction of having the capital in her own territory ? The representatives of some States are in no hurry to select the site. Senator Styles care if it is not chosen within 100 miles, whilst Senator Dobson, in that "wobbly" style which is usually followed by a great many persons when they get into Parliament, would favour alternate use of Melbourne and Sydney. I do not think that any hon. member who considers the claim of New South Wales under the Constitution should endeavour to delay the selection of the site.

Senator PEARCE.—Or even to make an alteration in the Constitution.

Senator MCGREGOR.—To my mind it would be a breach of the covenant made with the people of New South Wales if an alteration were made to alter the Constitution in that respect. Then we have the objection of the economist. We all believe in economy. We all believe in economy as much as we can get ; I dare say I have had that said of me as much as any one has had, and I am not prepared under any circumstances to sacrifice the interests of the Commonwealth to please New South Wales, Victoria or any other State. Is the Government going to cost all the millions that we hear about ? Did Sydney or Melbourne cost an enormous sum to the Commonwealth ? The Government of the State in which we are situated ? The people of Victoria, the Parliament House and other public buildings at enormous expense. But Sydney and mighty as the Commonwealth Government might like to be, I think that some much more utilitarian and less extravagant building than the Melbourne Parliament House would suit all its needs. As regards Government offices, I think that the federal capital could do with buildings much more modest than those we see in Melbourne. I am sure that a expenditure of £300,000 or £400,000 would provide all the accommodation we really necessary in the near future. Are the millions of pounds going to be spent ? For the sake of illustration, let us take a site and see what it would cost the Commonwealth to provide the necessary accommodation. According to some persons, the most expensive site—I am going to say whether it is the most suitable one or not—is on the Snowy River. Age, Argus, Sydney Morning Herald and other great organs, state that it would cost the Commonwealth millions of pounds to build the capital there. It would

to be connected with Melbourne by a railway, and it would cost £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 to build a line 150 or 200 miles long. Then a railway would have to be made from Cooma, in New South Wales, for a distance of 60 or 70 miles, and that would cost £300,000, £400,000, or £500,000. All this expenditure is charged to the cost of the capital. It has nothing to do with the cost of the capital. It would not be necessary to make a railway to connect the capital with Melbourne. If the people of Victoria had any interest in federal affairs, I believe they would, if there was a new settlement established at any place, run a race with New South Wales to be the first to get communication with it. The Parliament of New South Wales has already authorized the construction of lines of railway in the direction indicated. These lines would be built in the future even though there never was a federal capital in the locality. I hope they will be made soon, because some of the country they will serve is well worthy of development. I agree with Senator Playford that it will be a very unwise thing to choose the capital, and to have people living there under canvas, or in weatherboard buildings, or "dug-outs." That sort of accommodation would not be good enough for me, at any rate. Rather than go in for a work of that description, it would be better to wait till we could afford something respectable, though it need not cost millions of money. But the federal city, when built, would not be entirely put up by the Government. The probability is that if the city grew a corporate body would be created. People would put up buildings for themselves and the corporate body would see to the streets and tax the people for that purpose. It is all nonsense to talk of the Commonwealth having to spend millions of money. The only direction in which such an expenditure would be necessary would be in the acquisition of the land. Legislation that is already in existence, makes it impossible for any great amount of trickery to be played with the Federal Government in that respect. All the Crown land in the federal area, according to the agreement entered into by the New South Wales people with the people of the rest of the States, is to be handed over to the Commonwealth, and the privately-owned land has to be purchased, not at a value created after the capital is selected, or by the railways which are to be built, but at a value prior to anything of this kind taking place. If the Federal Government had to purchase every inch of the land under such terms, and that land was suitable—I would not recommend them to go anywhere where the land was not suitable—the result would be that before the capital was half the age of Melbourne it would be one of the wealthiest cities in Australia. Those who talk of the enormous amount of money that is to be spent before anything is done in the construction of the capital, have not given the subject serious consideration.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am trying to combat the hostility that has been exhibited towards the just carrying out of the contract that was made between the different States and the State of New South Wales, when they entered into federation. I do not think that Senator Zeal would be justified in calling some of the arguments of Senator Styles and other Victorian senators mere shadows. They are much more substantial than many arguments which I have heard coming from those who have had as long a Parliamentary experience as Senator Zeal himself. What I want is fair play in the carrying out of the contract which has been made, and the sooner it is carried out the better it will be for the peace of the Commonwealth and the prosperity of the people, both of Victoria and New South Wales. Victoria did not enter into this contract without taking everything into consideration. She was in a great hurry about it. Her people voted to a far greater extent in favour of federation than did the people of any of the other States. Why was Victoria in such unbecoming haste to enter this federal combination? I can only see one reason. I am a protectionist, but I hope that I have always fought fair in that direction. Victoria was the most highly protected portion of Australia, and her manufactures and industries were established. Her great manufacturers in the Chamber of Manufactures, and her merchants in the Chamber of Commerce, were those who were in the greatest hurry about federation. They made use of the public press, and they managed to get up an agitation, with the result that the people of Victoria, to the extent of three or four to one, voted in favour of federation. They entered into it with the expectation that as soon as Inter-State free-trade came about they would reap enormous benefits.

I hope that those Victorian manufacturers who are worthy of any consideration, and that the Victorian industrial classes, will in future—when Australia regains the equilibrium which she has lost during the depressing period of drought—reap all the benefits that they expected from federation. But they should not be selfish. They have got what they wanted, Inter-State free-trade. They may not have a tariff as high as they had previous to federation, but it is half as high, and the population they now have to cater for is four times greater. Consequently, although they have not received all that they expected, they have received twice as much as they have lost in the way of protection. Therefore, I trust that the Victorian people will deal less selfishly with the little foibles of the other States who came into the Commonwealth for the purpose of gaining something by it. Some of the people who were in such a hurry for federation some time ago say now, when one meets them in the train or the tramcar, that if they had known what was going to happen they would not have been so eager about it. They say—"If I had to vote again I would give my vote in the opposite direction." It is a positive fact that I have heard working men making statements of the same description. They have been led away. There were led away in the first instance in being in such a hurry, and they are now being led in the opposite direction. I would say to the working classes and the general public, not only in Victoria, but in the rest of Australia also, that they have entered into this combination and must abide by it. Whether they have married in haste and are repenting at leisure, I will not say; but it is their duty to do all they possibly can to make the union prosperous in the future, and happy for all the people who are affected by it. They can do this by paying attention to their interests, and by sending into the Federal Parliament men who have the best interests of the Commonwealth at heart. I have said that no one has brought forward any scheme in the interests of the State to which I belong, South Australia. We also joined the federal compact in a hurry. We were led to believe—at least some of us were; I was not—that we should save an enormous amount of money in connexion with the transferred services and by the consolidation of our debts. Every one likes to get rid of his debts! People are like the young lady when she owed £5. She signed a cheque and sent it along to pay the bill; and though she had no money in the bank, she said "Thank God the thing is settled." Senator Playford's experience has taught him a lesson which he endeavoured to impart to us last night. He showed us that the promises of those statesmen who were so eager for federation—for what purpose I can scarcely understand, though some honorable senators may have an idea—and who told the people that we were going to save this and that by the consolidation of our debts, were fallacious. Senator Playford showed what must really happen, and what every reasonable man must admit to be absolutely correct. If I borrowed £1,000, at 8 per cent. interest, and I tried to convert that loan into a 4 per cent. loan, I should have to give my creditor £2,000. What better off should I be then? I should be paying just the same amount per annum. And that is all that the Federal Government will be able to do in connexion with the consolidation of the debts of the States. But when the currency of the loans expires, I think that it is the duty of the Federal Government to do all that they can to take over the State debts. I know that there are difficulties, but they can be overcome if the people desire it, and the Commonwealth Government is ready to assist them. In the near future a Victorian loan to the amount of £5,000,000 will become due. It would be a matter of very great difficulty for Victoria to renew that loan on anything like reasonable terms on the English market. If anything better can be done by the Federal Parliament it is their duty to do it in the interests of the people of Victoria. Whenever a debt of any one of the States becomes due, it is the duty of the Commonwealth Government to step in and take over that debt, and to go into the market afterwards for the purpose of renewal. But as Senator Playford said, this will have to be done gradually, and we shall find out then whether the Commonwealth or the States can best manage financial affairs. I have not the slightest doubt as to what must happen, and I am sure that other honorable senators will agree that in the future the credit, and, therefore, the power to borrow, of the Commonwealth will stand highest. We have a right to expect that the credit of the Commonwealth will be used in the s of the whole people. It is said that the Commonwealth may have to take over a millions from one State and a debt of hundreds of thousands of pounds from another State. What difference does that make so far as the Commonwealth is concerned? If the Commonwealth were to take over debts amounting to £5,000,000 from Victoria and makes the best possible arrangement for that State, will not the Commonwealth be paid out of the portion of the revenue derived from the Customs returns of that State? If the Commonwealth take over £100,000 on behalf of Tasmania and make the best terms possible for that State, will not the interest be payable out of the revenue returnable to Tasmania? I may have had an opportunity of making great financial undertakings. I have never had an opportunity of making my name to a cheque for a million pounds, but I do not see the least difficulty in finding out what I am now suggesting. The danger has already been pointed out that the States be relieved of their liabilities they will rush into others. That has to be guarded against, and guarded against, by providing that future borrowings for State purposes be done through the Commonwealth. In any way the Commonwealth would get consolidated State borrowings, which would only be when it was conclusively shown to be in the interests of the States. Unless States are prepared to enter into an undertaking of this description, any consolidation of the debts will be delayed for a longer period than will be to the benefit of the whole people. There is other legislation proposed in the speech of His Excellency the Governor-General, but I do not think there is any great necessity for dealing with any length. We have heard a great deal about the establishment of a High Court. Along with others, was opposed to any such a High Court such as is indicated in the proposed legislation of the Government. I considered that the Chief Justices of the States, vested with federal powers, would be quite sufficient, for some time, to do the duties. But I have come to a conclusion, after two years' experience, that it is not the correct view—that the policy is that the States and the Commonwealth will be continually getting at each other's heads—and I am now convinced that the thing the Federal Parliament can do most speedily as possible to establish a

High Court. I do not say whether the court should be composed of three or five Judges—I make no suggestion as to how it should be composed. I shall suspend my judgment until the Government put their proposals before the House and give their reasons. If those reasons are good, then I hope that I and those generally associated with me will take a reasonable view, and do what is best in the interests of the community. I hope, with Senator Playford, that we shall always be found acting in the interests of economy. We have no desire to be mean, nor yet extravagant. We wish to pay those who do the Commonwealth work adequate, but not extravagant, salaries. I am sure that in the hands of the Senate and the House of Representatives, as at present constituted, a question of this kind will be safe. There are other measures to be presented, including a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, which will have my hearty support. I am not like Senator Pulsford, who says that he has no sympathy with compulsion of any kind, and yet in the same breath expresses his willingness to pass legislation compelling employers to confer with their men. If Senator Pulsford goes that far, probably, when he hears all the arguments, he may be prepared to go the length of compulsory arbitration. Many of the other Bills in the Government programme are merely of a machinery character, and I am sure they will be discussed with intelligence and have as much attention paid to them as was paid to similar Bills during last session. But, like other honorable senators, I would like to say a word or two in connexion with the administration of the legislation already passed, and my best course is, I think, to deal first with the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act. It has been said, in connexion with that Act, that the labour party have always been satisfied with the Government administration. I do not think the labour party have ever said anything to justify that view, nor do I think we have any right to be satisfied with the administration of the Act. Sub-section (g) of section 3 distinctly stipulates that any one landing here to perform services under contract shall, unless certain conditions are observed, be deemed a prohibited immigrant. A great storm has been raised by some federal enthusiasts and great Imperialists about the treatment of the six haters. These hatters were regarded in somewhat the same light as the poor producer, and the poor farmer—they were a persecuted lot. I can assure honorable senators that a great deal has been said in connexion with this question, which has gone to the extent of vile misrepresentation. Even in the Senate it has been suggested that these hatters were waylaid in Victoria and almost robbed of their agreement. Nothing of the kind ever happened. These hatters were not the first persons brought into Australia under agreement—they were somewhat like the defaulters in connexion with the Customs prosecutions, in that they were the first discovered. On a previous occasion six men and five women were brought into Australia in violation of the Act, and those who were interested thought it time something should be done. The Immigration Restriction Act was deliberately passed by this Parliament. Even honorable senators who have expressed themselves as surprised at what has happened, never raised their voice against this sub-section. These hatters came to Victoria on their way to New South Wales, and were met by the executive of the Hatters' Union, and by another gentleman who was associated with a hat factory in Collingwood or Carlton. Instead of going to the Trades Hall with those men who are now accused of robbing and plundering, the hatters went to the other place, and were fêted with bread and cheese, and very probably something stronger than water. As a matter of fact, although they had to meet the executive of the Hatters' Union at three o'clock in the afternoon, the members of the executive never saw them until a quarter to twelve at night, when they were about to depart from Flinders-street for Port Melbourne. It was then that one of the hatters was asked if he had any objection to furnish a copy of the agreement, and he replied—"Here it is; you can take it and do what you like with it." The person to whom the agreement was handed said that he would send it over to Sydney, and that was done. Was that person not quite justified, in his own protection as a member of the Hatters' Union, in doing what he did? These men were coming into this country against the law, and it does not matter whether Senator Pulsford, Senator Symon, or anybody else, likes or dislikes that law after they assisted in passing it. That these men did not come to this country in ignorance is shown by the facts. This Act was passed before the Christmas recess of 1901, and we sympathized with it were jubilant at its success. In the May following a communication was sent to the Hatters' Union of England, and it was published in the newspapers of the hatter-facturing districts of the old country. Every one of the men who came out there that they were doing wrong, and some of them stated that they had taken the law. It has been said that these men were not paid the same wages as Australian hatters, and that may be granted; but they were not employed under the same conditions. There was not a word in the agreement as to the hours of work, or as to the pay for overtime. When these men were blocked at Sydney, they knew the reason why. They knew an offence had been committed, and, therefore, had nothing to complain of. It is not the hatters who complained.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was the Hatters' Federation.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And also the Chambers of Manufacture, Chamber of Commerce, and the Stock Exchange, members of which have very little sympathy with manual labour in any part of the world. Undoubtedly these English hatters were unionists, but some people, who do not know the difference between a non-unionist and a unionist, wrote to the newspapers and gave the public an exaggerated idea of what had taken place. It has been pointed out by Senator Pearce that the violation of this description is in force in the British Dominion of Canada, from which men have been sent away for violation of a similar provision. It has also been said that similar cases have arisen, are arising, and will probably continue to arise for many years to come in the United States. A good deal has been said about the treatment of British subjects, but honorable senators must bear in mind that these men were never blocked, because they came ashore and had refreshments almost every day. They were almost as free as any other people, but they were like other people—they had not been cleared of customs goods—they had not been cleared, and the entry for them had not been passed. That is where the difficulty was. The individual who brought them here knew very well that he was violating the Act. He knew also that the Act not apply in certain circumstances, and when the men were blocked, he got them admitted under the proviso that they had special skill required in the Commonwealth. The declaration that they had special skill was not applicable to four out of the first six and to three out of the second six. The man who declared that they only knew of the fact by personal experience in the case of seven out of the twelve, yet he made the declaration as applicable to them all. Do not honorable senators think that if this had been done in the department of the Minister for Trade and Customs there would have been some bother about a false entry? I think there would, and consequently members of the labour party have no reason to be satisfied with the administration which allowed those men to come in on the flimsy pretext that they were skilled men, when they were no more skilled than hundreds of men already in Australia. If they had any desire to become honest citizens of Australia they should come here to remain, as other people have come before them, and are coming now, under no agreement. Senator Pulsford takes very great credit to himself for the action he took at the time. The honorable senator has said—"If an amendment I moved had been accepted, it would have done away with all the difficulty." Certainly it would have done away with all the difficulty, but it would have left the workers in Australia in a much worse position than they are now in under the Act. The honorable senator's proposed amendment was intended to permit of the introduction of men who under their agreements were to be paid the wages at the time ruling in Australia. But does the honorable senator think that a protection against the operations of unprincipled individuals, whose only object is to make money, and who will make it at the sacrifice of the interests of every one else in the community? I know that men have been brought to South Australia under similar agreements to be paid the same wages as were ruling in the State, but it was done for no other purpose than to reduce the standard rate of wages ruling in the State at the time. I know that in 1884 some 24 bootmakers were brought to Victoria from Northamptonshire in England. I have become acquainted with many of those men since. They were to be paid the current rate of wages, and there was no Immigration Restriction Act in force. As many as liked could come out under these agreements. What was the result? The effect of bringing out these 24 bootmakers to a market that was just level was, in less than twelve months, to bring about a reduction of 30 per cent. in the wages being paid in the State. Any one with any sense must know how it would operate—these 24 coming out to a level market made a surplus of 24. They displaced 24 who were here already, or they kept 24 here already out of work. The result was that there were 24 men looking for work, and if they were out of work for any length of time, and had families to support, they were probably prepared to come to terms with the employers and to do the work for a little less next year. Then the 24 new men were dropped out when their agreements expired. Some of them went to Tasmania, and some to South Australia. But the desired effect took place, and wages in the boot trade were lowered by degrees in Victoria, and men suffered greatly. I am sure some honorable senators will recollect, and Senator Zeal will recollect, that ultimately it resulted in the appointment of a Royal commission to investigate the deplorable condition into which things had drifted. That shows what has been the effect of bringing out labour under contract, even though the labourers stipulate that they shall get the same wages as are already paid here. I have always believed that it is right that the interest of those who have come to Australia on their own account should be considered to some little extent, and that any one wishing to come here should come under such conditions that they may be welcomed by their fellow workers here. Every workman who comes from England is made welcome by his fellow workers here if he comes as a free man, and does not come in violation of the legislation in existence. The Government should administer this legislation in such a way as to carry out the spirit of the Act, and they should not do what they did in connexion with these six hatters, who had no special skill which was not possessed by men already in Australia. There is even a worse position in connexion with the administration of sub-section (g) of section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act. The Act was passed for the purpose of protecting the interests of the working classes, and of manufacturers also. Amendments were inserted in the Bill when it was going through which were intended for the protection of shipowners engaged in the coastal trade of Australia. Even Sir Malcolm McEacharn moved one amendment to the effect that immigrants should be exempted from the operation of section 3 if they were to be employed in connexion with intercolonial shipping so long as the wages paid them were not lower than those ruling on the Australian coast. I consider that that provision has been violated in its administration by the Federal department. We have vessels coming to Australia from overseas, and we have no objection to any steamer or sailing vessel coming here from America, London, Hamburg, Hong Kong, Tokio, or anywhere else. They come to Fremantle, and there discharge their cargo for Western Australia. They come on to Adelaide, and discharge the Adelaide cargo. They come on to Melbourne and discharge the Melbourne cargo, and they go on to Sydney in the same way. They take in in Sydney the Sydney cargo for home ports, and they do the same at every other Australian port. That is legitimate business. But these oversea vessels, manned as some of them are by Japanese, Chinese, lascars, and other aliens of that description, not only carry on their foreign trade, but take what they can get of the Inter-State trade of Australia as well. I say that when they do that, according to the spirit of the sub-section to which I have referred, their crews become prohibited immigrants, as they are under contract to work for wages less than those ruling in the coastal trade of Australia. Yet the Minister for External Affairs, and even the Attorney-General, though when speaking upon the matter in the House they were prepared to give all the protection intended, declare now that this sub-section is overruled by sub-section (k), which refers to officers and crews of such vessels landing during their stay in Australian ports. We know that landing during their stay in Australian ports has nothing to do with sub-section (g), which specially stipulates that they may do manual labour. We have no objection to the officers and crews of vessels landing at any of our ports, but while they are paid only half the wages, and live much more miserably than the seamen on our coasting boats, we have a serious objection to their entering into competition with them. We are told that they are not under the Act immigrants in the true sense of the word. They are not intended to stay. I should like to ask them to argue in that way whether the men who leave the shores of Ireland ever return, and go over to England to reap the fruits of their labour, or whether, after returning as soon as the work is done, they are not, immigrants? Everybody knows that these men are not immigrants, and they are so called only because they are so sung about as "Irish immigrants." I intend that the crews of these vessels should come here to Australia and doing work in competition with our sailors and shoremen, and that, if not, fresh legislation will be introduced in the shape of a short Navigation Act, which will protect the interests of those who have invested their capital in the coastal trade of Australia, and of the men employed in carrying on that trade successfully. Although it is written in the Act that no one can ever say truthfully that the labour party has not always considered the interests of capital as well as the interests of labour. In this instance we are endeavouring to do so. The members of the labour party know that under present conditions capital and labour are associated in a very peculiar manner. We know that what affects the one affects the other, and we have no desire to do anything that will injure the interests of the honest immigrant in Australia, who has probably put his savings of a life time into the shares of a shipping company, or some other form of that description. We cannot have an honest investment, and we, as a party, are prepared to assist such investments because in assisting them we assist those whom we more nearly resemble. A lot has been said already in connexion with old-age pensions, but I am surprised that, after the professions and the protestations uttered by the representatives of the people when on the subject of old-age pensions, and even in Parliament, that they were in sympathy with the aged and the infirm of Australia, they have not done anything up to the present time to alleviate the distress which exists amongst the old and infirm. We are told that we cannot do it, but we cannot raise the money. Why, then, are we doing it to the extent of six-sevenths in Australia at the present time. It is being done in New South Wales and in Victoria. They have not done it, though they never made any provision for it, and they meet the extra expense, and conse-

got into trouble. As in New South Wales and Victoria, old-age pensions are only being paid, there remains only one-third of the population of the colony to be brought under the provision. I should like to refer here to the difficulties which the old people are under. There are old men and women in Victoria and New South Wales who have spent a lifetime in Australia yet cannot secure the benefit of these old-age pension provisions. They have worked hard in the different colonies for 40 or 50 years, but they have lived sufficiently long in any one colony to be entitled to the benefit of the law, and consequently they live in a wretched condition or in some institution as destitute. Therefore it is more than something should be done for the non-wealth other than urging them to undertake this duty. All this the Prime Minister, Mr. George Reid, has said, about not being able to raise £1,000,000 for the sake of giving £1,000,000 to the old and infirm has been shown to be a mistake. It has been shown that the non-wealth has power to retain more than it would pay an old-age pension to the old and infirm in Australia. Yet they will not undertake the duty. I think that Victoria and New South Wales would be glad to be relieved of this responsibility, and that they would have no objection to the amount being drawn from their surplus. I do not think any honorable senator so callous as to be unable to realize the position in which the old parent might have been placed if they had no means of support. I am sure every honorable senator will do all in his power to bring about legislation which will relieve the aged from the necessity of being taken care of. I think that the men who constitute the Senate have some sympathy with the old and infirm, and I hope that they will urge the Government to take some action as soon as possible, and not to wait until the "Braddon blot" ceases to exist, which is the case in most of the States, even although they may be in a flourishing condition, could not raise more revenue. If a little more money has to be raised, the means are available. The people of Australia have been tried out against the burden of the old. It is only Senator Pulsford who has been able to do this. I hope that the assistance of the Government will be given to those who are striving to place the aged of Australia above want in the future. The Customs administration is a very interesting subject. I was pleased to listen to Senator Pulsford when he trotted out the case of that person who had dressed up a copy of the Bible in silks and laces, and brought it ashore. It must have looked a spectacle dressed in £5 worth of silks and laces. This man Tingey was a quartermaster, and he knew that he was violating the law. Let me ask Senator Pulsford and other critics of the Minister, what does he appoint tide waiters, lockers, boarding officers, and others for? Is it not to see that nobody comes off a ship with goods that are dutiable? If Senator Pulsford were administering the law, and he saw an officer allow a sailor or other person to pass out of a ship with a suspicious looking bundle, would he not think that that officer was neglecting his duty if he did not challenge him? I am sure that he would. Any officer who would allow a man to come ashore from a vessel with a parcel that might contain dutiable goods without making inquiries is neglecting his duty and ought to be dismissed. One peculiar feature in this case has not been taken notice of. When Tingey was stopped by the officer, he said he was going to the post-office to post the parcel to a friend in New Zealand. We have the name of the quartermaster and the name of the arresting constable, but we have no record of the name of the friend in New Zealand for whom the parcel was brought out. Does not Senator Pulsford think that it should have borne the name of the person to whom it was being taken? It is not in a post-office where such a parcel should be addressed. If any one should get this parcel of silk with a copy of the Holy Scriptures, it is the person to whom it was addressed. The absence of this person's name makes the thing look more suspicious to me than does anything else. Occasionally I have gone to sea in ships, and I know what takes place. It is the practice to attempt petty smuggling wherever a Customs duty is levied. Is not an honest effort to put a stop to this petty smuggling justifiable? Is it not the duty of the Customs officers to see that petty smuggling is stopped as far as possible? I have known sailors and workmen to come ashore from a vessel in Sydney Harbor with pounds of tobacco and hundreds of cigars in the boat. On one occasion, in Balmain, when a Customs officer turned up, the men all cleared out of the boat. He did not know who owned the tobacco and the cigars, and all he could do was to confiscate them. With a firm administration of the law, such as now exists, this petty smuggling is bound to end. People will find out that it is too dangerous to indulge in the habit, and the revenue will benefit. We have all read stories about the smugglers. They were great men and their lives have been glorified to a certain extent, but the days of smuggling are gone. I hope that the Röntgen ray of fiscalism, or what might more appropriately be called the fiscal radium in the shape of Charles Kingston, is going to put a stop to all smuggling. All his officers are carrying out their duty to the entire satisfaction of the great majority of the people in the Commonwealth. In the police courts, however, the same old game is still continued. If a poor woman steals a pair of boots worth 3s. or 4s. for the purpose of procuring bread for her starving children, she gets a sentence of six or twelve months—in some instances a couple of years. But if a bank manager is convicted of robbing the institution of £20,000 he is sentenced to only eighteen months, and very likely in gaol he is made storekeeper or cook's assistant. When I visited the gaol in South Australia I generally found that respectable defaulters were placed in the good billets, and, no doubt, it is still done. A poor person, who brings ashore a few cigars, is punished as heavily as a person who attempts to swindle the revenue of hundreds of thousands of pounds. That is not fair, and I hope the Minister will suggest to magistrates that the punishment should be fixed in proportion to the enormity of the offence. There was another case to which Senator Pulsford referred as a case of very great hardship. A cook, named Ygberg—I wonder if he came from Yorkshire—had 2 cwt. 1 qr. and some odd pounds of dirty dripping stored up in a cask. When he came to Newcastle he entered into collusion with a man called Tucker. They got the cask off the vessel, but they were caught by the Customs officers. Ygberg was charged with taking the stuff off the ship without legal authority—not with stealing it or evading the Customs—and he pleaded guilty. He knew when he was challenged by the Customs officer that he was found out, and like any other thief he had a right to acknowledge guilt. The man who was acting in collusion with Ygberg was charged with taking the stuff from the ship with the intention of evading the Customs. He was another thief too, and he confessed his guilt. Each offender was fined £5. One of them fortunately had the money to pay the fine. The other probably thought that he could not earn so much in the same time, and he went to gaol. Yet we have Senator Pulsford and others trying to make us believe that the Minister should employ a host of Customs officers at good wages to stand about the wharfs and see such things done without any interference on the part of the public. The administration of the Customs at the present time—with the exception of a few big rogues is not punished to the extent as the little one, and I hope that this state of affairs will be remedied—has been very satisfactory. I hope that in the next big case that the big rogues will be punished.

Senator FRASER.—There is a bill coming on now.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes ; there is, and I know something about it. I will not mention it, because it is what Senator Symon would call "sub-marine," or something like that. I am not going to hurt him by getting out long words. I hope the administration of the Customs will be continued in the way it has been, and we have not the slightest doubt that in less than two years, the revenue will be to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds, and no one will be dissatisfied because no one will attempt to defraud the revenue. Some hardships must occur in any legislation of this description. The Parliament passed legislation affecting the drinking habits of the country, and it happened to be going down the street innocently intoxicated, a "bobby" said, "run him in," but he would not be a criminal. The same occurs in connection with the administration of the Customs Act. I have heard instances of great hardships. I know of a case that occurred somewhere in South Australia. I will not mention names. I like to keep my name covered over misdeeds in my own State. If they happen in Victoria or New South Wales I will mention names, but I will not go to put away any of my South Australian fellow citizens.

McGREGOR.—No; I do not ey would there; but these things n done to a very great extent in e, Sydney, and Brisbane—espe- the latter city. There is nothing of the alleged grievances when they l to the bottom. There was another l, in whom Senator Pulsford took a erest. This man was coming out on oyage to Australia. There were tears orable senator's voice as he referred atter. He endeavoured to describe ous treatment which this poor in- had received. He had been trading ears and he was as honest as the sun. t he had never been found out to ing else. On this last voyage he ed to bring out some presents for f his friends. One item amongst ts consisted of 30 pounds of bacon. s a greasy sort of present to bring ay from London to Sydney. An- sisted of some trifles in the shape of d similar articles—just for the Then he had another friend in the ade, for whom he brought out a ertising matter. That was a very happy thought on his part. I wonder how he could tell in England that this friend of his in Sydney wanted some advertising matter in the bicycle line. Then he brought out a specimen bicycle handle. In the name of heaven, is it necessary to bring a bicycle handle all the way from England to Australia for a poor friend? This man was "collared." What for? They did not punish him half severely enough. He was "col- lared" for removing goods from the vessel without the consent of the Customs officers. Do not honorable senators think that the Customs officers, who were standing about looking after the interests of the Common- wealth, would have neglected their duty if on seeing these people bringing ashore duitable goods, they had not challenged them? They had no right to bring them in in the first instance, and then they got up a cock and bull story about giving a fellow £5, and he was to take the goods to where the officers were standing. If the person who had the goods had got down the gangway and amongst the crowd, I am afraid that he would not have taken much trouble to find the Customs box. It may be imagined from the way I have dealt with these cases that I have a suspicious nature. I have in reference to cases of this kind, because probably when I was at sea I might have done the same things myself. At all events I know how they were done. I am not going to say that I did them, be- cause Mr. Kingston might come done on me and make me pass an entry that I should not like. But these little instances are so glaringly in violation of the Customs Act, that if allowed to pass without notice by any Customs officers there would have been a neglect of duty that would have warranted a superior officer in the department adminis- tering censure. I trust that Senator Puls- ford will show more sense in the future than to make a song of this description. Why does he not tackle some of the big cases? Why did he not defend Robert Reid in reference to the Brisbane case? Not a single opponent of the Government has attempted to do that. Why do not the friends of the merchants, like Senator Pulsford and Senator Symon, take the part of those who belong to the same section of the community as themselves? Because they dare not do it. Things have been sufficiently exposed already, and they are afraid that if they said a word things would be more exposed. Consequently they hold their tongues. But all of a sudden they have taken a pathetic interest in the poor unfortunate individual who has no one to defend him—the poor widow and the poor orphan, who have been trotted out over and over again, figure in these cases in a different form. I think that I have now said enough in connexion with the Customs administration and those who have been trying to defend the action of persons who have attempted to swindle the people of the Commonwealth. Whether the amount which they have tried to swindle is large or small does not matter. It may be a few pence or a few shillings; they had no right to do it. Let honorable senators opposite devote their attention to defending those who probably have been defrauding the Customs of thousands of pounds for years past.

Senator FRASER. — Does the honorable senator say that all those who have been charged are swindlers, then?

Senator MCGREGOR. — Every one who cheats is a swindler. The honorable senator knows that.

Senator FRASER. — Are all those who were charged swindlers?

Senator MCGREGOR. — Many an innocent man has been hanged. In an institution like the Customs of the Commonwealth of Australia, where thousands of cases have to be dealt with, and so much care has to be exercised, it is possible that a little hardship may sometimes occur. That is justifiable. But every one proved guilty of fraud is a swindler. The peculiar thing in connexion with most of the prosecutions is that persons have not been prosecuted for fraud. The fraud has been proved afterwards. If a simple case of evasion or misrepresentation is brought against an individual, and it is ultimately proved that there has been unintentional fraud, does Senator Fraser say that the Customs authorities are not justified in the action they have taken? There are hundreds and thousands of honest merchants, as well as of honest contractors, honest members of Parliament and honest persons in other walks of life. We are prepared to respect honest people. It is in the interests of honest people, as well as of the revenue of the Commonwealth, that the Customs department should do all it possibly can to prevent fraud, or even the appearance of fraud. They have a right to make every investigation when it seems that fraud has been committed. Now, I have occupied the time of the Senate long enough. I hope that while we are sitting here we shall recognise it as our duty to do everything we possibly can to pass such legislation as will tend towards the happiness and prosperity of the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). — The remarks which I shall make will be very brief, seeing that the Address in Reply has been debated at considerable length. But I should be doing an injustice to my belief if I said that this address conforms to what my ideas are of the duties of the Government. No doubt the Government have great difficulty in introducing legislation which will please the great mass of the people, but I find that the bulk of the legislation proposed is of an unnecessary and most expensive character. It seems to me that the Government are bringing forward legislation which will provide for the wants of a lot of impecunious people at the expense of the taxpayers of the Commonwealth. I was thunderstruck when Senator McGregor expressed his willingness to swallow the scheme for the establishment of a High Court, the results of which he does not apparently grasp. Does Senator McGregor know the cost of the administration of justice in the various States of the Commonwealth? Does Senator McGregor know the number of officials engaged at enormous salaries in the department of Justice in Victoria?

Senator MCGREGOR. — Because Victoria has been extravagant, Senator Zeal will not allow the Commonwealth to have a High Court.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — That is not a fair way to put the matter. Senator McGregor does not seem to realize the position. But for his information I will give a few items which will give some idea of the immense cost of the administration of justice in the various States. I find that in the Commonwealth there are six Chief Justices and 23 Puisne Judges. I am ignoring altogether the vast number of stipendiary magistrates, District and County Court Justices who have to be paid in the different States. In New South Wales there is one Chief Justice at a salary of £3,500, and seven Puisne Judges who cost £18,200 a year. In addition to these there are a number of subordinate Judges, of whom I am not now taking any account. In Victoria there is one Chief Justice at £3,500, and five Puisne Judges at £3,000 a year each, with five County Court Judges at £1,500 a year each, and a Master in Equity at £1,800 a year; in South Australia there is one Chief Justice at £2,000, and two Puisne Judges who receive between them £3,400 a year; in Tasmania there is one Chief Justice at £1,500 a year, and two Puisne Judges who receive between them £2,400 a year; and in Western Australia there is one Chief Justice at £2,000 a year, and three Puisne Judges who receive amongst them £5,100 a year.

Senator MCGREGOR.—South Australia is the best of the lot.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Probably South Australia is an economical and well-governed State, and I wish that Senator McGregor would bring his common-sense to bear in regard to the question of the Federal High Court.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I should abolish a number of the State Judges.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Then why should the honorable senator attempt to fasten further burdens on the people by the establishment of a High Court?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We must have a High Court.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I shall show presently how the Commonwealth may get a High Court. In Queensland there is one Chief Justice at £3,500 a year.

Senator DAWSON.—That was a special job.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Never mind that. In addition to a Chief Justice, there are in Queensland four Puisne Judges, who cost £8,000 a year, and four District Judges, analogous to County Court Judges, who cost £4,000 a year. These figures show that, paying regard merely to the superior Judges—that is, leaving out of question the cost of working the machinery of the courts with their sheriffs, associates, bailiffs, attendants, and so forth—the administration of justice in Australia costs £80,200 a year. The Government now, without any warrant, propose to establish a Federal High Court, with a Chief Justice at £3,500 a year, and four Judges at £3,000 a year each. It is a shame and an iniquity to place such a proposal before reasonable and intelligent men.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Half the Judges in Victoria should be abolished.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—We do not desire to abolish the Judges in Victoria, the people of which State have never in a single instance repudiated any contract made. When we see that there is this enormous expenditure, it is our duty, as prudent men, to consider whether we cannot utilize our present courts to some advantage. If the Government were composed of business men, Judges would be selected from the State Courts, and asked to act as a Federal High Court, at any rate for a few years. I cannot see any difficulties which have arisen up to the present time to necessitate the establishment of a permanent High Court. If difficulties have arisen it has been because of the absence of common sense on the part of the Government in not providing proper machinery. Any man with the slightest business knowledge could in the course of a week make such an arrangement as I have suggested, and thus act justly to all classes of the community. I do not think that the labour senators, who are supposed to represent the bone and sinew of the country, can sit by and see a huge job of this kind perpetrated. If so, Senator McGregor and those associated with him ought to go to their constituents, or to the Trades Hall, and see what is thought of this proposal to establish a High Court at an enormous cost.

Senator STYLES.—And what about the cost of court buildings?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Unless the different States are prepared to give accommodation in the present court buildings, a special Federal High Court will have to be erected in each State. The Government should use discrimination, and see whether a High Court cannot be constituted of State Judges who have done so much credit and honour to Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—Is Senator Zeal against the establishment of a Federal High Court?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I am against the course proposed by the Government, because I believe it is not required in our present circumstances. No one more than myself will support any useful measures introduced by the Government, but I cannot support legislation involving the payment of high salaries to a lot of people in the various States who will not have to do a day's work in a month, while there are thousands of people in Victoria and New South Wales who have been ruined by the drought. There is another job in the proposal to establish an Inter-State Commission. Is that commission intended to furnish a billet for a chairman at £1,500 a year, and for three other members at £1,000 a year each?

Senator FRASER.—The chairman's salary will be more than £2,000.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The salaries of the commissioners will be just whatever they can get, and the Commonwealth is not in a position to pay the cost involved. We want the government to be administered economically, and not a lot of people kept in idleness at large salaries. Then we are to have a glorified individual—a sort of glorified peacock—who is to be sent to London, as, I suppose, the Lord High Commissioner.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Senator Zeal might get the billet himself.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I would not take it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—A High Commissioner is not wanted at the present time.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is so. In reply to Senator McGregor, I may say that I have been in Parliament since 1865, and I can honestly and truthfully affirm that I have never received or sought any personal benefit at the hands of any Government. At all events, I do not believe that a High Commissioner is required now, and I shall do what I can to secure a little time for consideration. A period of 25 years is nothing in the life of a nation, but this Government in the third year of this Parliament are bringing forward measures for the constitution of a High Court, an Inter-State Commission, and the appointment of a High Commissioner, and I do not know what else. I cannot understand how sane people can make such monstrous proposals. I regret very much having to make these remarks about the Government who I know have had a lot of trouble. The probability is that the Government are forced into a position against which their better nature rebels.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In the matter of the High Court, the Government are supported by the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I was surprised when Senator Symon justified the establishment of a High Court on the ground that it was recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the Federal Convention. But of whom was that committee composed? Did it not consist wholly of lawyers?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Not at all.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Who were the lay members?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There were several lay members; the only omission was that of Senator Zeal.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Senator Walker was one, but I do not know of any other; and the most self-seeking member amongst the lot was Senator Symon.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is that in order, Mr. President? Senator Zeal says that I was the most self-seeking of the members of the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think such a remark is in order.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I withdraw unreservedly, but Senator Symon brought the remark on himself by his persistent interruption.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Senator Zeal asked me a question, but he would not allow me to answer it when I attempted to say that Sir Alexander Peacock was a member of the Judiciary Committee, and that there was Senator Walker, and, I think, another layman with him.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—At all events I notice that the lawyers took particularly good care of themselves. With a view of encouraging Senator Symon to act without that bias of which no doubt he is unconscious in his support of the establishment of the Federal High Court, I can tell him that after our experience in Victoria in relation to the appointment of Members of Parliament to positions in the public service, I submitted to the Federal Convention an amendment preventing lawyers who were Members of the Federal Parliament from being eligible for high judicial office. That amendment was carried, but was eventually overborne by force of circumstances. The present law in Victoria forbids such appointments to laymen, and has worked well for many years, and no doubt that law was passed because experience had shown the inadvisability of self-seeking people in Parliament being appointed to positions which in some cases at all events they were not qualified to hold. Every honorable senator should do his utmost to preserve the purity of Parliament, and a step in that direction is to take away the temptation which is offered in the Government proposals. As to the naval agreement, I am pleased to think that the Government have made an admirable bargain. We are not in a position to go to a large expense in the way of constituting a federal navy. I point out to my honorable friends in the labour corner that, if we establish a large naval force of our own in the Commonwealth, it can only be done by taking hard-working fisherman and seafaring men at present profitably employed upon our coasts, and placing them in positions in which their labours will not be of so much value to the community. Do not these honorable senators see that if we take only 300 fishermen away from the work which they are now doing, and allow them to become, comparatively speaking, drones in our society, that will not be a good bargain?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I am with every honorable senator who has expressed himself in opposition to the Government scheme to this extent: That I think it will be desirable, perhaps in the not too far distant future, to establish an Australian Navy. I do not dispute the desirability of such a thing, but I think that at the present time it is inopportune. What do the Government propose? They have entered into a tentative arrangement with the Imperial Government that there shall be a naval force supplied for the protection of this community which I think will be unexampled in the benefits which it will confer upon Australia. Do not honorable senators know that even in the State of New South Wales the expenditure of the British Admiralty at Garden Island is very nearly equal to the whole of the colonial contribution! Will any honorable senator attempt to deny that the men of any of these ships entering our ports will spend a great deal more money here than the contribution which the States will have to make towards this subsidy? So that from the point of view of the money involved, for every pound we shall be asked to spend, there will be two or three pounds brought into the States, and we shall have the great advantage of being able to secure the naval experience of the old country for nearly a thousand years in the constitution of a force for the protection of the Australian Commonwealth.

Senator HIGGS.—Does the honorable senator know what the people of the old country say about the British Navy?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I know that Senator Higgs has got a bee in his bonnet on the subject of the Imperial Government, and he looks at everything through his own spectacles. The honorable senator does not lack intelligence, but, unfortunately, when he brings his intellect to bear upon Imperial questions it seems to me that he looks all askew.

Senator BARRETT.—The honorable senator is a republican.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I think not. I think the honorable senator likes to pose as a republican, but it seems to me that he is an honest Australian at heart, and in the near future he will do much better than he has done in the past. If honorable senators look at some of the statements which have been published broadcast in the old country, they will see that an enormous number of vessels belonging to the British Navy are now considered to have become obsolete, though some of them may not be more than six or seven years old. Some of those vessels have cost nearly £1,000,000, and are we prepared to negotiate for the purchase of a fleet as efficient as that which the Admiralty proposes to supply when we know that the vessels of that fleet may become obsolete in six or seven years? Would that be a good bargain? Is that a proposition which honorable senators are prepared to recommend to their constituents? I think not. I think that the proposal which the Imperial Government make to us to supply efficient up-to-date vessels for a certain subsidy is one which has not been paralleled for generosity by any Government existing at the present time.

Senator HIGGS.—The vessels are to be here only in times of peace, and in times of war they are to be taken away.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator knows quite well what that means. He knows that if a large hostile fleet is gathering in the neighbourhood of China, or of Hindustan, the Government take power to bring up the Australian fleet to those waters to crush the hostile fleet which may be intending to come down here to destroy our very existence as a nation.

Senator DAWSON.—The Government here have no say in the matter.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We cannot have half-a-dozen says in such a matter.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—As my honorable friend says, we cannot have half-a-dozen says in such a matter. We know that there will be an intelligent say, and we know that the Commonwealth, when contributing from her hard-earned resources a respectable sum, will not be treated unjustly or unfairly by the Imperial Government. I can to some extent understand the desire of certain people in this country to constitute a colonial navy. They are like the people who are looking after the billets proposed in the High Court. They expect to be made colonial admirals, colonial post captains, or something of the kind. But we do not want that. We desire to carry on our Government in a sensible, common-place way, and we do not invite any of the extravagances which unfortunately find a place in the Governor-General's speech.

Senator HIGGS.—We might as well pay the £200,000 to Australians as to any one else.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—They will be paid. The honorable senator knows quite well that under the proposal of the Government there will be training ships, in which Australian seamen will be trained. But I say again that it would be a great misfortune if Australian seamen were taken away permanently from the useful avocations in which they are at present engaged, and put into positions in which they cannot be profitably employed. A good deal has been said about the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act, and I have no desire to labour the question. It does, however, seem to me to be pitiable that the time of the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth should be taken up in adjudicating upon a question about the admission of six hatters. Let honorable senators fancy for a moment the Prime Minister of England being brought from his residence to decide the case of six unfortunate men coming from Germany or Russia to Great Britain! The thing is contemptible. The exercise of a little practical common sense would have avoided the whole of this difficulty.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, on the part of Anderson.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Such a thing makes us the laughing stock of the world.

Senator HIGGS.—What do we care about that?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—If the honorable senator does not care, I do. I do not wish to be considered a fool.

Senator DAWSON.—If the world laughs it will grow fat.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Probably it will, but Senator Dawson knows very well that one gentleman who was brought out under contract, and is getting £600 a year, is going through the length and breadth of the land abusing everybody. Why did not the Government interfere in that case?

Senator DAWSON.—I know that statement to be absolutely incorrect. The honorable senator is referring to Mr. Tom Mann, who was not brought out under contract.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I did not say anything of the kind.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator insinuated that it was Tom Mann.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—If the cap fits, the honorable senator can wear it.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator should tell the truth.

The PRESIDENT.—Order!

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I read it in the papers, and I believe it is true.

Senator DAWSON.—The statement is not correct.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—I did not know that it was not correct. Does the honorable senator speak from personal knowledge?

Senator DAWSON.—I do; I know from personal knowledge that it is not correct.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It has never been denied.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator will very likely find the denial in the waste-paper baskets of the Age and Argus.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Probably so; but I have no access to the waste-paper baskets of either the Age or the Argus, and I have not seen the statement contradicted. I am telling honorable senators what I have read in the papers, and it seems to me that while the Federal Government prevented the landing of six hatters, another man has been allowed to come out here who has made it his business to abuse everybody in the community.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator has said that I have a bee in my bonnet, but I think he has a whole hive in his.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That may be; but I am pointing out to honorable senators of the labour party some of their inconsistencies. While they are posing as great reformers, they are backing up the Government in proposals involving enormous outlay, and I do not see how they can justify themselves before their constituents.

MR BARRETT.—They are not unanimous.

MR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—I am very sorry to hear that, and I will say for my honor and Senator Barrett, that I do not think there is a better man in the Parliament. I think the honorable senator would say anything of the sort. As to the Western Australian overland railway, I desire to say too much upon the

MR FRASER.—It is as dead as Julius

MR BARRETT.—It has got to be buried yet.

MR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—The result of it in the opening speech seems to me a lot of padding put in to catch the votes of members from Western Australia. It is one of the most outrageous and extra-ordinary wild-cat schemes I have ever heard of in my life. That is all I shall say about it. In connexion with the question of the Federal capital, a great many hard words have been said about Victorians. But I do not believe that any Victorian has ever done anything to repudiate the bargain made with New South Wales. I believe I am now saying that the present Treasurer of the Commonwealth, Sir George Turner, has done a great deal to do with the suggestion that the Federal capital should be in New South Wales, and that shows that Victorians have no desire to be unjust to the State. Victorians are not unfriendly to the proposal, and I defy any member of the Opposition to say that any Victorian has done anything of a hostile or unkindly thing to the Government or Parliament of New South Wales. No doubt the Federal capital is necessary, and in time it will come, but I point out that it has taken something like 100 or 110 millions of work the Federal capital of the States up to its present condition. It is necessary that we should rush this thing probably to the great detriment of the State's wealth, simply for the sake of ob- popularity in certain portions of New South Wales? It may hereafter appear that a locality which has, so far, not been thought of will be considered suitable for the purposes of a Federal capital, and any of the localities which have been considered and explored. I propose to the Government that as soon as they bring forward a suggestion which is accepted by the acceptance of the Senate from my point of view, I shall give it my hearty support. I am not captious in the matter, and I know hundreds of Victorians who say they would not object if to-morrow the Federal capital were transferred to Sydney. We in Victoria are getting nothing out of this Federal Government. We can very well do without it, as we have done before, and we have no wish to secure one pound to which we are not justly entitled. I have one thing more to say, and it is that I am very sorry to have noticed the constant persecutions, as they seem to me, on the part of the Customs department. Senator Playford has been a Commissioner of Customs, and Senator Best has also been a Commissioner of Customs; in Victoria we have had some of the most democratic men who have entered Parliament holding the position, but until the advent of the present Federal Government we never heard of such persecutions as have occurred recently over the length and breadth of Australia. I say that with regret. At the initiation of any new legislation we know that errors will naturally occur, but let us be just and generous, and let us not treat men as rogues and vagabonds, simply because mistakes are made. Let the right honorable gentleman presiding over the department use his great common sense and discretion.

SENATOR MCGREGOR.—There are thousands who have not been brought before the court yet.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—That only shows that there is no necessity for it. No man will shield a person who does wrong, and I ask for consideration only for people who do not intend to do wrong. There are firms which to my knowledge have been doing business in Victoria for upwards of half a century, and against whom no reproach can be brought, and yet they have been charged with almost criminal offences. Is that desirable or necessary? Cannot some restraining influence be placed upon the acts of an impetuous Minister?

SENATOR MCGREGOR.—Would the honorable senator like a back parlour for the big ones?

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—No, I should not like a back parlour for the big ones, so the honorable senator gains nothing by that interjection. The honorable senator must be a very hardened sinner if he can think that I desire that injustice should be done to poor men, and that wealthy men should go free.

desire nothing of the kind. I desire that every one should get justice, and I am sure that is also the desire of Senator McGregor. I hope that the honorable senators representing the Government in this Chamber will note that many members of the Senate would like to see a greater amount of discretion used in dealing with these cases, so that men may not be thrust into court in the position of criminals until it is clear that they have been guilty of an offence. It is a principle of British law that no man shall be considered guilty until his guilt has been proved, but here the Federal Government apparently consider that a man is guilty if he has introduced some article which is not properly described in his manifest, or if he has committed some venial offence which might very well be dealt with by the Minister under more equitable conditions. Before I resume my seat, I desire to point out the position into which we are drifting. The different States owe very nearly £250,000,000. These obligations cannot be repudiated, and will have to be met. If we are not careful in administering the affairs of the Commonwealth, if the programme is carried out which is foreshadowed in the opening speech, a very large federal debt will be incurred very shortly for useless and ornamental purposes. When I mention that the federal debt of the United States is £60,000,000 less than the aggregate debt of the six States in this Commonwealth, it will be seen what a position we have allowed ourselves to drift into. In 1902 the federal debt of the United States was £190,701,554.

Senator PEARCE.—There are the State debts in addition to the federal debt.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We have a long way to go to get up to that amount.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—In Australia the States owe nearly £250,000,000. The Australians have a larger debt per head than have any other civilized people. Does Senator McGregor intend to make the conditions of life ten times more difficult than they are now? I ask him as an honest, sensible man to review the position, and not to be carried away by his loyalty to the Government into voting for that terrible High Court. Let him see if he cannot suggest to the Government a tribunal which will be equally as efficacious and not so costly. Other communities are enabled to carry on their public affairs at a moderate expenditure, but in the Commonwealth and the various States we have gone to the very pinnacle of outlay and extravagance in endeavouring to emulate the example of wealth and intellect in the old country. Let us consider what salaries are paid in America. I was surprised to find that the Chief Justice receives only £2,100 and the associate Judges £2,000. It is deliberately proposed in this little Commonwealth that we should start our High Court with a Chief Justice at £3,500 and four Puisne Judges at £3,000 each.

Senator MCGREGOR.—In Victoria the Judges are paid that much.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—If we have done wrong in Victoria is that any reason why the Commonwealth should follow our example. On the contrary it should serve as a beacon and a warning to the Commonwealth. The American ambassador to London—the Hon. J. H. Choate, who is a very intellectual and highly capable man—gets a salary of £3,500. I have no doubt that our Government will deliberately propose that our Lord High Peacock shall receive a salary of at least £3,500. The Consul-General for the United States in London is paid only £1,000 a year. The Americans are keenly alive to economy in the transaction of their public business. In Canada the Chief Justice is paid £1,644, while the five Puisne Judges get £1,440 each. Having regard to our conditions of life, I think these salaries are altogether too low. But these figures should teach us that in other communities economy is exercised, and that while they endeavour to obtain highly efficient officers they do not run to the opposite extreme of giving huge salaries. I have often heard a member of the legal profession say—What is a salary of £3,500 for a Judge when he made in his practice at the bar £5,000 or £6,000 a year? In this State eminent barristers have been able to earn up to £10,000 a year. In reply to this I ask—is there nothing in the distinction of being made a Judge of the High Court of Australia? It appears to me that in the United States a Federal Judgeship carries a great deal of distinction. I ask honorable senators, when they are considering the Bill for the appointment of Judges of the High Court to consider the provision made upon the retirement of a Judge when he gets beyond the period of efficient service. What would that provision represent? An annuity of £1,750 to a Judge between 50 and 60 years of age would cost about £30,000. That sum, therefore, represents what a barrister would have to save during active practice to be able to purchase an annuity at the end of his period of usefulness. This large sum should, in all fairness, be added to the amount of the Judge's salary. In no other position of life could an eminent man obtain that annuity unless he had accumulated the large sum of £30,000. I again repeat that I am not opposed to the creation of the High Court from any factious purpose. I ask the Government to reconsider their position. I am quite sure that they cannot justify such expenditure to the people, when the real facts become known. They cannot justify the introduction of legislation which will involve an expenditure of from £250,000 to £300,000 per annum when it is not required. Ministers owe a duty—not only to themselves, but to their States and to their reputations—to see that it shall not be recorded that the first Government of the Commonwealth were responsible for measures which laid such burdens on the community, that their ill-effects will have to be borne for possibly half-a-century. In conclusion, I ask Senator McGregor to think more over the question of the High Court, and not to give his vote inadvisedly.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

LT.-COLS. BRAITHWAITE AND REAY.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I move—

That there be laid on the table of the Senate copies of all papers in connexion with the retirement of Lt.-Cols. Braithwaite and Reay.

Last week I asked the Postmaster-General a question about an important matter in connexion with these two officers. To me his reply was somewhat startling, because I think it is the duty of the Government on all occasions to furnish the members of the Senate with information on public affairs. The answer I received was that the Government thought that no good purpose would be served by producing the papers, and they suggested that I should not press the question. I felt that inasmuch as the two officers were suffering an injustice, and as they desired to probe the matter to the bottom I had no option but to give notice of this motion. At this juncture I do not propose to go into the merits of the case. All I am now seeking to do is to elicit from the Senate sufficient information to attain my purpose, and at a later stage, when we may be considering the Defence Bill, or a Supply Bill, to go more fully into the facts of the case, in order to ensure that justice shall be done. Originally, the Victorian Mounted Rifles were organized by Col. Tom. Price, who was in command for a number of years, and on his retirement with a view to take up another position, the next officer in command was Lieut.-Col. Braithwaite. Both Lieut.-Col. Braithwaite and Lieut.-Col. Reay have seen very long service; the former has served 18 years, and the latter 24 years. Neither officer has ever received a penny from the State in connexion with the office he has held. No doubt they have had to spend large sums out of their own pockets in order to provide horses and other equipment. They were purely citizen soldiers, and, considering that they were enthusiastic officers, they ought to have received more consideration from the Minister for Defence than they did. What happened? At the last Easter Encampment the General Officer Commanding proposed to put another officer over their heads. In order to accomplish his purpose, and at the same time not to break the regulation, he added twenty men to the Victorian Mounted Rifles, thereby raising the regiment to a brigade. He then said that there was a need for an instructional officer, and the result was that Lieut.-Col. Lee came upon the scene from New South Wales. I have nothing to say of that officer, except that he was considerably junior in rank to Lieut.-Cols. Braithwaite and Reay. He had to be promoted on two occasions very rapidly in order to obtain the position in the Victorian Mounted Rifles. When the statement was made that they required an instructional officer, who had seen service in South Africa to take the command, Lieut.-Col. Braithwaite, who had been promoted more quickly than Lieut.-Col. Reay, refused to take a subordinate position. He was told in effect that he still had his command, and that Lieut.-Col. Lee was simply to act as an instructional officer, but he would not accept a position of that character. He asked to be retired. The same thing happened in regard to Lieut.-Col. Reay, who felt that an injustice had been done. The only blunder that these officers made, in my opinion, was that they asked to be retired under these conditions. Of course I shall be told by the representative of the Government that the officers did ask, and have been retired. Their retirement was gazetted this week.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator will not be told that. I have told him that I am not going to oppose this motion.

Senator BARRETT.—At any rate there is evidently something in the background. There is evidence in the documents, and in the conduct of our military system, of a want of sympathy with our Australian citizen soldiers. A similar case occurred in New South Wales. It was the case of Lieut.-Col. Burns.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that is relevant to the motion, which is only for the production of papers?

Senator BARRETT.—I was going to illustrate the difference between similar cases in New South Wales and Victoria.

The PRESIDENT.—If the honorable senator were arguing the case he could introduce this illustration, but he is only asking for the production of papers.

Senator BARRETT.—I bow to your ruling, sir, but I shall take another opportunity, when I have wider latitude, to show the differences. It cannot be said that the two officers in question are incompetent men, because if they were incompetent they should not have remained in the positions they occupied for so long a time. In addition to that, both of them have received commendation from Major-General Hutton for the way they have behaved in the field, and also for the conduct of the men serving under them. Under the circumstances, I think that the papers ought to be laid upon the table of the Senate, in order that any honorable senator who desires to look into them may have the opportunity of so doing. As I have stated, I do not intend to go further into the question at this stage, but I have indicated my intention of showing that there are some points that ought to be illustrated, and that I shall bring them forward on another occasion.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—It is not the intention of the Government, as I have already informed Senator Barrett, to offer any objection to the production of these papers. The answer that was given last Thursday to a question whether the Government would lay the papers upon the table was as follows:—

The Government is of opinion that no good purpose would be served by doing so, and would suggest to the honorable member not to press the question.

The honorable senator, by his motion, now shows that he does not accept that suggestion. The Government will, therefore, accept the motion and produce the papers. At the same time, on behalf of the Government, I disclaim any responsibility with regard to the effect that the production of the papers may possibly have upon private interests.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

NATIONAL MONOPOLY IN TOBACCO.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I move—

That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable that the manufacture of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes should be a national monopoly.

I wish to thank the representative of the Government and the Senate for having afforded me the opportunity—for which I waited during the greater part of last session—of bringing forward my motion at so early a stage of the present session. I know very well that one of the questions that will arise first of all is as to whether the Commonwealth has the power to carry out the purpose of this motion. I may point out that the Government has appointed a Royal Commission to investigate the desirability of encouraging, by means of bonuses, the manufacture of iron, and inferentially the possibility of the Commonwealth taking up the construction of ironworks and working them. During the present week that Commission resolved to obtain a legal opinion from the Attorney-General on that very question. Therefore, I take it, that it is an open question whether the Commonwealth has the power to establish a Government institution of the kind, but that the evidence is in favour of their having such power.

Senator STYLES.—Would it not be better to wait until we have the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Senator PEARCE.—I presume that we have the power. Another question that will arise is that this subject is not within the region of practical politics. We ought not to assume that the only things which are within the region of practical politics are those which have been formally dealt with by some other Government or Parliament. If a matter is in the interests of the Commonwealth, we should not hesitate to step out of the rut, and one reason why I and others advocate that the manufacture and sale of tobacco, cigars and cigarettes should be a national monopoly is that at the present time it is practically a monopoly. The tobacco trade is one of those businesses which from its very nature and character becomes a monopoly. Experience in Australia shows that it is becoming a monopoly; experience in America has shown that it is one of the big monopolies existing there. A great trust controls the tobacco industry of America at the present time. An attempt has been made to introduce the operations of the trust into the United Kingdom. It has failed for the time being.

Senator PEARCE.—At any rate, it is clear that the tendency is for the tobacco trade to become a monopoly. We can lay it down as a safe axiom that where a trade becomes a monopoly, it is advisable that the Government should step in, and make it a national monopoly. That is one of the grounds upon which I claim that the tobacco trade should be made a national monopoly. Another ground is that one of the requirements of the States of Australia is revenue. On all hands that is admitted. In connexion with any new work that is required, the cry is that there is not sufficient revenue. Do we want a federal capital? There is not sufficient revenue. The Western Australian railway must wait. We have not sufficient revenue. For the same reason old-age pensions must wait. Every one of these questions which has some basis of virtue in it, must wait until we have sufficient revenue. If I can show—and I think I shall be able to do so beyond the possibility of disproof—that we can increase our revenue, in a direction where we shall not have to give back a proportion of the return to the States, by upwards of a million pounds sterling per annum—whilst leaving unimpaired other sources of taxation—I shall be doing some service to the Commonwealth. A special reason in favour of this motion is that by adopting the principle of making the tobacco industry a national monopoly we shall be giving encouragement to tobacco growing in Australia. None can deny that that would be a very good thing. Attempts have been made on various occasions to encourage the growth of tobacco, especially in Victoria. But what has been the result? A certain amount of encouragement was given to the growers by the Government, but owing to the monopoly which existed they were placed in the hands of the manufacturers, who destroyed the protection afforded to them by the Tariff—who by combination were able to keep down the price of leaf. Another point is, that the policy I advocate would insure the good quality of the tobacco. I have here a report from the select committee appointed by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria to look into the question. That committee was appointed in 1896, and some of the evidence which this document contains as to the kind of stuff that goes into the manufacture of the cheaper kinds of tobacco is startling. It seems to me that anything but tobacco leaf is considered good enough to use. By establishing a national monopoly, we shall insure to the growers a fair price for their leaf. We cannot do that by tariff protection as has been abundantly proved. You may raise the price of tobacco by protection, and yet not secure to the local grower 1d. per lb. more for his leaf. But by making the State the buyer we shall insure to the grower a fair and remunerative price. The evidence given by experts who have been growing tobacco in various parts of the world, and by those who have been concerned in its manufacture both in Europe and America, was to the effect that a large portion of Victoria is admirably suited for the production of tobacco leaf. Inferentially—considering the similarity of Victoria to other parts of the Commonwealth—there is a large portion of this continent which is suitable for the same purpose. What I propose is no new departure. In several other countries, although not in any English-speaking country, the manufacture of tobacco and its sale have been a State monopoly for many years. In France it has been a State monopoly since 1621; in Italy since 1862; in Hungary since 1860; and in Roumania since 1869. The manufacture and sale of tobacco has been a State monopoly also in Paraguay and Austria, and a limited system of State ownership has prevailed in Spain and Turkey. In Germany, as the records show, Prince Bismarck was an enthusiastic supporter of this principle, and endeavoured to bring into actual practice a Government monopoly in the manufacture of tobacco. His reason was not that he believed in socialism, but that he saw what a splendid revenue producer the system would be. In the interests of revenue, and to counteract the great influence of France, he wanted to establish this monopoly; but the Reichstag would not give it to him. Now, as to profits. In France, in 1894, the gross revenue derived from this monopoly was £15,032,195. In 1889 the gross revenue was £14,900,000, and the net revenue was £12,000,000. In Italy, in 1889-90, the gross proceeds amounted to £7,441,621, and the net profits to £5,705,990. In Portugal, where the monopoly is farmed out by the Government, the revenue derived in 1890 was £1,600,000. In Hungary, in 1891, the gross returns were £4,600,000, and the net profits £2,700,000. In France, in 1883, the consumption of tobacco was 78,691,800 lbs. of tobacco, and the gross proceeds were £14,900,000, or 3s. 9½d. per lb., the net profit being £12,142,000, or 3s. 1d. per lb. The cost of manufacture and sale in France was 8½d. per lb. I quote these figures because I purpose showing later on what the estimated cost of manufacture would be in Australia. In my calculations, however, I have allowed for the higher cost of production in this country. According to the evidence as reported on page 54 of the report of the Victorian Select Committee, the cost of production, with Australian wages and Australian working conditions, would be 1s. 5d. per lb., which is 9d., or more than 50 per cent., higher than the cost of production in France. On making a comparison between the consumption in France and the consumption in Australia, we find that in the former country it is 29 oz. per head, and in Australia 41 oz. per head. The actual consumption in Australia of imported tobacco is 4,909,976 lbs., and of locally-manufactured tobacco, 4,268,446 lbs. It will be noticed that the locally-manufactured tobacco consumed in Australia amounts to almost as much as the imported tobacco, so that the Australian industry already practically meets the demands of half the local consumption.

Senator STYLES.—But the tobacco manufactured locally is manufactured from imported leaf

Senator PEARCE.—That is so. Of the importations, 85 per cent. is tobacco, 6 per cent. is cigars, and 9 per cent. is cigarettes, and from these figures, having regard to the cost of production and the sale price, we are able to ascertain the profit that can be made on the various items. Of the total consumption in Australia, 7,749,640 lbs. is tobacco, 576,765 lbs. cigars, and 853,017 lbs. cigarettes—a total of 9,179,422 lbs. It must be remembered, however, that in the process of manufacture there is a waste of one-third of the leaf, and, therefore, in order to obtain 9,179,422 lbs. of manufactured tobacco there must be used something like 12,000,000 lbs. of leaf. As to the locally-manufactured tobacco and its distribution, New South Wales manufactured 2,081,186 lbs. of tobacco, 15,569 lbs. of cigars, and 288,240 lbs. of cigarettes; Victoria, 1,127,067 lbs. of tobacco, 95,102 lbs. of cigars, and 206,697 lbs. of cigarettes; Queensland, 591,364 lbs. of tobacco, 2,135 lbs. of cigars, and 21,998 lbs. of cigarettes; Western Australia, 115,855 lbs. of tobacco, 14,263 lbs. of cigars, and 10,500 lbs. of cigarettes; and South Australia, 300,000 lbs. of tobacco, 15,000 lbs. of cigars, and 25,000 lbs. of cigarettes. I quote these figures to show that my estimate of the compensation for buildings, plant, &c., is a fair one. If honorable senators observe the figures they will see that Victoria is responsible for about one-third of the production of Australia; and in estimating the cost of compensation for buildings, and interest thereon, I have calculated that there will have to be expended about two-thirds more than was estimated by the select committee under this head. By adding this two-thirds more, I think I have made a fair estimate of the cost of compensation, and of the additional works which will be necessary in order to meet the whole requirements of Australia. The Australian production of leaf in 1901 was 8,164 cwt., and this was grown principally in Victoria.

Senator BENT.—I thought the production of leaf in New South Wales was much larger than that in Victoria.

Senator PEARCE.—In estimating the cost of production, the first thing to be ascertained is the price of the leaf, and this latter I have fixed at 8d. per lb. I may say, however, that the price which the growers have been getting in Victoria is nearer 4d., and it has been as low as 2d. per lb. I could give from the evidence fore the select committee numbers ices of growers who said they would tly satisfied with a return of 6d.

or the lower qualities, and of 9d. per e higher qualities. One reason for prices is that growers in Australia acquired facilities for curing the

the committee by foreigners, who curing 7,800,500 lbs. of tobacco at ven before the commission, and t by several manufacturers, allows cigars to the 1,000, and shows the manufacture to be £2 8s. 9d. per

Putting these figures together, the leaf, £267,934 for the manufactobacco, £104,785 for the manufac-f cigarettes. This gives the total cost ction as £830,456. As to the quesmpensation, the number of factories or BEER.—How about goodwill?

or PEARCE.—I am not allowing for goodwill, and I may say that the select committee made no such allowance. Indeed, I am not convinced that it would be right to give any compensation for goodwill, because this is a licensed business, carried on with the consent of the State. I have estimated that £500,000 will be necessary for the purchase of new machinery and buildings. That estimate is formed with the idea of supplying all the requirements now met by the importation; but I deduct £100,000 from that amount, because I believe that by a system of centralization in the case of Victoria, and by reducing the fourteen factories to two or three, as could be done under State control, the larger amount will not be required. This leaves a sum of £375,240 for compensation, and £400,000 for new machinery and buildings sufficient to meet the requirements of the whole of Australia.

It will be seen, therefore, that the total cost of resumption and new buildings is about £775,240. On that amount I have reckoned 4 per cent. as interest, which means £31,763, or a total expenditure of £862,219. As to receipts, I have not taken the evidence given before the commission, but have taken the ruling prices of tobacco in the shops in Victoria and in the State from which I come. I have not taken the highest price, but the average price. In the case of cigars, where the prices range very high, it would not be fair to take the mean between the highest and the lowest, and I have therefore taken a price a little below halfway. In the matter of tobacco, however, I have taken the average sale price, and estimate that 7,800,500 lbs. of tobacco will realize 6s. per lb., showing a return of £2,340,150. Then if we take 44,736,000 cigars, representing 536,835 lbs., at £8 10s. per 1,000, we get £380,056;
and 336,834,000 cigarettes, representing 842,087 lbs., at 3½s. per 1,000, means £589,459.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Will the Government not sell at wholesale prices?

Senator PEARCE.—No; I am taking the selling price, and my idea is that we should allow private individuals to sell and give a 10 per cent. rebate as retailers' profit.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable member estimates the selling price at 6s. a lb., but I can buy the best Victory tobacco, manufactured in the United States, at 5s.

Senator PEARCE.—The price I have given is the price quoted to me. According to my calculations there will be a revenue of £3,309,665. The retailers' profit, 10 per cent., would amount to £330,960, the cost of production to £830,456, and interest to £31,763, or a total of £1,193,179, and deducting that from the gross receipts we have a net profit of £2,116,486. I know that the question will at once be raised that with a State monopoly we should lose the revenue from Customs and Excise. That has to be taken into consideration. We should not then be collecting Customs and Excise, and the revenue from those sources must be set down as a debit against the £2,116,486. In calculating the amount to be debited as receipts from Customs, I have taken the highest receipts from that source. I could, of course, have made this statement appear more favorable by going back to 1899, when the receipts from narcotics were very much lower than they are at present. I have taken the highest receipts—those for the quarter ending 31st March, 1903, leaving out the collections under the Western Australian special Tariff. During that quarter there was received from Customs duties upon tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, £238,532 1s. From Excise, £110,777 8s. 5d., and from tobacco and cigar licences, £861 10s. 5d., or a total for the quarter of £350,170 19s. 10d., giving a return for twelve months of £1,400,683 19s. 4d. The Treasurer's estimate for the year is £1,325,524. The average cost of collection of Customs duties is stated at 3 per cent., and 3 per cent. on that total amount would give £42,018, leaving a balance to be deducted from the revenue of £2,116,486 I have indicated, of £1,358,665. That would give us a clear balance of £757,821 profit.

Senator BEST.—Has the honorable senator deducted the cost of borrowed money for the purchase of land, and buildings, and so on?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, I have deducted 4 per cent.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And the cost of material?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, I have allowed for the cost of material also.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How did the honorable senator arrive at the cost of material?

Senator PEARCE.—I explained that, when referring to the cost of material and building, I quoted an estimate.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I meant the cost of tobacco leaf, and so on.

Senator PEARCE.—I have dealt with that also. I have here quotations which I have received from tobaccoists as to the cost of tobacco. One tobaccoist doing a large business gives the imported cost of tobacco at an average of 5s. 1d. per lb., and the retail price as from 6s. to 6s. 6d. per lb. The wholesale cost of colonial plug tobacco is 4s. 3d. per lb., and this is retailed at 6s. per lb. I am informed that imported tinned tobacco—cut-up tobacco—costs wholesale 6s. 4d. per lb., and it is retailed at 8s. per lb., whilst colonial tinned tobacco costs wholesale 4s. 6d. per lb., and is retailed at 6s. It will therefore be seen that, in allowing for an average selling price of 6s. in my calculations, I have not quoted too high a price.

Senator DOBSON.—Is this a convenient opportunity to ask what the honorable senator would do with the vested interests of men at present selling?

Senator PEARCE.—I have said what I would do with the vested interests concerned. I should not advocate buying out existing sellers. I see no reason why they should not be allowed to continue their business.

Senator DOBSON.—But the honorable senator would buy up the factories.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, I think we should buy up the factories.

Senator DOBSON.—What would that cost?

Senator PEARCE.—I admit that it is impossible to bring about a violent revolution in a trade, such as this would be, without treading upon somebody's toes, but if we were to compensate every boy who runs about the street selling tobacco, and were to inquire fully into the books of every tobaccoist in order that we might give him an exact quid pro quo, we should so overload the scheme as to render it unprofitable for some years. I say, that if we could give to those concerned the value of what they have at present in possession, in the shape of machinery, land, and buildings, we should be doing a very fair thing. As I have already pointed out, this business is a monopoly, and the profits and goodwill of the business are immensely increased by the fact that it is a monopoly. As in the case of the drink monopoly, which differs, perhaps, in the sense that it is a licensed monopoly, I am not in favour of compensating the individuals interested to the extent of the full value of the monopoly which has never been given to them by the people, but which has been acquired by them through the conditions under which the industry is carried on.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Anybody may go into the business.

Senator PEARCE.—I should like the honorable senator to try to go into the tobacco business in Victoria. He would find that the experience of some of his fellow citizens of Adelaide would very speedily be his own, and he would be scorched out or bought out by the monopoly which exists in all the capital cities of Australia. I know that honorable senators will not have an opportunity of dealing with this question to-night, but the figures to which I have referred will appear in Herald, and I ask honorable senators to study those figures.

Senator PLAYFORD.—What does the honorable senator estimate as the total profit to be made in the business?

Senator PEARCE.—My estimate is £757,821 per annum.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Apart from Customs and Excise.

Senator PEARCE.—Apart from Customs, Excise, licences, and deductions for compensation, and so on. I recommend honorable senators to study the figures I have given in the light of the report sent in by the Select Committee of the Victorian Legislative Assembly. There were prominent members of the Victorian Legislative Assembly upon that committee, and their recommendation was strongly in favour of the Government of Victoria taking over the business. But they pointed out, strangely enough, that one objection to that course was that the States were not federated, and that one State would therefore have a difficulty in taking over the business alone.

Senator BEST.—Victoria did not rush it.

Senator PEARCE.—No. Victoria did not rush it, but the members of the Select Committee were of opinion that many advantages were to be derived from a State monopoly of the tobacco trade, and, amongst others, they referred to increased revenue, better quality of tobacco supplied to consumers, the encouragement of Victorian farmers to grow tobacco, and increased employment of the people.

Senator DRAKE.—I think they say at the commencement of their report that they had not had time to go into the matter so fully as they should like to have done.

Senator PEARCE.—They expressed their regret that they were not able to make a more complete investigation. I may say that the members of the Select Committee would have liked, no doubt, to go to France in order that they might study the State monopoly there on the spot. They were, however, able to get from the Italian Consul, a man who was in close touch with the monopoly in his own country, full information of the working of the monopoly there. It seems a strange circumstance, and one which, I think, bears out my contention that there has never been the slightest indication in Italy and France to depart from the system of a State monopoly in the trade.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But they make very bad tobacco in France, or did when I was there.

Senator PEARCE.—That is not borne out by evidence given before the Victorian Select Committee. There were witnesses before that committee who said that, after having been in France and having used French tobacco, when they went to America they could not smoke tobacco, and have inquired at the shops there for French tobacco. It is a significant fact also that France not only supplies the requirements of her own people, but also exports tobacco.

Senator BEST.—It is a matter of taste.

Senator PEARCE.—Perhaps the taste for French tobacco must be acquired. I thank honorable senators for having listened to what may appear somewhat like a debating society speech, but I think we are right in bringing forward these questions and inquiring into them. We must recognise that in Australia we have before us the necessity for the construction of immense works for water conservation and irrigation. The borrowing policy of Australia has come to an end, and these works must, therefore, be constructed out of revenue. In the circumstances, I say that the man who can point to new methods of getting revenue, which will not add to the burdens already resting upon the people, is doing a public service. I therefore hope that honorable senators will not set this matter aside with a wave of the hand, simply because it is a socialistic proposal. They will remember that Australia is to-day benefiting from the State control of many things which in other countries are in the hands of private enterprise. Private monopolies in other countries are here State monopolies, and there are not many people in Australia to-day who would advocate the handing over of the State railways to private enterprise. I remember that not long ago a member of the Victorian Chamber of Commerce speaking upon a shipping question said that the time might yet come when they would have to advocate State ownership of shipping, and he expressed a hope that the State would never lose its control of the railways. I say that in this tobacco industry we have a most magnificent revenue producing industry, and seeing that it is now a monopoly, the Commonwealth would be justified in taking control of that monopoly in the interests of the people of Australia.

Debate (on motion by Senator DRAKE) adjourned.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the Senate at its rising adjourn until Wednesday next, at half-past two o'clock p.m.

In submitting this motion, I should like, for the convenience of honorable senators, to state the order in which the Government propose to take their business. As I have already informed several honorable senators, we propose first of all to take the Draft Standing Orders, and next the Vancouver mail agreement, notice of which I gave this afternoon. The next measure I propose to take is the Senate Elections Bill, after that the Naturalization Bill, which is not yet before the Senate, and then the Patents Bill. Of course that order will be subject to contingencies in case of anything urgent arising or possibly other business coming forward, but I wish to give honorable senators a general idea of the order in which we propose to take the business. There will be, for instance, the Eastern Extension Company's agreement, with regard to which a motion will be brought forward here as soon as we learn that the agreement has been signed in London. I may mention on behalf of the Government and guidance of honorable senators, that in other place the High Court Bill will first, then the Procedure Bill. This is a measure relating to what are referred to as the sugar rebates. As will be considered the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill and the Naval Subsidy. Arrangement, of course, will be subject to contingencies in the same way as that of business proposed for this Commission. The report with regard to the federal is expected soon, and that matter then be dealt with in the other Commission. I make this announcement in order to give honorable senators in the convenience of their own business affairs. I think we have now within sight of business to keep us fully occupied until measures arrive from another place. I therefore expect that from this time we shall have plenty to do, and I hope we shall be able to attend to all our attendances, and will be able to sit the days prescribed by the sessional regulations.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 4 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair p.m., and read prayers.

TASMANIAN REVENUE.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Will the Minister explain what he did with the portion of the Commonwealth revenue collected in the State of Tasmania last month?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I will endeavour to meet the necessary expenditure of the State.

PAPERS.

Sir JOHN FORREST laid upon the table—

Regulations under State Defence Act and Constitution of the Commonwealth.

ELECTORAL ACT ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—I wish to know what the Minister for Home Affairs is doing to get the electoral commissioners, or them, in adjusting the boundaries of the federal electorates in accordance with populations, are making practically no distinction between dense city populations and the scattered populations of large country districts, notwithstanding the fact that the Act permits them to make a discrimination to the extent of 20 per cent. above and 20 per cent. below the quota. If no discrimination is being shown, I ask the Minister if he considers that the spirit of the Act is being complied with, and the intentions of Parliament carried into effect?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If I remember aright, the honorable member was one of those who were prominent in trying, when the Electoral Bill was before the House, to have a distinction made between the number of electors which should be allotted to a country constituency, and the number which should be allotted to a city or densely-populated constituency, but the House decided that there should be a discrimination only to the extent of one-fifth above and one-fifth below the quota. In South Australia the quota is being adhered to very closely in both city and country constituencies. It was the intention of Parliament, however, that there should be some discrimination, and when the proposed divisions are laid before the House it will be for honorable members to say whether the commissioners have done their work in accordance with the spirit of the Act.

Mr. PAGE.—Has the Minister given any instructions to the commissioners on the subject?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—They are adding to the electorate of the honorable member for Maranoa a territory as large as Victoria.

Mr. PAGE.—They are talking of doing so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The only information—it is not an instruction—which I felt called upon to give to the commissioners was that they should divide the electorates in accordance with section 16 of the Act, which says—

In making any distribution of States into divisions, the commissioner shall give due consideration to community or diversity of interest, means of communication, physical features, existing boundaries of divisions, and, subject thereto, the quota of electors shall be the basis for the distribution, and the commissioner may adopt a margin of allowance to be used wherever necessary, but in no case shall such quota be departed from to a greater extent than one-fifth more or one-fifth less.

I could not do more than that.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Can the Minister say when the maps of the proposed electoral divisions of Queensland will be available to honorable members?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I had a communication from Queensland this morning, and I expect the divisions to be posted to me to-day or to-morrow, so that I shall receive them as soon as a mail can get here from Brisbane. It will take some time, however, to prepare all the maps which have to be distributed.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN TRANS-CONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The other night, in reply to a question asked by the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, the Prime Minister promised to obtain information as to the advantages from the military stand-point of a railway running east and west across the continent of Australia. I now ask him if he will obtain similar information with reference to a railway running north and south?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not see any valid reason why I should not make the inquiry which the honorable member suggests.

DISTRIBUTION OF PAPERS.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—During the recess no documents of any kind were posted to honorable members, though many important matters of public interest arose and were discussed in the newspapers—subjects like the report of the Conference of Premiers, and the statements of the Treasurer in regard to the finances. It seems to me that honorable members, without being overloaded with unnecessary papers, should have sent to them documents which would guide them in forming their own opinions on public questions of importance, and not be left to depend upon the newspapers. I do not know what the practice adopted by a State Parliament is, but I know that I have felt the want of such information as I speak of. During the recess I received no public document of any kind.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member can have all parliamentary papers posted to him if he asks for them.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I think it is the custom when documents have been laid upon the table by command, or in pursuance of a resolution, that they are distributed among honorable members even during the recess, if the printing of them is ordered. But it has been the practice not to communicate to honorable gentlemen during a recess documents for the parliamentary publication of which there has been no authorization, and such papers as are of any importance are laid upon the table upon the re-assembling of Parliament. I will consider the question which the honorable member has raised, but I think that he will admit that it would be a matter of some difficulty to depart from a practice which appears to rest upon reason.

FEDERAL CAPITAL SITE.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to know from the Minister for Home Affairs if he is correctly reported in one of this morning's newspapers to have informed an interviewer that the land required for the federal city will be bought before the selection is made?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have no recollection of making any remark of the kind. The journalist who attributed the statement to me must have drawn upon his imagination. It is not likely that the Minister or Parliament would purchase land before the selection was made.

CARRIAGE OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. CLARKE asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Has the Postmaster-General seen an article in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of the 27th May, in which it is stated that the Commonwealth Government stopped the payment of a subsidy of £2,500 per year to the New South Wales Railway Commissioners for the free carriage of newspapers for the purpose of penalizing the New South Wales press, and giving an undue advantage to the Melbourne newspapers?

2. Were the newspapers of New South Wales, as stated in the article referred to, treated in a different way to newspapers issued in other States of the Commonwealth?

3. Will he give the House a full statement as to what action the Government really took in regard to the carriage of newspapers?

4. Is it a fact, as stated in the article referred to, that Mr. Scott, the Secretary of the Postmaster-General's department, declined to appear before the New South Wales State Parliamentary Select Committee because he was afraid to be examined?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Postmaster-General has supplied me with the following answers:—

1. The Postmaster-General has seen the article in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of 27th May, and the statement referred to.

2. The newspapers of New South Wales were not, as stated in the article referred to, treated in a different way to newspapers issued in the other States of the Commonwealth.

3. The Postmaster-General having been informed that some special payment was being made in New South Wales by his department for the carriage of newspapers by the railway, which were not posted and did not form any part of the mails, directed that a telegram should be sent to the Deputy Postmaster-General in Sydney asking for a statement of the payments made by his office to the Railway Commissioners, showing whether any and what services were performed other than the carriage of closed mails and the performance of post and telegraph duties by railway officers. In reply, a statement was sent to the Postmaster-General, on 17th June, 1901, showing among other payments one of £2,500 for "conveyance of newspapers—special." As upon inquiry it was ascertained that this special payment was made for the carriage by the Railway Commissioners of newspapers which were not posted, and were not therefore under the laws of the State legally entitled to free transmission by post, as they would have been if posted in New South Wales, and as it was found that no similar payment was being made in any other State of the Commonwealth, including Western Australia and Tasmania, where under State laws newspapers posted were entitled, as in New South Wales, to free transmission by post within the State, the Postmaster-General directed that this special payment, peculiar to New South Wales, should be discontinued, and notice of discontinuance given at the earliest moment. Notice was accordingly given to the Railway department of New South Wales by the Deputy Postmaster-General on 25th June, 1901, and the payment was discontinued on the 5th August. The action taken throughout by the Postmaster-General was caused by the conclusion arrived at—namely, that it was impossible under a federal system to continue in New South Wales a method involving considerable expense which could not be made general and be extended to the other States, and that to continue to pay for the conveyance of newspapers or any other articles of merchandise not transmitted by the post, but sent by railway by persons not connected with the department, could not be justified. Subsequently a select committee of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in a report dealing with the carriage of newspapers on the Government railways of that State, dated the 19th December, 1902, stated—"That, on the other hand, had the Commonwealth Postal department consented to continue to pay for the conveyance of parcels of newspapers or other merchandise not transmitted through the post, such action would have constituted a distinct misappropriation of public money."

4. It is not a fact that Mr. Scott, the Secretary of the Postmaster-General's department, declined ear before the New South Wales State Parliamentary Select Committee because he was afraid examined. The reason why he did not appear in his letter of the 12th September, and which appears on page 125 of the Report of Evidence taken before the select committee—namely, the extreme pressure of work in connexion with the Estimates and other matters rendering it necessary that he should not be absent from Melbourne. Replies to questions put by Mr. Wynne were sent with that letter.

CLASSIFICATION OF PUBLIC SERVANTS.

POYNTON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Does the Government intend advancing the fifth and fourth classes of South Australian officers who have reached the South Australian State maximum of their class, from the immediate grade salary to an equality with the Federal officers at the maximum of the Commonwealth fifth and fourth classes, and will such a change take effect from the coming into operation of the Commonwealth Act?

EDMUND BARTON.—I have an answer from the Post and Telegraph Department that this is a matter for the Home Affairs department to deal with, and if an honorable member will repeat his question at a later date the information will be made available.

CHARGES FOR CUSTOMS OFFICERS' SERVICES.

CROUCH asked the Minister for Home and Customs, upon notice—

Whether any, and what, charge was made for the attendance of a Customs official at the trial of the Interlochy to the syndicate which chartered that vessel?

Whether any, and what, charge was made for similar attendance to the underwriters?

Is any difference made between the two cases, and, if so, what is the reason?

Does the syndicate pay import duties and all other expenses of the official, why should his attendance be charged for at the wreck, and not at an ordinary port, seeing that he is there to collect revenue?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follows:—

Seven shillings per day.

No charge was made to the underwriters.

Yes. Because the officer, for the advantage of the syndicate, is specially kept continuously at the scene of the wreck, even when Customs business is only being transacted at considerable intervals of time. As to the underwriters, their business does not necessitate this.

Because at an ordinary port the officer's services would be continuously employed in the ordinary Customs business, and in this case they are only intermittently employed, and on this basis no work.

RENTALS FOR POSTMASTERS' QUARTERS.

Mr. THOMSON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. From what date were the terms of the Act fixing postmasters' rental at 10 per cent. of salary put in force?

2. Are there still some such officers not obtaining the benefit of the provision, though others have received it for some time?

3. Will there be an adjustment placing all on an equal footing?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—As this matter is connected with my department, I may inform the honorable member—

1. The Act came into force on the 1st January last, and the adjustment of the rental, when completed, will take effect from that date.

2. This question is very complicated owing to there being no uniform system throughout the States. In some States it has been the practice to make no charge for rent, and in a few cases the officers do not pay more than 10 per cent. on their salaries, but the whole question is so interwoven with the classification of the service that no proper adjustment can take place until this is completed. In all new appointments, however, the rent is being fixed on a 10 per cent. basis.

3. Yes.

LOSSES ON TELEPHONE GUARANTEES.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What is the amount of the losses on the telephonic guarantee lines in New South Wales?

2. How long was this amount accumulating?

3. What was the value and yearly average of the total telephonic business during the same period?

4. What was the average yearly amount of the bad debts?

5. What was the average yearly proportion of bad debts to total business?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Information to enable replies to be given to the questions is being obtained, and answers will be given as soon as it is available.

PERMITS FOR ALIEN DIVERS.

Mr. BAMFORD asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Whether any permits have been granted to Japanese or other Asiatic aliens to work as divers or otherwise in the Torres Straits pearl fishery?

2. If so, how many such permits have been granted?

3. What are the nationalities of the men to whom such permits have been granted, if any?

4. If granted, under what conditions were such permits issued?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable members questions are as follow :—

1. Permits have been granted to enable owners of pearling boats to bring to Thursday Island a number of Asiatics to sign articles on pearling vessels to replace men who have left or are leaving the Commonwealth.

2. The number of such Asiatics is 211.

3. Men are specified as Asiatics merely.

4. Conditions were as follow :—

(a) That the department should be satisfied that the men were only to replace others who had left.

(b) That a bond should be entered into to secure—

1. That men sign articles forthwith after landing.

2. That no such men should be on shore for more than two weeks at a time, nor for more than two such periods in any year.

3. That at the conclusion of his agreement every person so employed shall be returned to the place whence he came.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S SPEECH : ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Debate resumed from 3rd June (vide page 496), on a motion by Mr. L. E. GROOM—

That the following address in reply to the Governor-General's opening speech be now adopted :—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY—

We, the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia in Parliament assembled, beg to express our loyalty to our Most Gracious Sovereign, and to thank Your Excellency for the speech which you have been pleased to address to Parliament.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—When the Prime Minister very kindly consented last night to my resuming my address this morning, I had dealt with the question whether there was any justification for the charge against the Prime Minister that the fiscal policy of the Government had not been fairly set before the electors of New South Wales prior to the general elections. I had also called attention to what I regarded as the causes of the existing dissatisfaction with the administration of the Federal Government. I now desire to say a few words in reference to the Tariff. The Government were charged with the very important duty of framing a Tariff calculated to meet the requirements of the whole Commonwealth, and we are now in a position to judge them by the results of their work. It seems extraordinary that, in spite of the very strong fight they made over the Tariff, no honorable members who sit on the Government side of the House seem to have the courage to come out into the open and defend their handiwork. The unfortunate Tariff finds no one prepared to father it. It is like "Japhet in search of a father." Those who are responsible for the Tariff deal with it in a very gingerly way, and, judging from the appearance of some leading protectionists, they are not very satisfied with the results achieved. We can all remember the genial expression on the face of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports during last session, but now his appearance is the reverse of cheerful. Whether this is due to the effects of the Tariff, to doubts as to the stability of the Victorian Wages Boards, or to the depressing effects of the wave of "Irvineism" which is now overwhelming his State, I cannot say, but the fact remains that the honorable member and others who supported the Tariff do not seem disposed to make any very strong fight in its behalf. We are told that we should allow the whole matter to rest, because the commercial affairs of the Commonwealth would be very seriously unsettled by any revival of the Tariff discussion. This view is put forward most strongly whenever any suggestion is made that the duties now provided for should be modified upon a revenue-producing basis, and at the same time be rendered less protective. I feel satisfied, however, that if, as the result of the next general election, the Government find themselves supported by a substantial majority in favour of high duties, the cry which is now being raised against interference with the Tariff will be dropped, and an attempt will be made to increase the duties. The Prime Minister, in the course of his address to the electors of New South Wales, claimed that the whole trouble in regard to the Tariff had been caused by the members of the Opposition and those who had assisted them in destroying the symmetry of the Government scheme of taxation. The Tariff has been hailed by some Government supporters as a "poor man's Tariff," and, no doubt, if that description is intended to apply to a scheme which places heavy burdens upon the shoulders of the poor, whilst relieving the rich as far as possible, the present Tariff deserves that name. I wish to show the extent to which the efforts of the Opposition and of the labour party have been successful in removing burdens from the shoulders of the consumers. In this connexion I need only refer to the speech delivered by the Vice-President of the Executive Council when introducing the Tariff into the Senate. That honorable gentleman made a strong appeal to the members of the Senate not to effect any further reductions, because the revenue which the Government required to meet the needs of the States had been already greatly reduced by the alterations made in this House. He pointed out that the losses so involved included the following:—Cocoa beans, chocolate, and confectionery, £18,000; preserved milk, mustard, salt, and rice, £43,000; tinned fish, £40,000; tea, £350,000; cotton and piece goods, £200,000; other textiles, £50,000; machinery, metals, &c., £50,000; kerosene, £10,000; drugs, £20,000; earthenware, £20,000; printing paper, £25,000; and other items, £20,000; making a total of £976,000. The Senate decided, however, to make further reductions upon some of these important lines, and the revenue-producing power of the Tariff was further diminished as the result of the compromise which was eventually arrived at. But, instead of the Tariff producing only £8,009,000, it actually realized £8,692,000, and is estimated to yield even more during the current year. Indeed, more revenue is being realized under its operation than the high duties originally proposed by the Government were estimated by the Treasurer to yield. According to the returns which are now available, the actual increase from this source in New South Wales up to the present time is approximately £3,272,000. The revenue derived in that State from this particular head actually shows an increase of about £1,250,000. In other words, prior to the accomplishment of federation, the people of New South Wales were taxed to the extent of £1 6s. 4d. per head, whereas during the current year—despite the fact that they have been suffering from drought and disaster such as they had never previously experienced—they have been taxed to the extent of £2 5s. per head, an increase of 18s. 4d. per head. What is more, the taxation is being realized. During the election campaign, the Prime Minister declared publicly that the Tariff which would be submitted by the Government would be based upon the principle of "revenue without destruction." I think that the experience of New South Wales and a number of the other States is that its operation is in the direction of obtaining revenue with destruction—the destruction of its natural sources of production. The Governor-General's speech contains a recognition of the fact that the Commonwealth generally is suffering from drought. It says—

Notwithstanding the drought, which proved so disastrous to many parts of Australia, the federal finances are in a very satisfactory condition.

But they are in that condition only because the Tariff is exacting from the people money which they can ill afford to pay. To a very great extent, too, it has assisted to destroy natural industries. I have a very vivid recollection of a debate which occurred in this Chamber in reference to the grain and fodder duties. Honorable members will remember that under the original proposals of the Government the duties levied upon these articles were so high that Ministers did not expect them to yield any revenue under normal conditions. The matter was under discussion in this House when the drought had reached a very acute stage in Queensland and New South Wales. I recollect that when honorable members appealed to the Government on behalf of their respective States, either to remove those duties or to suspend their operation until normal conditions again prevailed, their suggestion was met with very strong opposition by Government supporters, notably, by those who favour a high protective Tariff. The Minister for Trade and Customs defended the stand taken by the Government upon the ground that it was right for the farmers in the more favoured parts of the Commonwealth to profit by the needs of their brethren in its less favoured portions. In what way the federal spirit—about which we heard so much prior to the consummation of federation—was manifested in a contention of that character I fail to perceive. In the Senate the Vice-president of the Executive Council voiced the same sentiment when he declared that Australia's needs on that occasion were Tasmania's opportunity. Coming to the rank and file, I would point out that the honorable member for Gippsland strongly opposed the suggestion to suspend the operation of the fodder duties, because he interpreted it as an endeavour to secure a modicum of what he called "free-trade," which, he said, could not be obtained, except under the plea of the necessities of the people of these States. The honorable member for Moira also denounced the proposal in the very classical language of "flap-doodle." He declared that the suffering settlers of these States were squealing for assistance to which they were not entitled. Several other honorable members from the Government side of the House gave utterance to similar sentiments. In view of the great disaster which has overtaken the industries of the Commonwealth generally—a disaster which is being intensified by the operation of the present Tariff—I should like to hear the grounds upon which those honorable members justify their action at the present stage. There is certainly no reason for the contention that the position of affairs was not known at the time. It is true that it may not have been fully realized, but that was not the fault of the people who were suffering, or of their representatives in this Chamber. The matter was put before the Government very plainly by representatives holding fiscal views similar to those entertained by the Ministry themselves, and by those who were their strongest supporters prior to the election. In this connexion I need only refer to a large meeting which was held in Sydney for the purpose of urging that consideration should be extended to the farmers of the drought-stricken areas—a meeting which resulted in the appointment of a deputation which subsequently waited upon the Acting Prime Minister and placed the position fully before him. At that meeting the Minister of Lands in New South Wales, Mr. W. P. Crick, is reported to have expressed himself as follows:—

It was a cruel thing to think that if fodder could be got for the stock it should be shut out, and he thought he could claim the support of men like Mr. Carruthers (the leader of the Opposition) and Mr. Ashton, when he said it was the duty of the Government of the State to pay the duty on the fodder to keep the stock alive if possible.

I would also remind the House that the Attorney-General of that State was specially deputed to visit Melbourne on behalf of the New South Wales Government and to confer with the Commonwealth Government upon the matter. In the report of an interview with an Age representative at the time of his visit, Mr. B. R. Wise is reported to have said—

The idea that Australian farmers will be injured by a temporary remission of duties is based on the assumption that the farmers have any stocks to sell. This is, however, not the case, except in very few instances. The farmers have long ago parted with their stocks, which are now held by persons who bought for re-sale, and who should have already made a very profit on their bargains. It is quite certain something ought to be done. Any one who realizes the importance of the pastoral industry to the country could not fail to recognize the gravity of the situation.

That is a fair statement of the position. It was placed before the Commonwealth Government by the Attorney-General of New South Wales. After the matter had been considered, and no assistance in the direction of a remission of the duties was forthcoming, the adjournment of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales was moved by Mr. J. C. Fitzpatrick for the purpose of calling attention to the matter. In the course of the debate, the Premier, Sir John See, is reported to have said—

When this matter was brought under notice, I said as representing the State, that we were prepared to forego the duty upon imported fodder; but the Federal Government could see their way clear to do that. Just the same in some other matters, they have endeavoured to put the responsibility on this Government, and they should have taken action themselves.

I think that is a very reasonable position to assume. The Commonwealth Government is responsible for the duties which have been imposed upon these lines, and if it was expedient to remove or suspend the operation of the duties, certainly the Ministry should have undertaken the task, instead of leaving it to the State Government to circumvent their action by providing for a refund of the posts after they had been collected. I have been stated in reply to objections which have been urged, that by means of the proposed Tariff, the State Government were enabled to reduce railway freights to an extent more than compensated the stock-owners for the duty they were called upon to pay on these particular items. But I will remember that the Chief Railway Commissioner of New South Wales—a very shrewd commercial man—when he was approached on the subject of a reduction of the rates on the carriage of starving stock, put the question exactly as it subsequently worked out. He told his interviewers that such a proposal would not accomplish the object at which they aimed, inasmuch as the stocks of fodder had passed into the hands of a few persons, that any reduction in the railway rates would be made an excuse for increasing the price to the consumer, so that no benefit would be conferred upon him. That is precisely what has occurred. Failing to secure concessions from the Commonwealth administration, the State Government ured to assist stock-owners by reducing railway rates. But, just in proportion the rates were reduced, the price of wheat charged to the unfortunate stock-owners was increased. The result was that the cases supplies of fodder which were sold at £4 or £5 per ton, and the price of which should not have exceeded £6 per ton, were sold to persons who were endeavouring to save their stock at £10 per ton, and even more. A few of the honorable member for Gwydir tried to decry the dissatisfaction felt on the operation of these duties. The honorable member quoted a return showing up to August last a sum of some-£17,000 was obtained from this source, and in view of that small sum he asked wherein lay the great grievance against the Government? But it is the amount of duty collected that indicates the full oppressiveness of this protection. It is the fact that the imposition of this duty enabled a few to control the market and charge practically what they liked in dealing with stock-owners who were making a struggle to preserve their stock. The honorable member certainly does not correct up the position if he thinks that the cause of the trouble is to be measured by the experiences of farmers and graziers, some time in April last. The trouble only began then. The farmers' stock-owners are not yet free from it. They have still to purchase fodder to save the remnants of their stock, and seed to plant them to put in their crops—also many other necessary operations. There has long since ceased to be a mere inconvenience affecting stock and stock-owners. It is a people's question. It affects the whole of the community. In consequence of the drought last year's crops were practically a failure. I find that in New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, no grain whatever was obtained from about 100,000 acres, which were put under the plough and that a great part of the area was stripped, or cut for grain, yielded from 10 lbs. to 60 lbs. per acre. Now, in the Commonwealth—with the exception of South Australia—was anything like an average return obtained. I find that the returns supplied that Western Australia stands perhaps in a better position to do the other States; but its crop last year were 51,393 bushels below the average for the previous season.

Mr. FOWLER.—Not on account of the drought.

Mr. BROWN.—Certainly the extent of production in Western Australia is not nearly equal to the local requirements. I wish to indicate the real effects of the drought upon this really indispensable class of production. In 1900-01, New South Wales produced 16,173,771 bushels of wheat, Victoria produced 17,847,301, South Australia 11,253,148, and Queensland 1,194,088 bushels. In the year 1901-2, a considerable shortage took place. Instead of a yield of 16,173,771 bushels, New South Wales obtained only 14,808,705 bushels; and the yield in Victoria was only 12,127,382 bushels. In South Australia, it was 8,012,762 bushels; and in Queensland it was 1,692,222 bushels. Last season, New South Wales obtained a yield of only 1,561,205 bushels, showing a shortage of 13,247,503 bushels on the previous year; Victoria raised 2,386,219 bushels, or a shortage of 9,741,163 bushels; South Australia had a yield of 6,354,912 bushels, or a shortage of 1,657,852 bushels; and Queensland had a yield of only 100,000 bushels, or a shortage of 1,592,222 bushels. In Western Australia the yield was 881,708 bushels, or a shortage of 51,393 bushels; while Tasmania had a shortage of 13,662 bushels as compared with the returns for the previous year. As compared with the yield for the previous year there was a total shortage of 26,303,790 bushels, and as compared with the return for the year before the shortage represented 36,118,881 bushels. There was thus an enormous falling-off in the general food supply of the community. I turn now to the losses sustained in pastoral enterprises. In New South Wales the drought last year resulted in a shortage of 189,263 bales of wool; in Victoria there was a shortage of 68,327 bales; in South Australia a shortage of 12,734 bales; in Queensland a shortage of 26,740 bales; and in Tasmania a shortage of something like 4,741 bales, or a total loss of between 300,000 and 350,000 bales of wool for the whole Commonwealth. This shortage includes a large quantity of what is known as dead wool, or dead skin, and it indicates that in the coming year the falling off will be very largely intensified. Mr. Coghlan estimates that the losses in respect of the failure of wheat crops and death of stock in New South Wales alone represent something like £10,000,000. That, however, is only a very small proportion of the total losses which the drought entailed upon the State. There was, for example, the increased cost of feeding stock, and the increase in the price of fodder required for that purpose. In my own electorate over £100,000 was expended last season in providing for the sheep upon a single holding. Apart from that expenditure, an enormous outlay was involved in securing railway trucks, and paying for the transfer of stock to more favoured districts. The experience on this holding is a fair illustration of what was general throughout my electorate, and indeed throughout the greater part of New South Wales. The total loss to the community cannot be measured by the loss of £10,000,000 in respect of crop failures, death of stock, and so forth. If this were a question affecting only New South Wales the House, perhaps, might afford to ignore it. But it affects the whole Commonwealth. In the issue of the Argus of the 26th ultimo a return was published showing the estimated wheat importations into Australia from the 1st of January to the 24th of May. The approximate production of wheat in Australia last year was 12,112,000 bushels; there was also on hand in flour and old wheat about 900,000 bushels, or a total local supply of 13,012,000 bushels to draw from. The importations during the period named consisted of 7,848,625 bushels, while under order and on the way to Australia there was a total of 4,031,975 bushels, the aggregate importations thus being something like 11,880,600 bushels. It is estimated that 19,500,000 bushels are required for food supplies, while seed requirements represent another 5,500,000 bushels, or a total of 25,000,000 bushels. During the year 1901-2 the Commonwealth instead of importing grain in these enormous quantities for its own local requirements, exported no less than 1,980,000 bushels. It was said last session that the Tariff would operate in the direction of providing for local requirements. The honorable member for Gippsland asserted that we must have a Tariff like that proposed in order that we might provide for our local requirements. He suggested that it would—by what species of magic he did not explain—compel the farmers to enter upon the work of producing wheat, so that we might not be dependent on outside sources for our supplies. The Tariff has been passed, and what is the result? As the result of the abnormal drought conditions under which the Commonwealth has suffered during the past twelve months, we have been compelled to import grain to provide for the normal requirements of the community. We have had to import nearly 12,000,000 bushels of wheat, and as the result of the grain duties, we have augmented the federal revenue to the extent of something like £500,000. That sum has been received from a source from which the Treasurer never expected to secure a penny, and he does not expect to obtain anything from it in normal times. If this is not revenue with destruction—the destruction of one of the main sources of the wealth of the community—I do not know what is. One of the charges which will lie against the Tariff is that instead of enabling the people to fight the adverse natural conditions with which they have been faced, and will have to face again in time to come, it has and will operate in an opposite direction. It works in the direction of making these natural conditions more oppressive than they were before. I undertake to say that if the Government of New South Wales had not come to the assistance of the graziers—and more particularly the farmers of that State—by purchasing seed wheat for them, despite the high prices then ruling, and by providing fodder for them, a very small area would have been placed under wheat during the present year. The producing community of that State has been so badly crushed by the drought, plus the operation of the Tariff, that they would not have had any reasonable prospect of providing for the requirements of this community during the coming year. The outlook is now much more promising. I trust that the drought will soon disappear, and that the farmers and other producers will be able to recoup the losses they have suffered, more particularly during the last twelve months. But what I desire to emphasize is that instead of the Tariff being one that will produce revenue without destruction, its operation has had quite the opposite effect. It has assisted to kill those industries so far as it is possible for a tariff to do so. The only alternative open to the Government was to go to the other extreme, in which some of our protectionist friends believe, and provide for the total prohibition of importations. I think that the farmers of the Commonwealth would be very glad to hear some explanation from representatives like the honorable members for Moira and Gippsland, and two or three others, who made such a strong fight to prevent any relief being secured to them by the remission of duties. At the present time wheat is taxed to the extent of nearly 11d. a bushel, and in my own State the duties and wharfage charges upon the 6,500,000 bushels, which are imported to meet the requirements of the people, amount to 1s. 1d. per bushel. That is a very heavy burden for the consumers. A good deal has been spoken of late of the starving stock of the Commonwealth, but now it is starving people whom we have to consider. The drought has closed a considerable number of avenues of employment and production, and has depleted the savings of a large part of the community, so that many people, particularly among the farming population, are now dependent upon public charity, although they were never so before, and, I hope, never will be so again. Victoria is a country which has enjoyed the advantages of protection, not for merely a year or two, but for something like 30 years. If those advantages are as great as some enthusiastic advocates of protective duties claim, how comes it that up to the 24th May last Victoria had to import something like 2,750,000 bushels of wheat for local consumption? Why did not the duties by which she has been protected sufficiently foster such a primary industry as agriculture to make her people independent of outside supplies? The facts show that many conditions have to be taken into consideration in the formulation of Tariffs, and that to insist upon hard and fast principles in the way the Government have done is not to bring about revenue without destruction, but to destroy in an endeavour to obtain revenue. With regard to the measures foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech, I shall take the attitude which I have always adopted since my first appearance in public life; I shall support such measures as I consider to be in the interests of the whole community, but I shall oppose measures which I think might very well be postponed, or which in my opinion it would be against the public interest to pass. A matter which the Government should deal with as speedily as possible is the selection of the site for the federal capital. This is probably the last session of this House, and certainly the last session of Parliament so far as a number of the members of the Senate are concerned. A great deal of time has been given by honorable members, and a good deal of money has been spent by the Government, in order to qualify this Parliament to arrive at a proper decision upon the matter; but if a decision is not come to this session, a great deal of the work that has been done will be thrown away, because the new members who will no doubt be elected will not be in the same position as ourselves in dealing with the question. To my mind, there has been an unaccountable delay in proceeding with the matter. I do not know the reason for that delay; but I hope that it will not be permitted to continue, and that this Parliament, in fairness to New South Wales, and in the interest of the whole Commonwealth, will be given an opportunity this session to finally settle the question. A measure which I regard as of great importance, and deserving of our best consideration, is the proposed establishment of courts of conciliation to provide a modern, humane, and civilized method of dealing with industrial disputes. Another important measure is that for dealing comprehensively with the registration of patents, and bringing all the States under a uniform patent law. A number of the other measures to which the Government seem to attach more importance might very well give place to such a measure as that. The inventive genius of the Commonwealth is heavily handicapped by the present condition of affairs and by existing legislation. With regard to the defence of the Commonwealth, and the proposed naval agreement, I am of opinion that a Defence Act is necessary in order that our military administration may be put upon a sound footing, and that the friction and dissatisfaction which now exists may be removed. As to the proposed naval subsidy, I would point out that we have already contributed to the old country, for the protection which she has afforded us, an amount aggregating something like £1,250,000, and under the proposed agreement we should have to contribute within the next ten years something like another £2,000,000. This sum may not appear a very large one, but I should like to hear the whole subject more fully discussed before I commit myself in any way in regard to the proposal. It is to our benefit that we should work in harmony with the mother country, but I think that in the end it will be more satisfactory to our own people and to the mother land if we provide for our own defence. I consider naval defence more necessary than land defence, because it is rather late to attack your foe when he has placed his foot within your threshold. It is better to attack him before he reaches our shores. I should like, therefore, to see some system formulated which would give us complete control of our own defences. When we have grown into a nation we must be ready to defend ourselves, and the sooner we commence our preparations on sound lines the better it will be both for ourselves and for the mother country. Now that we have a high Tariff it is necessary that we should pass legislation to prevent the creation of trusts and other mischievous combinations which are likely to arise under it. The Government give great prominence in their programme to measures for the establishment of a High Court and an Inter-State Commission, and the appointment of a High Commissioner to represent the Commonwealth in London. For reasons which seemed good in themselves, they postponed legislation on those subjects from the early part of last session until the present time, and in view of the urgent measures which are now before us, I think they might be left over for a little longer still. If I were convinced that there is an absolute and immediate need for a High Court, an Inter-State Commission, and a High Commissioner, I should be ready at once to support the proposals of the Government, but as it seems to me that the carrying of those proposals into effect will unnecessarily increase federal expenditure, and not do much more than provide big salaries for prominent lawyers, I think they can stand over for a while. I see no reason why, for the present, jurisdiction in regard to federal matters should not be exercised by the State courts, instead of setting up a High Court with the accompanying necessary machinery, to deal with them. If, as I understand, it is the intention of the Government that the minor tribunals of the States are to have federal jurisdiction within certain limitations, I think that similar jurisdiction might be given to the higher State tribunals. It will be time enough to establish federal courts when it is found that they are incompetent—which I do not think they are—or that they have too much

Mr. Brown.

State work to admit of their attention to federal matters. I had intended to say something in regard to the administration of the Post and Telegraph department and one or two other matters, but I will content myself with what I have said upon the Tariff question. I am sure that those who are connected with the pastoral and agricultural interests, and who have been so adversely affected by the operation of the Tariff, will be glad to hear some justification of it from honorable members who so strongly resisted the granting of relief to them in a time of dire need and distress.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Minister for Defence).—I regret that I must occupy the time of honorable members on this occasion, because I realize that it is necessary that we should pass the address in reply and get to the business of the session as soon as possible; but my regret is somewhat mollified by the fact that for nearly a fortnight I have been listening to the speeches of several honorable members who have not appeared to be very desirous of saving time. As I represent a State whose representation in this Chamber is not very large, and as this is probably the only opportunity which I shall have of speaking generally upon matters of public concern, I think that in the interests of the people who sent me here I should take advantage of it. I feel more impelled to speak on this occasion because I represent a State which is altogether isolated from the rest of Australia, and is in much the same position in that respect as an island in the Indian Ocean, 1,000 miles away. One has to travel 1,500 miles by sea in order to reach that State; it is unknown to most honorable members in this House, and is cared for by very few.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No, no.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I judge in this matter from the utterances of honorable members. I very seldom hear anything that I can regard as exhibiting any great concern for the State which I represent. I say again that it appears to me to be cared for by few, in this House or indeed out of it. This, however, is not fair treatment, because Western Australia has been a good friend to Victoria and to every other State in the Commonwealth for many years past, and is so at the present time. I do not intend to refer to all the matters mentioned in the Governor-General's speech.

honorable colleague the Minister and Customs last evening dealt the animadversions upon his action, and I think that he has a right atmosphere. I do not propose anything regarding the case of the which has engaged the attention of the members opposite more perhaps than her matter since we re-assembled, but be silent regarding the case of the Maoris, who came to Australia for the purpose of fulfilling some professional duty. I cannot help saying, however, if it were not that these cases have given the Opposition an opportunity to display their political antagonism to the Government, we should not have heard so much of them. In other words, if they had appeared to be good cards to play from the point of view of those honorable members, they would not have been so much talked of. We have heard a great deal from some quarters with regard to protectionist free-trade; and I believe that all live to be as old as Methuselah shall never hear the end of the controversy. The subject is too good to afford a good line of party argument when there is nothing else to say, and we can come back to the old argument and deal with it as if it were an entirely new one. I shall not enter upon a discussion of the subject, except to say that I do not see how those who advocate a Tariff of something like 15 per cent. can, without any free list, can give free-traders, because a 15 per cent. Tariff constitutes a fairly good protection. I have had experience in this matter. A large number of men who were born in Victoria, and who were protectionists, migrated to Western Australia, and went to the gold-fields in order to improve their position, and now the majority of them are strong free-traders.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—They were sensible men.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No; I do not say that; but their action bears out what I say. I should not be surprised, following up the same line of argument, if the honorable member for Macquarie, who is now a strong free-trader—I do not know whether he always was—did not become an equally strong protectionist if he thought it would suit him better, or rather thought it would suit the country better. My own opinion is that it will require a lot of argument to convince people possessed of ordinary intelligence that it is better to have the manufactured articles we require made for us in other parts of the world rather than to make them for ourselves. If we desire the whole population of the Commonwealth to be engaged in the primary industries, we shall never have a large population. We shall have to encourage manufactures, and do our best to make as much as is possible of what we require, thus affording employment to our own people rather than to the people of other countries. I have heard some observations, principally of an uncomplimentary character, with regard to the administration of the Defence department which I have the honour to control. These remarks have been made by persons who, probably, have not studied the question very much, but who have read in the newspapers that there is disorganization here and there, and have, therefore, concluded that everything has been neglected. It has also been said—I think by the leader of the Opposition—that the Government were unwise in taking over the Defence department before they had a Federal Defence Act; I think the right honorable gentleman went so far as to say that we were without any law to govern the department. That, however, is not the case. We have always had the States Acts in operation, as provision was made in the Constitution that in regard to transferred departments, and pending legislation by the Commonwealth, the laws of the States should continue in force, and that the MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It certainly is a protection of 15 per cent. to the Government produces the article in this paper. Therefore, those who call them free-traders, and in the same breath say they are revenue tariffists, without adding excise on local production in point of fact, protectionists. On many previous occasions stated that they do not believe there is any parallel in either free-trade or protectionist idea is that it is a matter of fact, and that people advocate the policy which they think will pay best. Those who are protectionists to-day will be free-traders to-morrow if they could have their way. I have

Governors of the States should be represented by the Governor-General. The transferred departments have, therefore, been carried on with as perfect legality as when the six separate administrations had control. I think that we should have been very unwise if we had deferred taking over the department until we had passed a Defence Act. In any case, we are in a far better position to deal with the defences now than we should have been if we had delayed taking over the department. We have already done a good deal in the way of instituting reforms, and honorable members must recollect that the defence vote has been reduced during the last two years by almost £250,000. Surely honorable members must know that we could not make such a reduction in the expenditure and still leave everything as it was before. When the full details are placed before honorable members, as they shortly will be, I think they will find that there has been considerable retrenchment and reform, and that the work done has been of a beneficial character. I hope very shortly to lay the Defence Bill upon the table of the House. The Bill is practically ready, and will be presented to honorable members as soon as an opportunity offers. I believe, furthermore, that honorable members will find the Bill of such a character that hostile criticism will prove somewhat difficult. I desire also to say a few words with regard to the federal capital site. We have an obligation to discharge to the whole of the people of Australia by dealing with this question as soon as possible. It was deliberately decided at the Federal Conventions, and approved by the people of Australia, that there should be a federal capital, and I think we should decide, not upon the exact site, perhaps, but upon the district in which the capital is to be situated, as soon as possible. We have heard a great deal about the great expense which will be incurred in the establishment of the capital, but the fears entertained are not well founded. I believe in economy, and I should be very sorry if any one thought otherwise. I have had a good deal to do with the expenditure of public money in my lifetime, and I defy any one to find fault in the expenditure which I have made—millions for the people of Australia. I displayed any extravagance other than careful. Although I spent £12,000,000 of loan moneys in Western Australia during ten years I was Premier of that State, not a single public work was ever authorized by me in that State which, if I had the power to undo to-day, I would undo. There is not one great undertaking that the public opinion of that State would wish to see undone, as far as I am able to judge. I make these remarks for the purpose of showing that I am not a spendthrift, and that I have no desire to see money wastefully expended. But during the period that I have occupied a seat in this House, the conviction has been forced upon me that in the minds of some honorable members a miserable feeling of parsimony and impecuniosity reigns. That feeling seems to have laid hold of this House and of Parliament—for what reason I do not know. Some persons entertain the opinion that we cannot have a federal capital because its construction will cost money. I am satisfied, however, that such a view is entertained only by a lot of croakers—by those who have no faith in their own country, as I shall presently show. If we are to give effect to the provisions of the Constitution, as we are bound to do, there is not the slightest reason in my judgment why we should not incur expenditure upon a federal capital. There is no reason why we should not, if it is necessary, spend a million of money upon that undertaking. What is a million of money?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh! oh!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I thought that my remarks would arouse those who entertain the parsimonious feeling to which I have already referred, and that is the reason which prompted me to make them. The annual interest upon £1,000,000 amounts to £30,000—less than 2d. per head per annum of the population of this country. It does not represent the price of a glass of beer a year to the people of the Commonwealth. Yet we are told that we cannot afford to give effect to the provisions of the Constitution by building a federal capital. It seems to me that some honorable members, as well as the people and the press of this country, have lost their energy and pluck. I say to my fellow Australians—"Do not let us defer carrying out the solemn covenant embodied in the Constitution for the erection of a federal capital through fear that we cannot afford the yearly expenditure of probably 1d. and certainly not more than 2d. per head. Do not let us look back upon the days that are past." Some individuals may have lost a little money in those days, but they must not conclude that the whole country is similarly circumstanced. That is not the condition of the Commonwealth, and there is no reason whatever to defer the selection and occupation of a federal capital. At this stage, if I may be permitted to do so, without trespassing too much upon the time of honorable members, I should like to place upon record my view of the qualifications which a federal capital site should possess. No doubt every honorable member has his own idea upon this subject. I desire that the site selected shall be in New South Wales, in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution. I wish it to be convenient to both those great centres of population—Melbourne and Sydney. It must possess a splendid water supply. Its climate should be cool in summer, and it should not be situated in some uninteresting portion of the country, but should be located in reasonably close proximity to some great natural feature.

MR. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Near Kosciusko.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I do not care whether or not it is near Kosciusko, but I hold that it should be adjacent to some great physical feature which shall be a source of pleasure, recreation, and enjoyment to its residents and its visitors for all time. Another matter referred to in the speech of the Governor-General is that of the High Court. I look upon the establishment of that tribunal as a part of the Constitution.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—What about the expense that will be incurred in its creation?

SIR JOHN FORREST.—There is the question of expense again. The people of the Commonwealth should never have federated under this great Constitution if they were unwilling to incur the expenditure necessary to give effect to its provisions. I have no desire to see extravagance indulged in, but I certainly wish the plan of the Constitution to be completed. To my mind, the High Court is the keystone of that instrument of government. It is just possible that we may be able to economize in other directions. I understand that the Attorney-General at an early date intends to indicate to the House how economies can be effected so that the establishment of the High Court will not prove a large additional burden. Personally I consider that its establishment is absolutely indispensable. My own idea is that there should be an appeal, not only from the High Court of Australia, but from every court throughout the Empire to one Imperial and final tribunal. The idea of Empire is associated with a feeling that there should be one law for the whole of the Empire. There ought not to exist half-a-dozen interpretations of laws upon the same subject, one for Australia, another for South Africa, a third for Canada, and others for other British possessions. If we are to carry on trade and commerce with all parts of the Empire, there should, in my judgment, be one final Court of Appeal.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—We have that already.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—That is not a Court of Appeal such as I desire to see established, because, whilst it is the tribunal which finally determines the disputes in which persons beyond its own territorial limits are involved, another court is provided for the appeals of the residents of the mother country itself. My idea is that there should be one Court of Appeal for the whole Empire. In this connexion I cannot do better than repeat what I said when the present Prime Minister, the Minister for Trade and Customs, and the Attorney-General were in England acting as federal delegates on behalf of Australia. At that time I was Premier of Western Australia, and I was asked my opinion with regard to the right of appeal under the Constitution to the Privy Council. In reply to that question, I telegraphed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies—and I am proud of the view which I then took, because it exactly expresses that which I still hold—as follows :—

I am of opinion that by the possession of one Court of Appeal for the whole British race, whose decisions are final and binding on all the Courts of the Empire, there is constituted a bond between all British people which should be maintained inviolate as the keystone of Imperial unity.

That is my idea of the Court of Appeal that we require in the Empire, and whilst I believe that the High Court will finally settle all matters of constitutional practice in the Commonwealth, still I look forward to the time when we shall be able to appeal, not to the Privy Council as at present constituted, but to a great court of final appeal for the whole Empire. I come now to another matter to which I wish to address myself. It is not the first time that I have spoken in regard to it, nor is it likely to be the last, unless my constituents have no further use for me.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER. — Does the Minister refer to matters of defence?

SIR JOHN FORREST.—In some respects it is a matter of defence. I desire to address myself to the question of railway communication between the eastern and western sides of Australia via Port Augusta in South Australia, and Kalgoorlie, which is the eastern terminus of the Western Australian system. I am sorry to have to speak so strongly on this subject, but I owe a duty to the people who sent me here. If I were to remain silent on an occasion of this kind it is just possible that my action might be misrepresented. A portion of my observations will have reference to the legal difficulties, viz., the legal consent of South and Western Australia, necessary under the Constitution, at present in the way of the Federal Government carrying out the project to which I have referred—difficulties which ought to have been removed long ago, and which I hope will soon vanish. I am the more impelled to speak upon the present occasion, because the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, discussed this matter at length the other evening. I regret that he is not in his place to-day in order that I might speak much more strongly in regard to his action than I feel disposed to do in his absence. I have never listened to a more unfederal speech than that which the honorable member delivered. I do not believe that any honorable member has ever so far forgotten in this House the obligations of the State he represents as did the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, a few nights ago; I do not believe that the “dog-in-the-manger” policy has ever been advocated to the extent that it was by that honorable gentleman. Very similar sentiments were expressed by the leader of the Opposition in another place; but, as I have not the right to criticise what takes place there, I shall simply say that I view the utterances of that honorable and learned gentleman as I view the unfederal words of the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon. In view of the fact that Australia has been federated for more than two years, and that we have come together with a common desire to benefit each other, and to do our best for the whole Commonwealth, I should have thought that no honorable member would have dared to say that the obligations of the State he represents should be cast aside and forgotten. That is really what the honorable member said, as I shall proceed to show. But I have another reason for speaking to-night. It is that I desire the people of South Australia—who are my friends, and who, I am confident, are as honorable and as high-minded as are any people in the Commonwealth—to understand from statements made in this House the real position occupied by South Australia and Western Australia in regard to the construction of this line. I am confident that the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, does not represent the feelings of the people of that State in regard to the undertaking on the part of the Government of South Australia to the people of Western Australia. I thank the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, for what he said last night. I know that he voiced the view held by you, Mr. Speaker, and expressed by you when Premier of South Australia. I know, too, that he voiced the opinions held by my right honorable colleague, the Minister for Trade and Customs, when he was Premier of that State. All three honorable members are in accord, and I prefer to accept their opinion as representing the feeling of the people of South Australia rather than the unfederal utterances of the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon.

MR. FOWLER.—The honorable member had no authority whatever to express those views on behalf of South Australia.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I shall show that prior to federation South Australia never had any objection to the construction of a line from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie. There was a whisper on one occasion as to something in the nature of an objection, but the Government of the State expressed indignation that there should be even a whisper of opposition. I intend to show that the Government, the people, and the press of South Australia all urged and induced Western Australia to enter the federation by promising to assist in advancing the construction of a railway between the two States. If I do not succeed in proving that fact, honorable members will take a view of the obligations of South Australia very different from that held by me. I shall be plain and straightforward in dealing with this matter. I desire that the promises and undertakings made by South Australia to the Government and people of Western Australia, prior to federation, shall be placed once and for all in the records of this House.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—They do not bind the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not speaking of the Commonwealth. My object is to show the people of South Australia that they are under an obligation to give their consent to the construction of this line. Before doing so, however, I have a very pleasant duty to perform. I have to thank the leader of the Opposition for his generous words and the encouragement he has given the people of Western Australia in regard to this great project, which is of so much importance to them as part of the Federation. I do not for one moment assert that there is any stated obligation on the part of this House as a body to support the construction of the line, but there is an obligation on the part of some honorable members to do so. The leader of the Opposition is in accord with the Government in regard to this matter; and the Government have no doubt as to the desirableness of the work if it is found practicable.

Mr. FOWLER.—The leader of the Opposition goes further than the Government do. He would build the line at once.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall come to that matter presently. The Government have no doubt as to the necessity of the work if it is reasonably possible to carry it out.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—The right honorable member does not think we have sufficient information before us to enable us to decide the matter now?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not reached that point. Like the Government, the leader of the Opposition has no doubt about the matter. The following is a report of the speech which, as leader of the Opposition, he delivered at Kalgoorlie on the 27th January last :—

Now there was one little bit of equity which the Federal Government had got to do to the State of Western Australia, and that was to build a railway to connect it with the other States. From the first moment the federal compact was signed he had always publicly stated that, although there was no written agreement about it, it was always regarded as a tacit understanding, upon the strength of which Western Australia had consented to join the federation.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—That was only the right honorable member's personal opinion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not seeking to bind any one else to this statement.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—But the right honorable gentleman said the right honorable member spoke as leader of the Opposition.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall do so again. No doubt when the right honorable member spoke he felt the responsibility that rested upon him as leader of the Opposition, and the right honorable gentleman stated that he spoke in that capacity. I desire to thank him for what he said then, and also for the generosity with which he viewed the question. I come now to the position of South Australia. In 1897—which was the Diamond Jubilee year—I was Premier of Western Australia, while my right honorable colleague, the Minister for Trade and Customs, was Premier of South Australia. On the 28th of May of that year, while we were both on our way to England, you, Mr. Speaker, as Acting Premier of South Australia, addressed the following letter to my colleague Mr. Wittenoom who was Acting Premier of Western Australia :—

Sir,—This Government has obtained reports and estimates for the construction of a railway on the 3-ft. 6-in. gauge from Port Augusta to a point on the border of South and Western Australia, about 470 miles from Kalgoorlie. I should be glad to learn whether your Government is prepared to unite with us by carrying out the work from the border to connect with your line, should we carry the line to your border.

Mr. Wittenoom, who was acting for me, seems to have given the matter but little consideration, and on 8th June, 1897, he made a formal reply in these words—

In reply to your letter of the 18th ult., I have the honour to intimate to you that this Government is not prepared at present to construct a railway to the South Australian border.

I have no hesitation in saying that this was merely intended as a formal reply to the communication from South Australia, but I regret very much that it was ever sent. As I said before, I was away at the time of its receipt, and I did not hear of it, nor of the reply sent by Mr. Wittenoom, until 1899—two years afterwards. As soon as I learned of the correspondence, I addressed a letter to the Premier of South Australia in these words—22nd Aug., 1899.

Sir,—With further reference to your letter of 28th May, 1897, (marked C. P. W. 1258-95 in margin) I have the honour to inform you that the present Government has always been anxious to have this colony connected by rail with the railway system of South Australia, and is prepared to do all in his power to further the carrying out of the work.

The reply given by Mr. Wittenoom to the above-mentioned letter during my absence from the colony, and which has recently come before me for the first time, could only have been intended to mean that at that moment he was not prepared to arrange to provide the funds necessary to construct the portion of the proposed railway in this colony to connect with your border.

I will add that you are aware that it has always been a part of my declared public policy to have this railway undertaken and completed, and, therefore, if your Government is able to consider the question favorably I will be glad to enter into negotiations with you as to the best means to be adopted in order to carry out this great and desirable work.

To this I received the following telegraphic reply, dated 28th August, 1899—

Replying your letter 22nd inst. just received, South Australia, as already intimated, favours federal undertaking of railway connecting east and west.

C. C. KINGSTON, Premier.

I was not quite satisfied with that reply, as I had not made any reference in my letter to the construction of the line by the Federal Government. My request was that the work should be undertaken by the Governments of the two States interested. I therefore sent the following telegram to Mr. Kingston on the 1st September, 1899—

Shall be obliged for reply by letter to mine in reference to railway. You will notice that the question of the Federal Government building the railway is not raised in my letter.

In answer to that message I received the following telegram, dated 4th September, 1899—

We can add little to our wire of 28th ult. When we wrote you in June, 1897, we should have been glad to arrange for construction of the railway by our two colonies, but your Government declined to join in doing this. Now the position is altered, for with federation assured the federal construction of the railway is in our opinion undoubtedly the best means for carrying out this great Australian undertaking. We hope that it will not be long before Western Australians and South Australians are co-operating in the Parliament of the Commonwealth to bring this about, and we repeat that you can rely on South Australia's sympathy and support.

Sir John Forrest.

That telegram was signed by Mr. Kingston, as Premier of South Australia. Shortly before the time when this correspondence passed between the Governments of the two States, namely, on the 19th April, 1899. I received a letter from Mr. Kingston, who was then Premier of South Australia, written with the object of inducing the people of Western Australia to join the Federation. This is what he said—

Sir,—As desired, I have the honour to forward herewith three copies of our Commonwealth Act Amendment Bill, pursuant to which and our Federal Enabling Act 1895, we propose, on the 29th of this month, taking a referendum of our electors on the question of the acceptance of the Commonwealth Bill as proposed to be amended at the last Premiers' Conference. We are sanguine that the decision of the people to accept federation, which was pronounced by a two to one majority in this colony in June last, will be repeated.

Will you pardon my taking the opportunity of expressing the sincerest hope that Western Australia will, as heretofore, keep pace with the general federal advance. All the other colonies will, no doubt, be included. To you, who are so familiar with the general advantages of federation, it would be idle to dwell upon them. But the relations between Western Australia and the other colonies—I speak especially for South Australia—have been always so cordial, that I am sure it would be a source of infinite regret to all if Western Australia were even temporarily omitted from the closer union, so long contemplated, so ardently contended for, and apparently so readily capable of consummation by all.

Our near constitutional connexion resulting from federation is in itself a boon of great worth to all included within its sphere. I cannot help thinking, also, that it must at no very distant date result in the connexion of east and west by rail through the medium, say, of a line between Port Augusta and your gold-fields. This would, indeed, be an Australian work worthy of undertaking by a federal authority on behalf of the nation, in pursuance of the authorities contained in the Commonwealth Bill. It is, of course, a work of special interest to Western Australia and South Australia; and I devoutly hope that the day is not far distant when the representatives of Western Australia and South Australia may, in their places in a Federal Parliament, be found working side by side for the advancement of Australian interests in this and other matters of national concern.

That letter shows how earnest my right honorable colleague was. Two months afterwards he appears to have seen a telegraphic report to the effect that a colleague of mine, Mr. Piesse, who for many years was Commissioner of Railways in Western Australia, had stated at some meeting that he had been upon a visit to Adelaide, and had there heard many people say to show what was the feeling of South Australia, and what were the actions of its Government in regard to this matter. It is of no use to cry after the thing is over, but I say deliberately, in the face of this House and of the people of Australia, that if for a moment I had thought that South Australia would bar the construction of this railway, and that Western Australia would have to remain for any length of time isolated, far-distant, and unconnected with the rest of Australia, nothing in the world would have induced me to lend my help and my voice to the carrying of federation in that State. Federation, so far as Western Australia is concerned, is, and always will be, a sham, and will never be satisfactory to the people of that State while they are cut off from communication by railway with the rest of Australia. In order to further pave the way towards the acceptance of federation by Western Australia,

I, in the early part of 1900, took, at my own expense, a journey to these States, so that I might interview the Premiers then in office, and obtain assurances which would make it easier for Western Australia to throw in her lot with the Eastern States. I obtained very little encouragement, however, and I have often said since that it seemed to me that those who were guiding the ship of State at the time would rather spoil federation by allowing Western Australia to remain outside the union than grant the one or two small requests made by Western Australia. One little request I made was that the provision in the Constitution which allowed South Australia to raise a bar to the construction of a transcontinental line should be removed; but the Premiers whom I met said that the Bill could not be altered, though, notwithstanding that statement, it was altered in far more important particulars in London. I do not, however, now wish to find fault with any one; all I am trying to do is to show that I did my best to obtain the amendment I speak of. I had told the people of Western Australia that no South Australian Government would be likely to ever object to the construction of the railway.
But when one is making a bargain it is just as well, in a matter of this sort at any rate, to have the undertaking in writing. We should have had some safeguard in the Bill. Those who opposed me, said to the people—"Trust the people of South Australia; trust the Commonwealth;

we do not want any special provision in the Bill; we take it for granted that all will be right. South Australia will never object to the construction of the line; see the assurances which her public men have given." But although I got no satisfaction from the Premiers of most of the eastern States, Mr. Speaker, who at the time was Premier of South Australia, and to whom I explained the difficulties of the position, was good enough to write me the following letter, on the 1st February, 1900, just as I was about to return to my own State:—

Following our conversation as to the possible blocking of the construction of a railway line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta by the Federal authority, by South Australia refusing the consent rendered necessary by section XXXIV. of clause 51 of the Commonwealth Bill, to the construction of the line through her territory, I regard the withholding of consent as a most improbable thing, in fact, quite out of the question. To assure you of our attitude in the matter, I will undertake as soon as the federation is established, Western and South Australia both being States of the Commonwealth, to introduce a Bill, formally giving the assent of this province to the construction of the line by the federal authority, and to pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill in your Parliament. I returned to Western Australia with that letter, and published it far and wide. It was one of the reasons, amongst many others, which I felt justified me in not further insisting upon an amendment of the draft Constitution.

MR. FOWLER.—Surely a sufficient reason, too!

SIR JOHN FORREST.—But what has taken place? I have seen in the reports of the debates of the Senate that a South Australian senator has said that—

The construction of this railway will put a very serious strain on the federal spirit of South Australia.

Honorable members also heard what the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, said the other night.

MR. WILKS.—And what the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, said.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I am glad that the honorable member has reminded me of that utterance. The honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, said that a transcontinental railway running north from Onadatta to Port Darwin was of more importance than a railway running to Western Australia. But a line running north would terminate at a place where at the present time there are very few people besides 2,000 or 3,000 Chinamen, a line running west would reach the shores of the continent, and would be with a country with a population of white people, with a trade, speaking memory, of £15,000,000 a year, revenue of £3,500,000, with a production of gold of £40,000,000 with an annual output of gold worth £8,000,000—one of the most flourishing States of the Commonwealth. Such a line would go through Kalgoorlie andgardie, places 400 miles from the coast, which have already produced gold to the value of nearly £30,000,000. It is therefore take me a long while to understand the reasoning which led the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, to the conclusion that a railway to Port Darwin is more important to Australia than a railway to the State of Western Australia. The honorable gentleman referred to the mail service to Europe, which he thinks will soon come viâ Port Darwin. No doubt it is very important that mails and passengers from abroad should reach here more quickly than they do now; but that is not the primary reason why I advocate a transcontinental railway. I ask for the construction of that line, so that Western Australia may be in reality and not merely a part of the Commonwealth; so that she may enjoy her full share of the benefits of federation, by being united to the other States, and thus have intercommunication with them for the carriage of passengers, mails, and for the purpose of trade and commerce generally. It is not because mail steamers stop at Fremantle that I primarily wish the railway to be constructed; I would advocate its construction as soon as I do now even if the mail service did not come to Fremantle. So, as you like, federation can never be a reality, its effect must be seen until it is seen. To make the evidence have the people of Western Australia of the fact that they are a part of the Commonwealth? There is no doubt ever. They may as well be on a desert in the Indian Ocean, as far as federation is concerned, as continue in their present condition. The undertaking given by half of the Government of South Australia must be fulfilled, and I believe and will be. I cannot, however, refrain from

Whatever the cause may be, the ains that South Australia has delayed the carrying out of the obligation which I say most deliberately rests upon her, and I hope that no further time will be lost. I feel quite sure that if the people of South Australia had an opportunity of expressing their views they would not show any disposition to defer a work which must be of great benefit to them and to Australia. One can hardly understand opposition on the part of a State which is within the federation to a railway which is intended to connect the two sides of the continent. The construction of this railway was one of the great advantages assured to the people of Western Australia before federation was agreed to, and it is difficult to conceive what federal feeling can exist in the minds of those who would prevent this railway from being constructed. I have already said that honorable members seem to have a burden of impecuniosity resting upon them. They seem to be afraid of spending any money, even upon a railway such as that now projected. It does not matter, apparently, how desirable the work may be,

or how much revenue it will produce; all that seems to occupy a place in the mental view of some persons is the £4,000,000 which will have to be spent. Honorable members do not ask for any particulars, except as to cost; they lose sight of all the advantages which may be derived by the Commonwealth as a whole. I assure honorable members, however, that this railway will never become a burden on the people of Australia, as it will pay its way within two years after its completion.
I am not an adventurer, or a spendthrift, or a visionary, nor do I make this statement without knowledge, or a feeling of responsibility. I have built many hundreds of miles of railway in my time, and I have taken the full responsibility of many works. I have undertaken great obligations, and I am certainly not willing now to commit the Commonwealth to any work that is likely to prove a burden for all time. If I were to do anything of that kind, it would recoil upon me as it would have done when I was connected with the State Government. I always knew when I was controlling the affairs of Western Australia that if I committed the people to undertakings which proved burdensome, I should stand discredited, and that, therefore, it would be suicidal for me to do anything without the most careful consideration.
I do not regret my action in regard to any of the great works which I have carried out. I have very good reason for saying that the proposed railway will pay. Do honorable members consider that the South Australian Government have called for tenders for the construction of a railway from Oodnadatta, which is 700 miles north of Adelaide, to Pine Creek, in the Northern Territory—a distance of about 1,100 miles, and that they have offered an immense area of land, 90,000,000 acres I believe, to the syndicate which undertakes the work? I hope they will succeed in getting it carried out, but I regard the proposed railway to Western Australia as being in an entirely different category. It is not to have one of its terminal points at an isolated port in the tropics of Australia, but is intended to bring a large population of white people in Western Australia into connexion with their countrymen in the eastern States. At the present time from 30,000 to 40,000 people travel to and fro by ship between Eastern Australia and Western Australia, and this number would be largely increased if there was railway communication. I ask honorable members to look seriously at this matter, and to consider whether we cannot build the railway, and at once obtain the control of 1,100 miles of line. I suppose we all look forward to the time when the Federation will take over the control of the whole of the railways of Australia, and we should not make a bad start if we commenced with the construction of the railway 1,100 miles in length to connect with the Western Australian railway system. If we say that we cannot undertake the work the Western Australian Government, however anxious they might be, would not be able to build the whole of the railway. If they were willing to build their own 475 miles, the South Australian Government might not respond by constructing the 625 miles of line which would pass through their territory. The only alternative, therefore, would be for the Governments interested to ask a private company to construct the line. Supposing that this were done—even though the land grant system were not introduced except to the extent of giving the company a few thousand acres here and there along the line—would honorable members be willing to hand over that line to a private company for all time? for ever?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No.

Sir John Forrest.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then we had better set to work and see if we cannot build it for ourselves. We may depend upon it that the line will have to be constructed. Possibly, as the South Australian Government have agreed to the building of a line to Port Darwin on the land grant system, they may not prove unwilling to allow their section of the Western Australian line to be constructed under similar conditions. I do not know what are the views of the Western Australian Government upon that question, but the point for our consideration is whether it would be better for us to undertake the work, and start in business as railway owners with this 1,100 miles, or leave it to be constructed by a private company on the land grant system, or by other means. I want honorable members to dispel their fears about spending a little money, and to undertake the construction of this railway without any apprehension that it will become a burden upon the Commonwealth. The financial position of a country is not to be considered upon the basis of the amount which she owes, but rather with regard to the way in which her money is invested. If we receive in the form of profit more than sufficient to pay the interest on the money borrowed, no one can say that the investment is a burden on the people. If we were all to be judged by the amount of our liabilities, without consideration of our assets, most of us would be regarded as insolvent. Therefore we should look, not at the first cost of the railway, but at its promise as a commercial undertaking. I do not see why the Commonwealth with its £10,000,000 of revenue should be afraid of incurring liability, in embarking upon an enterprise not only absolutely necessary for the purposes of federation, but also a work that will pay its way. When I was the Premier of Western Australia I introduced and passed Loan Bills in one session amounting to over £7,000,000. The population of the State was then not more than 150,000, and yet we borrowed the money knowing full well that we were investing it in such a way as would advance the general interests of the country by constructing great, important, and necessary public works. I took the whole responsibility, and no one to this day can cast any reproach at me in regard to the works then undertaken, including the great Coolgardie water scheme, upon which we spent £2,500,000, on the

that they were not legitimate or reasonable. Honorable members of this House, on the other hand, seem to regard the issue of a £5 note as a piece of wild extravagance. The building of this railway in Western Australia is not a South Australian or a Western Australian matter, and I will not regard it as a Federal matter. I can have very little faith in their timidity. I have not been accustomed to such timidity upon the part of the Government. I was for many years at the head of a small State with a comparatively small revenue, but I was never parsimonious until I came here to such a degree as that exhibited here in regard to necessary works. In this matter I would direct the attention of the members to the recent remarks of a British statesman, because they express my own sentiments. This man said—

“It is the large schemes that succeed. The small schemes are peddling and shrinking nowadays. We want to succeed must risk something, and we find its own reward.”

These are the sentiments which should inspire us.

If we are afraid to face great issues having for their object the good of the people of this country and the opening up of its vast resources, we shall be unequal to our duty and to our responsibility, and we shall despair of our being able, in the future, at any rate, to make this Commonwealth either great or prosperous. I have said all that I desire to say in regard to the construction of the trans-Australian railway. There is just one matter, however, concerning which I wish to say a few words. I shall not say much upon it, because in a few days the Minister will have an opportunity of placing it before honorable members in more eloquent terms than I can.

At the same time, as the Minister is the head of the Defence Department, I think that I ought to say a few words in regard to the Naval agreement. The Minister went to England with the consent and approval of this Parliament, and it was never expected that he would do nothing while he was there. He was to leave the ultimate decision of the matter in the hands of this Parliament, but it was surely never anticipated that he should sit idly by and do nothing. It was an opportunity of meeting and conversing with the most eminent men in England upon the question of naval defence, and, subject to the approval of Parliament, he entered into an agreement based upon conditions which he thought would meet with the approval of this House. In arriving at that agreement, no doubt he had in his mind the views which honorable members expressed during the discussion of the Defence Bill last session. I have perused the speeches delivered upon that occasion—I was not present at the time—and I find that out of eighteen speeches upon the subject, fifteen were practically in accord with the agreement into which the Prime Minister has entered. There were only three speakers who in any way dissented from the general views contained in that agreement. I do not pretend to be a military or a naval expert—my career has led me in the paths of peace—but I have formed the opinion that the 4,000,000 people in Australia are not called upon to embark upon great schemes connected with naval defence. In the early days of our federal union, we had better concentrate, as far as we can, our attention upon the improvement of our country by attempting to make “two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before.” We should endeavour to settle the people upon the land rather than unnecessarily undertake great schemes of naval defence. The idea of creating and maintaining an Australian fleet, whilst very satisfying from a sentimental standpoint, is one that we need not seriously entertain just now. By assisting the mother country in our naval defence, we can get a far better measure of protection, at an infinitely less cost, than we could derive from the creation of a navy of our own. I thoroughly believe that the people of Australia are really fond of the mother country. In their hearts they wish to do all that they can to make the Empire great and prosperous. It is not only in the interests of our kindred in the old land that we should do so, but it is also in our own interests. We must recognise that our interests are those of the Empire. “Our fate and theirs for good or ill are woven threads”—we are one. For all the purposes of naval defence and British supremacy, the people of the Commonwealth are exactly in the same position as are those of the United Kingdom. We are all aware that the taxpayers of the mother country who number about 40,000,000 odd, contribute £34,000,000 annually in providing for the Empire's naval supremacy. That expenditure is not incurred for the defence of Great Britain alone, but for the defence of every possession of the Crown throughout the world. Some one said the other day that I advocated the adoption of a scheme under which Australia should contribute to the naval defence of the Empire upon the basis of population. I never did any such thing. I knew that such a course was absolutely impracticable.

Mr. CROUCH.—It has been advocated.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know nothing about that—I have never advocated it. If the Commonwealth were to support the Empire's navy upon the basis of population, her contribution would be £3,500,000 annually; but under the agreement into which the Prime Minister has entered, we are asked to assist the mother country only to the extent of one-seventeenth of that amount, viz. £200,000.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is only the beginning.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have the very greatest respect for the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne; in fact, I regard him as one of my dearest friends; but in this matter we are as far apart as the poles. We shall never agree in regard to the Empire's naval defence. We Australians are a proud people, proud of our country, and of the mother land. Is it to be suggested, then, that while we are willing to participate in all the advantages conferred upon us by being British subjects, we are unwilling to assist in bearing the burdens of the naval defence of the Empire to the smallest extent? Shall we say—"Let our countrymen in the mother land continue to pay £34,000,000 annually! We will continue to enjoy all the advantages under which we have been fostered and protected, but will decline to pay 1s. per head towards their cost."

Mr. CROUCH.—Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If those are the sentiments of the honorable and learned member for Corio, he and I, too, are as far apart as the poles. My views are all in the other direction. I do not know why it is so, but it seems to me that there are some honorable members of this House who were born and nurtured in the old country, who have enjoyed its protection, all its advantages, in their youth, who seem to be less patriotic than those who, like myself, were born and nurtured in Australia. In this connexion, to such an one, I feel inclined to quote the words of Sir Walter Scott, but I will refrain from doing so. It has been stated that if Australia did not exist, the mother land could not do with one war-ship less, or spend one pound less upon naval defence than she does at the present time. But are we so poor and mean that we are content to allow the taxpayers at home to do all, whilst we do nothing? Surely not.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Which is the best way to help her?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—"I had rather be a dog and bay the moon than such a Briton." Looking at the matter from the very meanest standpoint, namely, the monetary, I hold that it will pay us to approve of the agreement into which the Prime Minister has entered. Under it we shall contribute only a small sum for an immense service. A great deal more than we contribute will be expended in this country, and thousands of Australians will receive a naval training, and a large number will be found permanent employment. We have frequently heard the familiar saying, which by this time ought to be worn threadbare, that there should be no taxation without representation. Only the other day I saw in one leading journal a statement to the effect that Australia had contributed £106,000 annually to the Australian auxiliary squadron for ten years, and that she had nothing to show for the expenditure. That is thought to be a terrible indictment to make. Why, even if the contribution were regarded as a sort of insurance premium, the money would have been well spent. Australia occupies just the same position in regard to it as does any individual who has for a number of years insured his valuable premises without getting the place burnt down. He has paid his money, and has nothing but his house safe and sound to show for it. Is there anything in this contention after all? To my mind it is special pleading, and depends on the ignorance of its readers for any effect. We spend millions of pounds annually in interest upon borrowed money, and similarly we spend thousands of pounds upon external contracts, without having any representation. To my mind, the fact that we entered into this agreement ten years ago should be quite sufficient.

We have paid the money for the service rendered, and we have as much representation as we have in reference to the payment of interest on our debts, or in relation to any other contracts for a term of years that we enter into beyond Australia. But this is not a contract to be carried out beyond Australia, for the money, together with a much larger sum than we shall contribute, will be spent here. If we had our own navy, what should we have to show for the money expended upon it when our vessels became obsolete? How many hundreds of thousands of pounds have been expended upon the local naval forces of the States?

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But is it not insurance?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would be, if the service were efficient. But although our local naval forces are composed of capable men, who are fit to do excellent service at any time, we are not in a position to meet a foe outside the Queenscliff heads or elsewhere. I speak with some authority, that is, if I can place any confidence in my advisers.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—What did the Governor of Victoria, Sir George Clarke, say in his recent speech in the Town Hall, relative to our defences?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I cannot say.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But the right honorable gentleman was present.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say that if a powerful foreign warship appeared on the Australian coast we have not a ship belonging to our local naval forces that could show her nose outside the harbors, notwithstanding that we have spent hundreds of thousands of pounds on our local naval forces.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—The right honorable gentleman appears to lose sight of the auxiliary squadron.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not referring to the auxiliary squadron. I am speaking of the local or State naval ships upon which so much has been spent. If we had the Gazundah, the Paluma, the Protector, and the Cerberus in Hobson's Bay there would not be one of them able to show out beyond the Queenscliff heads in the case of the presence of a powerful foreign warship outside. What has become of all the money spent on our local naval forces? I am not complaining, but members say we require representation, but I assert that we want efficiency and that we have the same representation as we have in many other matters.

Mr. McDONALD.—We had representation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But we have no ships to send out to sea. The time has arrived when we must have efficiency, and the only way in which to secure that efficiency is to accept this agreement. No doubt if Parliament were willing to spend £5,000,000 or £6,000,000, we should be able to obtain, purchase, and maintain powerful war-ships, but the maintenance and interest would amount to £1,000,000 a year. I have correctly set forth the position in regard to the hundreds of thousands of pounds that the States have already spent on local naval defence. I feel certain that the Parliament will approve of this agreement which will only be for a limited number of years, and I utterly repudiate the suggestion that it will really mean taxation without representation.

Mr. McDONALD.—What voice should we have in the disposal of the vessels if war were declared?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We should have something better than any mere agreement could give us. We should have the strong arm, good will, and affection of the mother country, which has never deserted, and will never desert, the British people wherever they may be.

Mr. McDONALD.—But where is the representation?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In this case we are asked to pay £200,000 a year, and practically we shall have the protection of a fleet which costs the taxpayers of England over £34,000,000 a year.

Mr. McDONALD.—That fleet could be withdrawn from our shores at any moment.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member would not trust any one, not even those who hold the reins of power, in trust for the British race throughout the world, in the mother country. This great Empire of ours has not in the past, and will not in the future be carried on without a spirit of trustfulness.

Mr. McDONALD.—But we have been told that what I have stated will occur.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is taking a very narrow view of the matter. Although it is thought best to have but one control, that does not mean that we shall be neglected, that we shall be treated as if we were not part of and did not belong to the nation. The more generous and the more trustful we are in our dealings with others, the better they will be to us. It seems to me that mere bonds of pen and ink and paper will not bind us together in times of difficulty and stress. I desire honorable members to take a broad-minded, patriotic view of this vital matter. Let us realize that our Empire demands that we shall have the supremacy of the sea, and let us do all that we can to assist in maintaining that supremacy in our own interests, and in the interests of our country.

Mr. A. PATERSON (Capricornia).—In following the Minister for Defence, I feel very humble—as humble as Uriah Heep. I may add that I am also deeply indebted to the Minister, because his inspiring patriotic speech has electrified the atmosphere of the Chamber, and greatly elevated the tone of the debate. I do not say that I agree with everything that has been said by the right honorable gentleman, although I most heartily admired the spirit in which it was delivered. I shall not occupy the attention of the House for any length of time. I shall refer to only two of the measures mentioned in the Governor-General's speech. The first relates to the establishment of the High Court. I have listened with devout interest to all the references made to this subject by the various speakers who have contributed to the debate, and I must say that I am rather perplexed at the diversity of opinions which prevail. Some honorable members speak of the supremacy, urgency, and importance of the High Court in relation to the Constitution, and the right honorable member who preceded me stated that it was absolutely necessary as the complement of the Constitution. Other speakers have said in another place that it is impossible to work the Constitution in the absence of a High Court. We tremble, therefore, when we think of the terrible consequences which might result to Australia if any accident happened to this measure, and if we were left to carry on with a maimed and crippled Constitution. One would think that some honorable members looked upon the Constitution as an old battered hulk fighting in the midst of a storm, its masts and sails and rudder gone, and the crew working at the pumps to save their very lives. I do not think we need take such a pessimistic view of the position. In these alarming circumstances the neophyte in politics—the man entirely unskilled in legal customs—must look entirely to those experienced and learned in the law. I have looked to the honorable member for Northern Melbourne, but he does not seem to be in the least dismayed at the prospect of having to carry on with a maimed Constitution. In fact he laughs. He says—"The Constitution is all right," and he makes the pithy remark, which puts the whole matter in a nutshell. "Wait till the shoe pinches; wait till there is an absolute necessity for this High Court before you go to the expense of establishing it." I thoroughly agree with the honorable and learned member. Further, he invites Parliament to take Canada as an example. We are all very fond of pointing to Canada as an example to be followed. The Government, when it suits them, have a particular affection for that country. If they desire a double-barrelled duty they quote Canada, and in this connexion I would say that in one case we have actually adopted the Canadian expedient of a double-barrelled duty. I think we cannot do better than follow Canada's example in this case, and wait for ten years, as they did, or at all events until the expiration of the period covered by the Braddon clause, about which I shall have a word to say presently. I look also to the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and I observed that he is perfectly placid and unmoved. What does he say? He says that the creation of the High Court would now be premature, and that it will not be required for another generation. On going into figures, he appeals to every business man by stating that the appeals to the Privy Council have averaged only twelve per annum for the last twenty years. Again we turn to another honorable and learned member. I refer to the honorable member for Werriwa. He tells us that appeals to the Privy Council are always decided with the utmost impartiality. I should naturally think that if one desired an absolutely unbiased judgment on questions of law, he would be far more likely to obtain it from the Privy Council than from a purely Australian Court. I am a very patriotic Australian, yet I think the balance lies in favour of the English Court, so far as the question of purity is concerned. The only thing I do not like about the Privy Council is that it is so strongly branded with the mark of St.

and St. George. As far as the layman can see, I believe that the nation is doing very well—that it is good work. I believe that instead of a shattered hulk she is a handsome ship, that she is sailing in summer seas with all sails set to the best advantage, except, perhaps, she has to sail with a sky-sail less, or but this gives her less top-hamper, makes her very much safer and steadier in a storm. There is only one fear—reference to the Constitution that has been called objectionable, and repeated use has been made to it. I speak of the Braddon blot. I think the Government is extremely thankful for the Braddon blot. It was a magnificent conception. A refuge it affords the Prime Minister; that a godsend it is to the Treasurer; a bulwark for the Ministry; what a reckless, unbridled extravagance.

You ask the genial and courteous Premier for a cheque for old-age pension and he says—"I should be delighted to give it to you, but here is the Braddon blot which prevents me from doing so." I thought strikes me that perhaps the Government of those provisions expected that he would be the Commonwealth Treasurer. If he has decided against him. In any case that, instead of being regarded as a blot on the Constitution, they should be regarded as its saving clauses. I have listened to the arguments in favour of the establishment of a Federal High Court, and only one which influences me is that of the Australian Court of Appeal. I have sympathy with that object. Nearly all my family were born in Australia, and Australia saved my life when I was a mere child so that I am Australian to the heart. But in dealing with this we cannot escape the fact that we have to economize. Notwithstanding the breezy spirit of the Minister for Finance, we, as business men intrusted with the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth, must show an economy of economy. When in Queensland, I found that an extraordinary extravagance existed in the minds of my constituents in regard to the federal expenditure. They seemed all to be impressed with the idea that the Commonwealth is heading for perdition because of extravagance, and in the interests of fair play and I hope I shall never be deficient in the spirit of justice—I had actually to fight the cause of the Government, and to win credit, not from my own side, but from the supporters of the Ministry. I had to explain that instead of the Commonwealth being extravagant it was sometimes, in my opinion, too much inclined towards parsimony. But now that I have returned, and find this proposal for the establishment of a High Court in the forefront of the Government programme, I am forced to reconsider the position. Is this a time for imposing fresh burdens upon the already overburdened taxpayer? Honorable members do not seem to realize the tremendous distress which exists in Queensland. Nearly the whole of the cattle owners there have been absolutely ruined. Wealthy men, who could afford to come to Melbourne and spend their money freely, are penniless. Indeed, the breeders of cattle have been particularly hard hit, because they had no sooner got through the tremendous disaster in which the tick pest involved them, than they were overtaken by the recent frightful drought, which has caused the loss of millions of cattle and of sheep. When I was last at Rockhampton I could not speak for a week, because I felt so disheartened at the signs of distress in the town. Men who had been getting good wages, and whom I had paid myself, were begging in the streets for 6d. to buy a meal. Yet we are asked to throw away a large sum of money in the establishment of a High Court, which perhaps we do not need at all, and which we can, at any rate, do without for the next ten or twenty years.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable member does not say that the conditions which he has described exist in Queensland to-day?

Mr. A. PATERSON.—Things are not quite so bad as they were. Rain fell on the day upon which I left Clermont.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—When was that?

Mr. A. PATERSON.—That was in December last. But any one who has had experience knows that it will be many years before Queensland can recover her former position. Only to-day I was speaking on the subject with a bank manager who has come from that State, and he shares that opinion. Owing to the scarcity of young stock, the effects of the drought will be felt for many years to come. Is this then a time in which to propose fresh expenditure? Many of the States are now exercising the most severe and rigid economy. Look at the economies which Queensland is effecting. The retrenchments in the public service there have been extremely severe. What a howl we should have heard if one half of what has been done in Queensland were done in Victoria. North, south, east, and west the people are crying for bread, and what do we offer them? A Judiciary Bill! We ask, "What do you want with bread? Look at the magnificent Bill we are giving you. We propose to give bread and butter to the Judges of our High Court, but you can go and work." There are thousands of men still out of employment, while many others have been driven in distress from the country. They ask us, "What are you going to do for us?" and our reply is, "We are going to establish a High Court where you will have justice administered in the purest manner possible." What do these men care for justice? They want bread. They do not want justice at the expense of further taxation. The position reminds me of the trial trip of a steamer which I once attended at home. There was the usual fashionable company on board, and fine speeches had been made by the magnates present, when an inquiring shareholder asked, "But what about the dividends?" He received the reply, "Do you expect dividends with two lords on the board?" We are going to have five new law lords on the bench, though I heard a lawyer say that he did not believe that a Federal High Court was required, or, at any rate, that we could do without it. In my opinion, it is desirable that we should have this judicial court as soon as we can, that is, as soon as we have work for the Judges. But it is a piece of unpardonable extravagance to propose its establishment at a time when every shilling of the revenue is required for other purposes. I mistake the temper of the Australian people very much if they do not show themselves extremely indignant at the attitude of the Government in regard to this question. I feel certain that if a referendum were taken upon it, the result would be an enormous defeat for the Government.

MR. DEAKIN.—Not if the people understood the subject.

MR. A. PATERSON.—Of course, it is said that laymen cannot understand these legal matters.

MR. DEAKIN.—This is a matter which they could easily be made to understand.

MR. A. PATERSON.—Look at the enormous cost of the proposed court. We are to expend £30,000 a year to begin with.

MR. DEAKIN.—I gave the House £30,000 as an estimate which, I explained at the time, would cover not only the salaries of the Judges and their officers, but that of the Crown Solicitor as well; in fact the whole administrative body of the court.

MR. A. PATERSON.—I remember the magnificent oration which the Attorney-General delivered when he first proposed the establishment of this court. The impression which it left upon my mind is so distinct that I can hardly believe that fourteen months have passed since it was delivered. If a vote had been taken on the question immediately after his speech, I am afraid that some of us would have forfeited our reputation for consistency by voting bald-headed for the Bill. But, fortunately, we had time for reflection, and it has done us good. In addition to the £30,000 which is the cost of the court as estimated by the Attorney-General, there are the pensions of the Judges to be reckoned. I never heard of Judges anywhere going without pensions, and the pensions of these learned law lords would amount to a large sum. First we are asked to create a great Valhalla, and then, when these great law lords enter it, we are to hand to them the apples of immortality, in the shape of pensions. It is a singular thing about pensions that, although the poor pensioners who are in receipt of 5s. a week die off like flies, the pensioners who get £1,000 a year are immortal, they live for ever, and when one of them dies by inadvertence the country says, "Thank God!" Is not that a humiliating thing? In my opinion it would be better not to give pensions, but to make the salaries sufficiently large to enable their recipients to make their own provision for old age and infirmity. I would like to see the money which a High Court would cost, not put into the bank, but judiciously and properly expended: and I believe that it could not be invested to greater advantage to the Commonwealth than by increasing our naval defences for the protection of our hearths and homes. On the question of defence I am a narrow-minded Australian throughout. With regard to the Naval agreement, I think that even assuming that all the other conditions are acceptable the proposed term of ten years is too long. I quite understand that when the Prime Minister was at home he did not wish to appear too mean, and neither do I. I want to see Australia act a generous part rather than otherwise. The amount which it is proposed to give the Imperial Government, £200,000, is comparatively unimportant. As the Minister for Defence asks—"What is £1,000,000?" I ask in the same way—"What is £200,000?"—it is nothing. The only point is that we are called upon to pay £200,000 per annum for ten years. What I do not like is to find that Canada, whose example is always quoted in this House, has made a much more advantageous bargain with the Imperial Government. She has two Imperial squadrons constantly patrolling the seas upon her shores—one on the Pacific and the other on the Atlantic side—and yet she does not pay the Imperial Government one penny. Now, as a Scotchman, I do not like to see Australia overreached by Canada, and I think that if England can do what she has done for Canada, she can extend the same consideration to Australia. The money which we propose to contribute towards the Imperial navy would be applied to infinitely greater advantage if it were used to form the nucleus of a fund out of which we could build ships for ourselves. We shall have to come to that in the end. We cannot possibly continue to depend for the protection of all our ports upon England; we cannot be for ever hanging on the maternal breast. The million of money mentioned by the Minister for Defence would build three of the first class cruisers recommended in Captain Crosswell's report. The interest on £1,000,000 borrowed at 3 per cent. was stated by the Minister for Defence to be equivalent to the price of a glass of beer for every inhabitant of Australia, but it would be even less than that. Whatever Government may be in power in the near future will have to face the question of creating an Australian navy. I do not wish to belittle the Australian auxiliary squadron, because it seems to be necessary to us at present, but I am afraid that we shall be increasing the subsidy at the wrong time. Just fancy the position we shall occupy if we ratify the proposed agreement. It is undeniable that if England were in serious straits the ships belonging to the Australian squadron would be taken away from our shores. That is not the worst either, because the squadron would take with it the only men upon whom we could depend for our naval defence. One of the baits held out to the Prime Minister to induce him to increase our contribution was the provision made for the training of Australians as seamen and as reservists on the vessels of the fleet. But these men would be taken away from us possibly at our time of greatest need. I am just as fond of old England as is any honorable member, and although I am a Caledonian chieftain, I should come down with both feet on any attempt to belittle England. I never mention the name of Scotland, as many Scotchmen do, making themselves ridiculous and odious, but I glory in belonging to England. We should in this matter look to England's benefit. If we ratify the agreement we shall continue to be a drag upon England, whereas if we build our own ships we shall help her.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The question is how best to spend the money we can afford?

Mr. A. PATERSON.—The best financial proposition is to use it to build our own ships. The thought has struck me that if we had passed the tea and kerosene duties—the loss of which I have always regretted—we should have been able to build a fleet for Australia out of the proceeds of those imposts within five years. Why should we be afraid to tackle the question of providing an Australian navy? Look at what we have done for ourselves without the assistance of the Imperial Government. We have built over 16,000 miles of railway, we have registered a maritime tonnage of 345,000 tons, and the value of our land and improvements, not to mention the immense stocks of merchandise and produce, and our flocks and herds, represents the prodigious sum of £628,000,000. Moreover, we have spent upon our railways £217,000,000. I admit that a good deal of this money has been spent badly, and that if we had saved that which has been badly spent, we should have been able to provide a fleet at once. The crowning evidence of our manhood and of our ability to manage our own affairs, is to be found in the fact that we have borrowed £215,000,000. Australians are sometimes accused of getting "swelled head," and I believe the accusation is just, because every one is afflicted with the same complaint, more or less, upon occasions; but in this particular case I think we are too modest. Do not let us forget that of the five greatest cities in the British Empire Australia owns two. Notwithstanding all these evidences of wealth accumulated by Australians, borrowed by Australians, and expended by Australians, we are standing on the brink, shivering at the bare idea of building a cruiser. I believe England would be delighted if we showed a bold national spirit, and took the defence of Australia into our own hands.

Mr. HIGGINS.—All the naval experts give us that advice.

Mr. A. PATERSON.—Yes. I candidly confess that I had not the necessary experience last session to enable me to judge as to the right course to take in regard to naval and military expenditure, and perhaps some of my votes may be open to considerable criticism. After reconsidering the whole question, I have come to the conclusion that we are making a great mistake in not paying more heed to the navy. I do not say that we should devote less attention to military matters, but as a matter of self-preservation we shall have to spend more money for the protection of our coasts, and the sooner the Government recognise their imperative duty in this respect the better will they study the truest interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—After listening patiently to the addresses of honorable members, the conclusion has been borne in upon my mind that the Government may safely be congratulated not only upon their administration, but also upon the forecast which they have given us in the Governor-General's speech. If one note has been more dominant than another in the criticisms to which they have been subjected, it is the complaint, perhaps not made directly, but voiced in an indirect way, that they have, so to speak, depleted the political wardrobe, and left the Opposition without any political attire, other than the proverbial fig-leaf, in which to appear on the public platform at the next election. It has also occurred to me that even when honorable members have trained legal minds it is often difficult for them to be logical. The honorable and learned member for Parkes riveted my attention by the masterly way in which he dealt with his subject last evening, but even he appeared to be altogether illogical, because, on the one hand, he accused the Minister in charge of a department with playing the part of an arbiter in interpreting an Act of Parliament, whilst on the other hand he condemned another Minister for not acting in a similar capacity. The Minister for Defence laid upon us the charge of being parsimonious, and he also made a noteworthy remark in connexion with his references to the federal capital site. He said that it was desirable that we should place the federal capital in close proximity to some striking features of Australian scenery. Anyone who has been intimate with the condition of the country during the last two years must admit that the most pronounced natural features have been river beds without water and the bleaching bones of our dead stock. Looking at the matter from that stand-point it is not to be wondered at that honorable members of this and other legislative bodies in Australia should adopt "economy" as their watch word on all occasions. They are forced into that position. I think it was the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, who credited the Government with having at all times displayed economical tendencies. I cannot indorse that statement. I could cite several occasions upon which the Ministry have been compelled only by the feeling of the House to exercise economy. For example, last session they attempted to pass a Loan Bill. It is true that the amount involved was a small one, but it represented the beginning of a bad practice. It was only the opinion of the House which deterred them from following in the footsteps of the State Parliaments by initiating a system of borrowing. While I am at all times prepared to support any expenditure that is calculated to promote the welfare of the people, I cannot vote for any proposal involving increased expenditure without being fully convinced that there is ample justification for it.

Mr. KIRWAN. — How does the honorable member propose to keep faith with New South Wales if the federal capital be not established?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not expressed an opinion upon that matter yet, but I will address myself to it presently. First, amongst the Ministerial proposals embodied in the Governor-General's speech is that relating to the establishment of the High Court. It may be necessary to create that tribunal, and I do not say that I will not support a proposal in that direction, but I certainly will not support new expenditure to the extent of £30,000 being incurred in the establishment of a court.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Unless the honorable member is satisfied that it is a good investment?

Mr. KENNEDY. — So-called good investments do not always prove to be such. In the first instance I shall have to be convinced that our existing needs cannot be met by the States courts. Many honorable members seem to forget that the States and the Commonwealth are composed of the same people. In each instance the taxpayer is identical. That is a fact which is too often ignored in the relations which exist between the Commonwealth and the States. Instead of the Prime Minister and the Premier of Victoria meeting each other in a perfectly friendly spirit, they approach each other through the columns of the daily press—allow the newspapers to “pull their legs” so to speak, altogether oblivious of the fact that in the meantime the public interests which should be their first concern are going to the dogs.

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — The honorable member is at liberty to peruse any correspondence which I have had with State departments, and he will then be able to form his conclusions as to whether I have not on all occasions extended to them the utmost courtesy.

Mr. KENNEDY. — At a later stage I shall read certain extracts which have led me to the opinion I have expressed.

Mr. KIRWAN. — The State Premiers are jealous of the powers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY. — That may be so, but the first concern of statesmen should be the public interest, not personal dignity or matters of etiquette. The establishment of the Inter-State Commission will also involve the Commonwealth in another large and permanent expenditure. There may be a necessity for constituting a tribunal to deal with disputes of an Inter-State nature that are brought about by the operation of differential or preferential railway rates. When the honorable member for Kalgoorlie was speaking the other evening on the differential rates which exist in Western Australia, I interjected that the same conditions prevailed in other States. Undoubtedly they do. Of my own knowledge I can say that, from some stations in Victoria the Railway department charges residents of this State three times as much for the carriage of their wool as it does for the carriage of wool which is grown in New South Wales. Other merchandise is carried under similar conditions. Secret rebates are made to individuals and to representatives of various firms. In the Railway Commissioners' report for the quarter ended December last appears a statement which is only a repetition of what occurs from year to year. It shows that rebates have been made to individuals upon rates which have already been reduced. There is no doubt, therefore, that a necessity exists for the creation of some tribunal to deal with these questions. But honorable members should not forget that under the Constitution the powers of the Inter-State Commission are restricted to some extent, and that where it can be proved that differential rates are charged for the purposes of development that tribunal would be absolutely powerless.

Mr. POYNOR. — It could deal with cases in which preferential rates are charged. The instances given by the honorable member could not then exist.

Mr. KENNEDY. — At any rate they exist at the present time. In my opinion it is not necessary to incur a large expenditure in order to remedy these evils. The States are practically the sole railway carriers in Australia, so that difficulties which confront the Inter-State Commission in America where the railways are in the hands of private companies could not possibly arise here. Personally I fail to see why the Commission could not be constituted by the appointment of officers who are already in the States services, the cost involved being borne by the Commonwealth. All that is required is a body composed of one of the Railway Commissioners, a first-class commercial man, and a judicial authority. Officers who are already in the service could be appointed to collect evidence upon any matter in dispute, and that evidence could be submitted to the tribunal indicated.

Mr. L. E. GROOM. — Would the honorable member allow a Victorian Railway Commissioner to sit in judgment upon a Victorian railway case?

Mr. KENNEDY. — Not necessarily. One man would not dominate the whole position. All disputes would be determined upon the weight of the evidence submitted. Passing to the adjustment of the boundaries of the new Federal electorates, I would urge upon the Minister for Home Affairs the necessity which exists for having the rolls posted in the different districts at the earliest possible moment. Electors will then be able to ascertain whether their names appear upon them, and, if not, will be able to get them on before the elections take place. With regard to the discrepancy which exists between the census returns and the Federal rolls, the explanation may not be far to seek. Let us take the case of Victoria as an illustration. I know that the Federal rolls show an increase of 9,000 male electors over the latest published State rolls, although the qualification is exactly the same in both cases. It is evident that there cannot have been any great amount of negligence or carelessness in the compilation of the Federal rolls. In this connexion I may mention one case which came under my own notice. Two householders in a certain district informed me that no inquiry whatever had been made with respect to the persons in their homes, and they assumed, therefore, that their names were not upon the Commonwealth roll. I suggested that probably the officers charged with making the inquiry had authentic information from some other source. Upon inquiry, I found that the names of all the persons in the homes referred to appeared upon the roll, thus proving that although the officer entrusted with the work had not made a personal visit to the houses, he had full information as to those whose names were entitled to be placed upon it. It is essential that the earliest opportunity should be given to electors to ascertain whether their names are upon the rolls, in order that they may avoid disfranchisement at the next general election. There are two other matters to which I wish to direct pointed attention. The first is that to which the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, drew attention the other day, namely, the question of navigation and irrigation. In my judgment, one of the largest questions confronting a very considerable section of the Commonwealth is how we are to utilize the waters of our rivers. In this connexion, however, no alarm need be experienced by representatives from the other States that any financial burden will be cast upon the Commonwealth as a whole. I have no hesitation in saying that whatever financial responsibility may be incurred in respect of irrigation works on the Murray or the Darling rivers, the States which will be benefited thereby are fully prepared to accept it.

Mr. Kennedy.

It is not a question of asking the Commonwealth, so to speak, to expend money for the benefit of one State, or a section of a State. Land-holders within these districts are prepared to accept the full financial responsibility. I do not know how far it is possible for the Federal Government to interfere at the present stage, but I should like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the feeling was present in the minds of a very considerable number of people that, in entering into federation, we were creating a power which might be able to harmonize the relations existing between neighbouring States in regard to joint works beneficial to both parties. The proposed transcontinental railway and the works relating to the Murray basin waters come within that category. The Constitution vests certain powers in this Parliament with respect to navigation, and I presume those powers cover the question of the navigation of the Murray and its tributaries. The question whether the necessities of navigation are to supersede the requirements of irrigation is one that should be determined by this Parliament at the very earliest moment. I think I am right in saying that the Prime Minister attended a conference at Corowa some little time ago.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—In March of last year.

MR. KENNEDY.—At that conference the three riparian States interested in the Murray basin waters were represented by their Premiers, and an agreement was arrived at that the whole matter of the use of the waters of our rivers should be referred to a commission, on which each of the three riparian States should have a representative. The commission was appointed, inquired fully into the matter, and submitted a report. The members of that commission were men in whom the Governments that appointed them had absolute confidence. They were appointed, I presume, because they were thoroughly conversant with the subject, and knew the way in which to obtain the best information. They made certain recommendations which they embodied in their report, and in April last the Premiers of the three States concerned met in conference in Sydney. Amongst other questions dealt with at that conference was that relating to the river waters—and with what result? The Premiers simply ignored the recommendations of the commission; they threw the commission's report into the waste-paper basket, and formulated a proposal of their own, which they propose to ask their respective Parliaments to ratify.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—The report of the commission was unfair to South Australia.

MR. KENNEDY.—That is the extraordinary feature to which I propose to refer. I have already mentioned that it was the aspiration of many federalists that the Federal Parliament, when created, should be able to determine issues of this character, that wherever conflicting interests like these existed between two or more States, the Federal Parliament, acting for the whole of the people of the Commonwealth, should be able to determine what was best in the interests of all concerned. As to the constitutional rights of South Australia, I am not going to offer any opinion. The Premiers threw the report of the commission into the waste-paper basket and formulated proposals of their own, which they are going to ask their Parliaments to ratify.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—The South Australian representative on the commission entered a protest against the report.

MR. KENNEDY.—He dissented from the finding of the commission. I have some knowledge of the conditions which prevail over the greater portion of the Murray valley, and I venture to say that the proposals formulated by the conference of Premiers will not be ratified either by the Parliament of New South Wales or that of Victoria. I believe that the position will be as it was. South Australia will not have sufficient water for navigation purposes during a considerable portion of the year, and irrigationists in New South Wales and Victoria will be retarded in their operations for some years to come. If the agreement is ratified, it will not only debar the people of New South Wales and Victoria from entering into further irrigation projects, but in many seasons it will leave irrigation trusts which have already been established in Victoria without a drop of water.

MR. BATCHELOR.—They have at present under way all the schemes that it would be possible to carry out for the next five years.

MR. KENNEDY.—No. That is another creature of the imagination of the press-man who, to use a colloquialism, sometimes "pulls the legs" of the people.

MR. POYNTER.—Did not the Premier of Victoria say so?

MR. KENNEDY.—The peculiar fact is that the Premier of Victoria, speaking in the State Parliament and also on the public platform, claimed the right of Victoria to divert every drop of water which fell on Victorian territory.

MR. BATCHELOR.—That is a large order.

MR. KENNEDY.—I am not saying whether the Premier was right or wrong. I am merely telling the honorable member what he said. After making that assertion here, he went to Sydney, and actually gave away the rights of the people—rights which had been created under an Act of Parliament—to the use of water for irrigation purposes. I have been associated from my boyhood with farming and grazing in the Murray Valley, and I know something of the conditions which exist there. Had the recommendation of the commission been carried out there would have been a possibility of very material development, not at the expense of the Commonwealth.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—But at the expense of South Australia.

MR. KENNEDY.—No; at the expense of the States concerned.

MR. KINGSTON.—Was not our share to be the dry channel?

MR. KENNEDY.—No. I shall tell the right honorable gentleman what I and others who are not representatives of South Australia think about the matter. Unfortunately we are still imbued with that parochial spirit which, shortly prior to federation, induced some of the States Parliaments to load up some of the departments that were about to be transferred, in order as they thought, to pass on the baby to the general taxpayer of Australia. In dealing with large measures of common concern—measures affecting the people of more than one State—we seem to be still imbued with that spirit.

MR. KINGSTON.—If I object to a man taking my watch, does that show a parochial spirit?

MR. KENNEDY.—No claim is made either by Victoria or New South Wales to the use of the whole of the waters of the Murray. What is claimed is that as the Premiers submitted the matter to the best available authorities, the report given by those authorities should have received some little consideration.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was not a unanimous report.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am aware of that. But it was a report by gentlemen who know more about the matter than does the Premier of any one of the States. I wish to point out the effect of the agreement arrived at by the Premiers. We have on the Goulburn River in Victoria an irrigation trust which was formed some years ago, and in connexion with which there has been some £300,000 expended in the resumption of lands and the construction of weirs and water channels, and other works. After expending a very considerable sum of money in experimenting with irrigation, we are now obtaining some return for our outlay. During the last two or three dry seasons people have realized the true value of water for irrigation purposes, and, as the result of that experience, have continued to impress upon the Premiers of the States concerned the desirableness of coming to some agreement with respect to the use of the waters. It was this agitation that first gave rise to the Corowa conference. A scheme was promulgated by the people of Riverina under which it was proposed to expend about £500,000 in constructing a weir at Bungowannah, together with other water-works, to divert a volume of water sufficient for stock and domestic supplies over an area of 3,000,000 acres, and to irrigate about one-twelfth of that area. The diversion works were to be a joint enterprise on the part of Victoria and New South Wales. The water to which Victoria considered it was entitled—and the report of the engineers supported the contention—would have supplied a vast area. But, as a result of the agreement arrived at by the conference of Premiers in April last, these schemes must be abandoned. For at least twelve or fourteen years there has been a Trust district in existence on the Goulburn River, where we have now almost perfected our irrigation arrangements. But if the Premiers' agreement be ratified by Parliament, the Trust will not be able to divert a single drop of water from the Goulburn for the proper supply of that district. Under one of the provisions of the agreement 150,000 cubic feet of water per minute has to be sent down the Murray to the eastern boundary of South Australia. As a matter of fact, the gaugings taken by the Water Supply department show that in many years there is not a volume of 120,000 cubic feet per minute flowing along the river at that section; but as soon as the supply at the eastern boundary of South Australia drops below 150,000 cubic feet per minute both Victoria and New South Wales will be debarred from using the water. Thus, it is an absolute certainty that the agreement, if carried out, would not only deprive the contemplated works of their requisite supply, but would actually cripple those works that are already in existence. It is for this reason that I am urging the Prime Minister to give some attention to the matter. In support of my contention that the ratification of the proposals of the Premiers would not only prevent the States of New South Wales and Victoria from entering into new irrigation schemes, but materially interfere with works which have been in existence for a considerable number of years, I will quote the report of an interview with a gentleman who was at one time at the head of the New South Wales Department of Water Conservation—a gentleman who was very eminent in his profession, and knew exactly what he was speaking about—

Mr. H. G. McKinney, speaking of the decision of the conference of Premiers in regard to the River Murray question, said that the demand made by South Australia in regard to the waters of the Murray and its tributaries had been from first to last extraordinary. In the proposed settlement of the claims of the three States, the quantities of water allotted to South Australia had been proportioned to its demands, rather than to any legitimate rights. Navigation, which South Australia was so desirous of protecting, was chiefly navigation on New South Wales rivers. Practically what New South Wales had been asked to do was to sacrifice the interests of a large area of lands in the central and western divisions in order that South Australia might derive benefit from a precarious trade on the western rivers of this State.

I have already referred to the feeling which seems to exist between the Premiers of the States and the Prime Minister in regard to matters of mutual concern. The following quotation will illustrate my remarks—

The Premier (Sir John See), in replying to adverse criticism on the agreement entered into with respect to the allocation of the River Murray waters, and the assertion that South Australia had got the advantage of the other States, said that the whole matter resolved itself into this: that had some compromise not been arrived at, the conference would have been discredited, and the question of the River Murray waters would have possibly led to litigation in the Supreme Court, and finally, in an appeal to the Privy Council, causing endless delay in carrying out many good irrigation and water conservation works.

ly the same opinion was expressed by the Premier of Victoria. To my mind, the Premiers, in agreeing to let the matter wait over for five years, instead of determining the respective positions of the States at the present time, are to follow the line of least resistance, understanding the fact that the question must eventually be dealt with, and that the sooner it is settled the better for all parties concerned, because the experience of many years has shown us that the development of the river is impossible without the conservation of flood waters and their use by means of irrigation works. Mr. Irvine's remarks illustrate what I have said about the difference which exists between the State and the Prime Minister—

I have also dealt with some remarks made by Edmund Barton, Prime Minister, in reference to the work of the conference. "I am surprised," he said, "at a statement made by Sir Edmund Barton. He is reported to have said—'The Commonwealth Government could not consent to any of the resolutions which appeared to dispute the powers of the vote of all Australia, with the indorsement of the Acts of Parliament, had conferred matters which were by the Constitution handed over to the Federal Government.' I am aware that there is anything in any of the resolutions which tends to dispute or question the powers—"

EDMUND BARTON.—I did not say that. I rather guarded myself in that direction against saying so.

MR. KENNEDY.—Mr. Irvine con-

It was not the intention of the Premiers. Their intention was to bring respectfully the notice of the Federal Government matters in which the exercise of its constitutional powers would be beneficial, in their view, to the whole of the States."

matters of public concern affecting the States and the Commonwealth arise, it would be much better if, instead of speaking in the press of difficulties, they may be merely creatures of the imagination, the heads of the various departments would come to close quarters with the Prime Minister and arrive at some understanding. It is our bounden duty, if the Constitution has given this Parliament power, or we can obtain it from the States, to deal with the question of the waters of adjacent States in the waters of the States which flow between them.

EDMUND BARTON.—The question must first have to be referred to us by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States concerned.

MR. KENNEDY.—I wish to draw attention to the matter publicly so that consideration may be given to it. Feeling on this subject is very strong throughout the northern districts of Victoria and the southern and western districts of New South Wales, because their future prosperity depends upon the early settlement of the question. There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and it is connected with the oversea mail contracts, and concerns the interests of a large number of the producers of Australia. Of late years I have had a more intimate knowledge of the conditions of the producing interests of Victoria than of those of the other States, and for that reason my remarks must seem to apply more particularly to Victoria, though I think they are of equal application to the other States. The subsidy paid to the companies whose steam-ships carry our oversea mails has been about £90,000 a year for some years past. Practically all we get for that contribution is the regular carriage of our mails to and from Great Britain and intermediate ports. But prior to 1899, and in the early days of our export trade in perishable products, an agreement was made between the Government of Victoria and the steam-ship companies—and I believe that similar agreements were made in the other States—which required them to make certain provision for the conveyance of perishable products. After a considerable amount of experimenting, that trade developed very largely, until it became seriously affected by the drought. But in or about the time of the inauguration of the Federation the agreement I speak of was allowed to lapse. Now, it has been the hope of the producers of Victoria and, no doubt, of those of the other States, that, as soon as one authority was in a position to enter into an agreement of this kind for the whole Commonwealth, they would obtain much better conditions. Last season, which was not a favorable one, the export of butter, fruit, mutton and lamb in the carcass, and rabbits from the departmental freezing works and cool stores in Melbourne, was something like 25,000 tons. But in dealing with the steam-ship companies in their individual capacity as producers, or through agents, our people feel that they are not in a position to obtain the terms to which they consider themselves entitled. The charge for the transport of butter, for instance, which is entirely in the hands of the mail-boat companies, is £7 per ton, or 3d. per lb. from Melbourne to London, a price which those in the trade term a prohibitive one. Although there has been a considerable increase in the volume of trade, there has been no reduction in rates for some years past. I therefore think it is incumbent upon the Federal Government, now that an opportunity is afforded by the expiration of the mail contract, to enter into an agreement, upon the renewal of the mail subsidy, for the transport of perishable products under better conditions and at lower rates. The export of perishable products is a trade which is yearly increasing in volume, and in which the whole of the States are concerned. Furthermore the interests of the producers are everywhere identical. In the matter of the export of fruit, we have now arrived at the stage when fruit can be sent to the London market with some degree of certainty that it will arrive in good condition. But the freight on a 40-lb. box is as high as 4s., or more than 1d. per lb., which shippers from whom I have made inquiries, term an extortionate charge. I ask the Government to give some attention to this matter. I do not intend to traverse the many statements which have been made by the various speakers during this debate. Some of the issues which have been raised are more suitable for discussion from a public platform at the approaching elections. The old question of free-trade and protection has been revived, but I think its resurrection is due to the fact that free-traders wish to make themselves a decent suit in which to appear before the electors, and so they are using the shroud of a body which I thought was decently buried after the last debate on the Tariff. The view which I take in regard to what has been said about the administration of the Alien Restriction Act, is this: Severe criticism has been hurled at the Prime Minister because at the dictation of the socialistic party he refused admission to the famous six hatters. As I understand the situation, the Prime Minister was in duty bound to refuse permission for the landing of these men until certain conditions had been complied with. Some honorable members have apparently lost sight of the fact that after representations were made by the labour unions, and by what has been designated socialistic party, the Prime Minister refused to admit the hatters. It has also recently been forgotten that another lot of men, who came here under exactly the same conditions, were allowed to land immediately upon their arrival, simply because steps were taken with respect to them which should have been taken in regard to the first six hatters. I do not claim to be exonerated from my share of the responsibility attached to placing the Immigration Restriction Act upon the statute books. When I voted for the provision which the six hatters were first refused admission to the Commonwealth, I was as well what its effect would be as to-day, after all the discussion and the criticism which has been passed. Notice of the amendment was given by an honorable member for Bland many years ago, and it was with a view to prevent the recurrence of anything of the kind that I decided to support the proposal. The Lachlan and Darling districts of New South Wales friction which had existed for some years between the squatters and the shearers culminated in 1878 in what was known as the Mossgiel strike. The squatters tried to obtain the upper hand, and the shearers fought them as well as the conditions would permit. The squatters endeavoured to fill their sheds by employing shearers in Victoria and Tasmania. The contracts made in those States were for shearers, who were good and capable men, and were perfectly familiar with the conditions obtaining in the western districts of Victoria and in Tasmania. I knew nothing of the circumstances in which they would be placed in New South Wales. When they arrived, the stations representations were made to them that they could not shear with accuracy under the conditions to which they had agreed. Many of the men, however, of this, went to work, but before a week over they raised objections, and a strike was the result. That occurred in 1879. The records can be found in the files of the Police Court, because some of the time spent in the gaol there the time would otherwise have been occupied in shearing at Gunbar Station. Some of the contract men, however, completed their shearing under police surveillance, and the whole time. That was the

in my mind, and which impelled me to support the amendment of the honorable member for Bland. If the Act is administered, as I believe it will be, in the spirit in which it was passed, it is not only to prevent any one who comes here as a legitimate object from entering the Commonwealth. I think that the Minister of Trade and Customs has, by his reply to criticisms, effectually dispelled those shadows, which, according to the press reports, have been hanging over his head for a considerable time. I think he is to be commended for the line of action he has adopted. I remember distinctly that when the Customs Bill was submitted to the House it was moved by the Minister that, from the information obtained through the Customs officials, the States had been losing something like £750,000 annually through leakages. It was not a desirable state of affairs, and I thoroughly appreciate the difficulties which confronted the Minister in bringing about various necessary reforms, and in bringing uniformity of practice, I warmly congratulate him upon the great work which has been achieved. No one will question his honesty, or his integrity, and although there may have been a few cases of mismanagement, the general policy pursued by the Minister must have exercised a salutary effect upon the trading community generally, and have resulted in gain to the Commonwealth. I think it will be admitted by those who have had any experience, that there is a limit to what Parliaments can do in any one session, and I do not suppose any honorable member will be beguiled into believing that it is possible for this Parliament, however strenuous may be its efforts, to pass all the measures foreshadowed in the Governor-General's speech during the last few months. I feel confident that some of the most important of them will be carried into law, and I trust that in the administration of these measures, the Ministers will be as fearless as they have been in carrying out the provisions of the Acts already on the statute-book.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—At this stage of the debate, I do not intend to say very much; but I think some remarks should be made with regard to one or two matters affecting that portion of Queensland which I represent. I have never had the pleasure of congratulating the Government before; but I now offer them my felicitations upon having promised us an Arbitration Bill. I hope that that measure will be of a comprehensive character, and that it will embody the compulsory principle. I trust, further, that it will be largely instrumental in putting an end to industrial warfare within the Commonwealth. We know that any legislation we may pass upon this subject can be operative only in regard to industrial disputes which affect two or more States, but I can assure the House that the labour party will very soon make it clear that almost any labour dispute may be brought within the scope of the Act. An amalgamation of the various trades organizations throughout the Commonwealth is now in progress, and this, when completed, will bring the whole army of workers into such a combination that any Arbitration Act we may pass will have a much wider application than is now generally supposed. I regret very much that an Act of this character was not in force quite recently, because, if it had been, very much of the trouble which recently occurred in Victoria might have been avoided. I do not wish to say anything further regarding the proposed measure until we have it before us. Those who are opposed to us in politics have frequently told us that we must settle our industrial trouble by constitutional means, but immediately we propose to act upon their advice, we find them still doing all they can to thwart our object. During the 1891 strike, which extended over the length and breadth of Queensland, we were told that if we had any grievances we should seek redress in Parliament. We took the hint that was then given by Sir Thomas McIlwraith, and organized our forces politically instead of industrially. We immediately found that those who had advised us to take this course were more strongly opposed to us than ever before, because they realized that we had become conscious of our power, and that within a comparatively short time we should probably capture the Parliament. I think that there are other matters which should have formed part of the Government programme. Exactly the same conditions prevail to-day as existed two years ago, when mention was made in the Governor-General's speech of a proposal for establishing old-age pensions. If it was right then that any such scheme should form part of the Government programme, old-age pensions should also be among the subjects claiming our attention during the present session. I regret very much that the Government have apparently abandoned the idea of taking some action to relieve the necessities of those who have done much towards building up this community. It is all very well to say that there are constitutional difficulties in the way of raising the necessary funds, but there is no reason why the money should not be secured by resorting to direct taxation. The Government may say that they do not care to take this course because it would unduly interfere with the revenue-raising powers of the States, but sooner or later they will be compelled to meet the financial requirements of the Commonwealth in this way. It seems ridiculous that if the Federal Government requires £1,000,000 it should have to raise £4,000,000 through the Customs. There are a number of other measures proposed in the speech upon which I do not propose to dilate at present, but I shall certainly strongly oppose several of them, because I do not think they are necessary in the present circumstances of the Commonwealth. There is the question of the naval agreement, but that will come on for discussion later. What I principally desired to speak about, when I rose, was this: that the Electoral Bill was passed last session—I think on the 10th or 12th of October—but it was the end of February before any real attempt was made to prepare the rolls in Queensland. Something was lacking in administration, considering the vast area that had to be traversed in order to collect the names. Any hurried attempt to collect them could only result in a vast number of persons not being able to get their names on the rolls. We now find that there are 18,000 or 20,000 people in Queensland who have not got their names on the rolls. No attempt seems to be made now to show how those particular persons are to be enrolled. Taking into consideration the fact that the number is so large, it seems clear that the department should have been more active in seeing that the whole of the names were collected in a more thorough manner than appears to have been pursued up to the present. There is not one of the States in which it has not been found, in comparing the federal electoral rolls with the census returns, that a large number of people have been left off. In New South Wales there are about 70,000, and in Victoria between 40,000 and 50,000. This is an enormous number of electors omitted in the compilation of the rolls.

Mr. TUDOR.—Still, there are more names on the federal rolls in Victoria than there were on the State rolls previously.

Mr. McDONALD.—Yes, and the same is the case in Queensland; but at the same time there has been negligence in collecting names for the federal rolls.

Mr. TUDOR.—The others will have an opportunity given to them to have their names included.

Mr. McDONALD.—There is a difficulty about collecting the omitted names afterwards at the various revision courts; whereas if a proper canvass had been made in the first place the great bulk of these persons would have been placed upon the rolls. There seems to be a desire that the House of Representatives should not be dissolved until after the Senate elections. I hope that such will not be the case. Up to the present the answers to questions put to the Prime Minister have not been at all satisfactory. The question is a very simple one, and might have been answered in a simple manner by the statement that the House of Representatives would go to the country at the same time as the Senate. As it is now, we do not know when we are going to the country—whether in December next or next year. The position will be that the Senate will adjourn some time in October so as to give senators who are retiring an opportunity of again contesting their seats if they desire to do so. The consequence will be that the House of Representatives can do no work beyond that date owing to the Senate not sitting. In the ordinary course of things the new members of the Senate would not care about meeting until the end of January, and we should have to go to the country a month later. There would thus be a period from October practically until the new members of the Senate are returned next year during which no business could be done by us. Apart from the fact that we could do no business here, there would be extra expenditure entailed to the amount of £50,000 or £60,000 by not having the elections for the two Houses at the same time. I should look upon that as criminal on our part. Of course I know that those who hold the opinion that we should go to the country at the same time as the Senate will be met by certain difficulties. We shall be told first of all that the House of Representatives and the Senate cannot on all occasions go to the country together; that some time or other there will be a dissolution of the House of Representatives, when we shall have to go to the country "on our own." But on this particular occasion we certainly can save £50,000 or £60,000, and it is our bounden duty to do so. Another point that will be raised is that under the Constitution the States have the right to fix the dates of election for the Senate, and that we do not know exactly what dates they will fix. I understand that some of the States are not favorable to having the Senate elections on the same day as the House of Representatives elections. The result will be, if that idea is carried out, that the elections in one State will be on one day, and on another day in another State. But we can easily get over that difficulty. If the States like to plunge themselves into the expense of having two elections, let the onus rest upon them; but we should be fixed in our determination to go to the country on a certain date. Supposing—which up to the present time seems problematical—that the States have power to fix the date for the Senate elections, the course I recommend will compel them to fall into line with the action which the House of Representatives takes. There is another matter as to which I should like to say a word or two. I refer to the legislation in connexion with black labour. All through this debate this subject has been dropped. Time after time we have heard—especially in Queensland—that the passage of the Pacific Islands Labourers Bill was going to ruin one of the largest industries in Queensland. But these facts stare us in the face at the present time: Last year Queensland produced 10,000 tons more sugar than in the previous year. If Queensland had had a normal season instead of a disastrous drought the product would have been very much greater. I am sorry to say that an attempt is being made in Queensland—and that some of the leading members of the Government give countenance to it—to adhere to the position originally taken up that the sugar industry will be ruined by our legislation. All sorts of rumours have been circulated to the effect that white men cannot perform the work. Now the supporters of that view have modified their contention a little bystating that white men cannot do the work north, say, of Townsville. But the fact is that white men have done the work there. A certain company in the north of Queensland which, owing to the legislation that was likely to take place prohibiting the importation of black labour, indented a large number of kanakas, and which leased these men under agreements to various farmers having transactions with the company, has done some rather remarkable things. A number of these farmers were desirous of working their cane fields with white labour, and so earning the rebate on sugar. But they were not allowed to do so by the company. Further, this particular company has issued a pamphlet, and sent it broadcast—I presume all over the States, because I have seen several copies in Melbourne—setting forth that certain individual white men were given an opportunity of cutting cane in the fields, and failed. It is just as well that the House should understand exactly the position of the whole affair, because this is one of the most disgraceful things that any company could be capable of. They first of all entered into an agreement with a certain number of men to cut a certain quantity of cane. The men had to supply so much cane per day to keep the mill going. The very first thing the company did was to put the men to work in a field of cane which, under ordinary circumstances, would not have been cut at all. It was so knocked about and tangled that it was almost an impossibility to cut the cane, and in the ordinary course of events it would have been destroyed and used as manure, instead of being used for the production of sugar. But the men cut the cane, went through all the difficulties that had to be faced, and supplied the quantity that was necessary according to their agreement. Then the men thought they were going to get something better to do. But what was done then by the company? They put the men on to a field of cane that would go only about $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons to the acre, and where it was almost a matter of impossibility for them to cut the quantity of cane required for the mill. The result was that when after a few days the men were about a ton and a-half short the company told them that the agreement had been broken: that they had not supplied the quantity of cane necessary; and that they would forfeit their deposit of £100. A hundred pounds is a large sum of money to a few hard-working men who are desirous of making a living at that particular work under such circumstances. They complained, and pointed out the difficulties they had been under, and that it was almost an impossibility to cut the quantity of cane required in that field. It must be borne in mind that the particular section of the field referred to would only run about $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons to the acre, and would not have been cut at all under ordinary circumstances. It would have been allowed to be destroyed. The company would not have attempted it even with cheap kanaka labour. But they put these white men on to it, and because they were about $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons short, the company complained of the work, and said the agreement was broken. The men made an application to get their £100 back, and the company agreed to give them the £100 if they would sign an agreement to the effect that they did not cut the amount of cane required. In the face of these facts the company turns round and issues a pamphlet to the public saying that these men had failed to carry out their contract. They have circulated this pamphlet broadcast. I have seen it stated in the Argus upon the authority of this pamphlet, and I presume that the same information was scattered throughout Australia, that white men could not possibly do the work in the north. I deny that. I say that, under ordinary conditions, the white man has been a success in the cane-fields, even in the most tropical portions of Queensland. Wherever we have been able to obtain information we have found that the men have done well, and that some of them have made considerably over £3 a week at cutting cane at the wages paid them per ton. Wherever legitimate and reasonable wages have been paid for this particular class of work, white men were found to do it satisfactorily. I say that it is a scandal and a shame that any company should allow itself to drift to so low a position in party politics—or whatever it may be called—as to issue such slanderous statements as those which I have mentioned concerning white men in North Queensland.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I do not think the honorable member is right as to the amount of shortage— $1\frac{1}{2}$ tons.

Mr. McDONALD.—It may have been a little more; but that is the information which I have—that they were a ton and a half short. It may have been a little or it may have been a little less; but the fact remains that the crop they were employed to work on was of such character that in ordinary circumstances would not have been cut.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I am not endeavoring to justify the action of the company in the cutting of the cane, but at the same time I think the honorable member's remarks are out.

Mr. McDONALD.—I received information from a member of the company, and I claim that he should know what he was talking about. There is one aspect of the coloured labour question which I wish to touch, and it arises out of the reply given by the Prime Minister to-day to a question by the honorable member for Herbert. I find that the Government have issued permits to allow certain Asiatics to be employed in the pearl-shelling industry of Thursday Island in place of those who have been driven away. I regret very much indeed that the Government should have issued 211 permits. What the people of Thursday Island required was that the provisions of the Migration Restriction Act should be modified so that permits should be issued in connexion with the pearl-shelling industry. If all the black labour were driven out of Thursday Island and the pearl-shelling beds allowed to rest for a time, it would be one of the best things which could be done for the pearl-shelling industry in the northern portion of Queensland; for the scientists say that the continuous working of the beds will ultimately result in their becoming useless to the Commonwealth. We are told that these permits are issued merely to allow the Asiatics to work in the pearl-shelling industry. We all recollect that we legislated to restrict coloured aliens, particularly the Chinese, from working in the sugar industry. It does it not seem rather inconsistent that the Government should issue permits to allow coloured Asiatics to work in the pearl-shelling industry? If it is a reasonable thing to allow coloured Asiatics to work in the pearl-shelling industry, it would be equally reasonable to allow them to work in the sugar industry. I do not advocate a policy, but it is the logical outcome of the issue of these permits. At one time on Thursday Island the inhabitants had a permanent industry, which would permanent population to settle on these islands, would be established, but the continuous introduction of the coloured alien by a certain syndicate has gradually squeezed out the white man, until to-day hardly a white man is employed in the industry. Whereas at one time we had a population of nearly 2,000 white Europeans, to-day we have a population of only 600 white Europeans. It was urged by the syndicates that the Asiatics were only required on the boats to dive and tend to the white divers. Eventually the white diver was squeezed out. But that was not the worst evil which resulted. A few years ago nearly 80 white men were employed in building and repairing boats. Just before Christmas I visited all the boat-sheds, and I found that only three Europeans were employed in the boat-building and repairing trade, and that practically the whole of the trade was carried on by Japanese, and that the coloured Asiatics have virtually squeezed out all the European population in that particular industry. But that is not all. Although the coloured Asiatics were imported purely for the purpose of diving and attending to divers, I found that, with the exception of its owner, an aerated water factory, which I suppose was conducted as a factory of the kind in the northern portion of the Commonwealth, was carried on by Japanese and other coloured assistants. No matter where you may go on the island you will find that work which one time employed white women or white men, is now done by coloured Asiatics. Originally these men, as I said, were introduced for the express purpose of diving. But it is not possible to keep them employed at that work. Not only have they drifted out of the boat-building trade, but they have threatened every industry on the island and entered the household of almost every person. I may, then, continue the issue of these permits? What has become of the boast of the House last session that the education test would keep out all the coloured people? It has been admitted that it has allowed 30 odd aliens to enter the Commonwealth. If the Act had been firmly administered those 30 odd persons could not possibly have landed. The position which the labour party took up at the time the bill was being considered was that the exclusion of these people from the Commonwealth would depend entirely upon administration. I hold that the granting of these permits is a very serious act. I know that the people of Thursday Island who are not directly interested in the pearl-shelling industry by owning boats or shares in a company which is getting the shell—I am speaking more especially of the business people—feel very sore about the action of the Government in issuing the permits. They fear that it is only a matter of time when the beds will be completely denuded of any value which they possess, and hold that the presence of this population is a menace to the rest of the settlement. What they desire is that the Immigration Restriction Act shall be administered firmly, and with a desire to keep coloured Asiatics out of the Commonwealth. We are threatened that the pearl-shelling fleet will go over to Dutch New Guinea. It is well known to every one who is interested in the trade that it is an impossibility for the fleet to go to Dutch New Guinea, and that even if they did go they would be compelled, under certain circumstances, to take refuge on the Queensland coast from time to time.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—There was a telegram published in the newspapers to the effect that they had abandoned that idea.

Mr. McDONALD.—It was used as a threat at the time when we were considering the Immigration Restriction Bill, and it is used even now when we know that the idea has been abandoned and was never intended to be carried out. Interested persons were possessed of sufficient information at the time to know that the industry could not possibly be carried on at Dutch New Guinea. Even if the fleet did go there it would be one of the best things which ever could happen to that part of the Commonwealth, because the scientists state distinctly that the beds in the northern portion of Queensland require time to rest and recuperate. I hope that if the Government intend to take any action in this matter they will proceed in some other way than by granting these permits. There is another feature of this business which ought to be considered. Without going into details I shall briefly refer to the herding of coloured Asiatics on these floating ships. Last session I said that they were floating hells, and I think I was not very far out in making that statement. If it were possible for me to speak without going into details I think I could very soon shock honorable members by my description of what goes on. Of course it may be said, and said truly, that I have never been on the ships. I do not desire to go on them. Men who have spent the greater portion of their lives among them have given me sufficient information to enable me to say that it is anything but a desirable thing to carry on the industry in the manner in which it is carried on. The herding of large numbers of coloured men on the boats from time to time is simply revolting, and it ought not to have been allowed. I regret very much that even by granting the permits we should have recognised the industry in that respect. I hope that if any action is to be taken it will be taken by a special Bill, which will also provide for the proper inspection of these floating stations from time to time. In that way we might have an opportunity to minimize the evils of the system, and the sooner the work is begun the better. I realize that it is an impossibility for us to deal with the question in this short session. I sincerely hope that at no distant date the House will deal with the question by some comprehensive legislation, which will cover the various phases of the industry. I hope that by the time the next Governor-General's speech is delivered the effects of the disastrous droughts which have been experienced in various parts of the Commonwealth will have been removed, although, as regards stock, some years must necessarily elapse before normal conditions can be re-established, especially in Queensland. Still the mining industry in Queensland, and in other parts of the Commonwealth, has developed to such an extent that it must assist in minimizing the distress which has taken place, and which would have been accentuated if this industry also had suffered severely from the drought. Fortunately it has not done so to any great extent, and therefore it has been able to find employment for a very large number of men. I read with very much regret a statement which appeared in the press yesterday, that it had been found necessary in Queensland to afford relief to a large number of unemployed. I trust, however, that in view of the copious rains which have fallen in Queensland and other parts of Australia, the coming harvest will provide employment for the greater portion of these men. In that way it will afford them an opportunity to tide over their difficulties, and probably by the time that we have another speech from the Governor-General, the Government will be able to tell us that the drought has been dispelled, and that the State is in a much more prosperous condition than it is at the present time.

Mr. POYNTON (South Australia).—I rise more particularly to congratulate the Minister for Defence on the vigorous speech which he made this afternoon, and to give him some words of cheer. I do not know that there is any necessity for him to lose heart, because I believe that the Government of South Australia will loyally carry out whatever obligations have been entered into by that State in regard to the construction of the transcontinental railway. I cannot conceive of them ignoring, or endeavouring in any way, to repudiate any arrangement made in the past. But some honorable members seem to be somewhat eager to arrive at a conclusion as to the possibility of this undertaking before they have the actual data necessary to guide them in arriving at a decision. As a member of the State Parliament of South Australia, I took an active interest in this proposal many years ago. I foresaw then the possibility, and in fact, the necessity of connecting the two States by rail. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on one occasion a proposal was made to provide artesian bores and other means of water service between South Australia and Western Australia, as a forerunner of the necessary work which must at a subsequent date take place. That proposal was lost in the South Australian Parliament, I believe, by only one vote. At a subsequent date, I moved for a return showing the probable expenditure that would be involved in constructing this line, and giving an approximate estimate of its earnings. I was so impressed with the nature of that return that I moved with respect to the construction of what must be the first section of that line. I have the fullest confidence that the line will be constructed, and that at no very distant date we shall have links of steel connecting the two States. I am equally confident that it will not be the white elephant which some people imagine it will be. It will not traverse a wilderness: it will run through a vast area of mineral country. I have travelled over a large section of the track, and know something of the country at the South Australian end other end it will not go into man's land, but will connect a which has a population of something 100 people within a very small area. I believe that the representatives of Australia sitting in the State Par- will repudiate any implied agree- understanding, or promise made by you, Mr. Speaker, or by the for Trade and Customs, as Premier State. There seems to be some easiness, however, as to the route will take. It is feared that the line connected, not with that portion of Australia which has been indicated, it will be carried across the continent New South Wales. That matter, to be absolutely in the hands of of South Australia.

FOWLER.—Western Australia will t her part of the contract. There no fear about that.

POYNTON.—I feel sure that she propose now to say a word or two, efence of the speech made by my e the honorable member for South a, Mr. V. L. Solomon, in reference line; but in regard to the stand e has always taken. I would point e the honorable member should at credited with this degree of consis- that he opposed the proposed con- of the line in the first speech that e during the federal elections. I know why we should bring this to conflict with the railway to rthern Territory. It seems to t the two lines stand distinctly r own merits, and really do not in any way. In view of the fact South Australian Government has —unwisely, I think—into an ar- nt for the construction of the line, it seems to me that com- cannot be made between the two. now to say something of the criti- which have been levelled at the ment during this debate. Speaking from this side of the House, I wish e members of the Opposition to give t for being sincere in the remarks e have to make. I have listened y to the criticisms made, and di- chiefly against the administration of oms department, and it appears to they wholly miss the point. I think cs have discovered the defect, but ve not directed their energies—they have not brought in their cannon—against the true cause. I say that the cause of the complaints that have been made is to be found in the Act itself, and not in the administra- tion of it. If there be any necessity for attack, it should be levelled against the Act, and against that particular part of it which gives no discretionary power to those who have to administer it. The Act makes it impossible for the Minister to differentiate between cases of absolute fraud and simple cases of error. In my opinion, an effort should be made to amend that part of the Act which draws no distinction between those who make innocent mistakes and those who are guilty of fraud. I have sat with the Minister for Trade and Customs in the same Parliament since 1893, and as you know, Mr. Speaker, I have had my differences with him. But I have yet to learn that in any official capacity he was ever guilty of favorit- ism. No one, not even his greatest enemy in politics, has ever accused him of showing favoritism. I cannot conceive of any other method of dealing with Customs offences which would not have brought about complaints similar to those that are being levelled against the right honor- able gentleman at the head of the depart- ment. The same complaints would have been levelled against the present Minister for Trade and Customs, or any one else ad- ministering the department, if he had been called upon to judge the offences. I do not want to see the introduction of that method of administration which prevailed in some States prior to federation, and under which men willingly submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the Minister, and agreed to pay fines, extending in one case to £1,200, which he inflicted. Under that system, offenders were put on the carpet, but they were dealt with in private. There was no publicity, and none of that exposure which would have occurred if their cases had been dealt with under the present method. I assert that the Minister for Trade and Customs, whoever he may be, is not the right man to decide matters of this kind. Much has been said about a fine which was imposed upon a South Australian citizen, and a very fine citizen he is. I refer to Mr. Raleigh; but what else could have been done? If the Minister for Trade and Customs, who is a representative of the State from which I come, had allowed that gentleman to be dealt with in a differ- ent way—if he had told those under him, that the case was so trivial—and it is one of the most trivial that has been mentioned during the debate—that it should be decided without going into court, what would have been said? Would he not have been accused of favoring a citizen of his own State?

Mr. KINGSTON.—And a personal friend.

Mr. POYNTON.—And a personal friend. In my opinion, very great danger would be involved in giving power to the Minister in charge of the Customs department to say whether this man or that man was right. It would be equally, indeed, more dangerous, to allow the whole rank-and-file of Customs officers to arrive at determinations as to the particular values of goods. That, to my mind, would be intolerable, I am pleased to notice—and here again I shall come in conflict with some of my respected and honored friends on this side of the Chamber—that the Governor-General's speech contains a reference to a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I hope that it will be of a compulsory nature. We heard the other evening something of the jingoists of labour, but did it not occur to the honorable member who used the expression that, if it could be used in that sense, he could have spoken with equal force of the jingoists of capital? Is it not a fact that the very necessity for something in the nature of compulsory arbitration is that these people will not come to a meeting? With all due deference to the acting leader of the Opposition, to the honorable and learned member for Parkes, and to the honorable member for the Grampians, I am inclined to think that those honorable gentlemen are not in a position to fully realize the aspirations of the workers of these States. In saying that I do not intend any disrespect to those honorable gentlemen, but I say their life has been on a different plane altogether from that of the great mass of the workers who will be affected by this proposal. I would ask honorable members who are inclined to oppose the measure if they have been behind the scenes and have seen the conflicts and the suffering that have occurred simply because one side would not agree to meet the other? Have they known anything about the starvation and the want which have been brought about in many instances? If they have I believe their hearts are big enough and broad enough to enable them to decide that it is well that we should try to put an end to all that kind of thing. That is the object of the measure proposed, and I trust it will be passed during this session. I look upon the High Court and the Inter-State Commission as natural corollaries of the Constitution. We may differ as to how they should be constituted, but as I stated from this place last year Inter-State free-trade will remain a misnomer while the war of cut-throat rates is carried on between the States; and the full benefit of the Constitution cannot be realized until we have a court with authority to decide technical points which may arise. Take the question agitating the public mind so much in three of the States to-day. I refer to the question of riparian rights which concerns South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales? Which honorable member of this House is prepared to say just what is included in the Constitution upon this point? Who will define exactly what is meant by "the reasonable use" of the waters of the River Murray? Whatever meetings of Premiers may take place, whatever conferences may be held, and whatever decision even this Parliament may come to, the final say upon the question must lie absolutely with those who will be appointed to interpret the Constitution. I am not quite clear that in order to secure a Federal High Court it is necessary to create a number of new Judges. I believe that we have in the various States men capable of filling these high positions, and I feel very much inclined at the present time to support the proposition to give federal jurisdiction to State Courts, at any rate until we have grown somewhat bigger than we are now.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—What would the honorable member do for a Court of Appeal?

Mr. POYNTON.—There is the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal.

Mr. KINGSTON.—On the other side of the world.

Mr. POYNTON.—Under any circumstances, even if we constitute a Federal High Court of three Judges, and there is some idea amongst honorable members that that should be done, or if we constitute a High Court of five Judges, and their decision upon some important matter is against a particular State, we shall find that there will still be appeals to the Privy Council. I am not altogether in harmony with the Government proposals for increasing the naval subsidy. I admit that my mind made up on the subject. The question with me is whether we should initiate a scheme of our own, or continue so far as I can see, has not been a successful arrangement in the past. I shall wait with an open mind to hear what is to be said upon the subject. I shall not now say anything about the federal elections, because we shall have an opportunity later on of dealing with the subject. In reference to the great question occupying the attention of the leading men of Australia to-day, and about which we have seen so many paragraphs and columns of matter flashed across the cables of the old country, and repeated all over the world—I refer to the question raised in the speeches of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Chamberlain, and of the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Balfour, my conclusion may be due to a want of knowledge, but, to my mind, the proposal is within the range of practical politics. I will give the reasons which lead me to this conclusion. Honorable members who have heard the report of Mr. Balfour's speech will know that on the other day, I will know that he laid down three conditions as preliminary to the proposed preferential arrangement. One was that the working men of the United Kingdom must agree to keep their eyes open to submit to an increase in the cost of their food supplies. Another condition was that the States which were to be admitted as protectionist States must be prepared to admit British manufactures.

KINGSTON.—Oh, no; the Tariff is to be raised against the foreigner.

POYNTON.—That is distinctly the proposal of the Minister for Trade and Customs. The right honorable gentleman has definitely made that proposal, but he says that as a way in which what has been proposed might be given effect to. The right honorable gentleman thinks that it could even in this House increase the value of manufactured lines beyond the rates they stand to-day?

KINGSTON.—Against the foreigner?

POYNTON.—I do not think so; I think that honorable members behind the Ministry, so long as they prevent it, will ever allow even the admission of English goods. I believe the question is beyond the range of practical politics; and honorable members will probably see some evidence of that in the cablegrams which are now arriving, and from which it appears that it is now to be left absolutely to the people to say whether they are going to accept the proposal or not. The elections will probably take place before any decision upon the subject is given in any State of Australia. If the lines of trade referred to are allowed to come into the Commonwealth free, the Minister for Trade and Customs will be faced with the problem of raising revenue, and he will already have noticed that the Premier of his own State has said that he will at once object to the proposal on revenue grounds. I personally believe that, if England waits until the Australian Parliament agrees to the proposed preferential arrangement, she will wait a very considerable time. Like those who have preceded me, before I bring my remarks to a close, I would urge honorable members to allow the debate to terminate so that we may proceed to business.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I intend to yield to the desire expressed on both sides of the House by being brief, and assisting in bringing this protracted debate to a close. There are, however, one or two matters of some importance upon which I should like to say a word or two. In the first place, I congratulate the Government on their promise to introduce the much talked-of Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I listened with the very closest attention to the honorable and learned member for Parkes last night, and although he appears to have had such a vast experience in connexion with industrial matters, he also appears to have shut his eyes to the terrible labour wars which are going on all over the world. They are not confined to Australia or to Great Britain. We all know of the terrible struggle which America has just gone through, when 150,000 men were on strike, when some 750,000 persons were involved, and the whole industry of the nation was on the verge of a standstill. It seems to me that the Government would have been lacking in their duty if they had failed to recognise this important industrial difficulty, and had made no effort to provide against it in Australia. I think it is Washington Gladston who says that there are three stages in industrial evolution. The first stage is when the workers are slaves, and mere chattels; the second stage is when the employers, the masters, on the one hand, and the working people banded together in their organizations on the other, struggle for the mastery; and the third stage, that of universal co-operation. I quite recognise that the Bill which it is proposed to introduce will not get rid of all the difficulties and struggles pertaining to this evolution; but surely, in view of the terrible issues, it is worth while trying? We have the experience gained in New South Wales, Western Australia, and New Zealand, and, notwithstanding the efforts made to deprecate the experiments made and the experience gained from them, that experience goes to show that these efforts will tend to bring about the third stage, namely, mutual co-operation. If I understand the aspirations of the working classes aright, they have no desire to stifle conciliation; they welcome conciliation. In all my experience I have never yet known any body of representative working men refuse to meet their employers in order to talk over a trade difficulty. But I have known them to be forced either to yield to conditions that destroyed their manhood, and were likely to destroy their homes, or to resort to a strike. I say that all that the honorable and learned member for Parkes said last night with regard to conciliation will be heartily welcomed by those who desire arbitration. But they feel that voluntary conciliation is not sufficient, and that they should have some court of appeal to which they can go when the first tribunal has failed to bring about what they so much desire. Without entering upon a fiscal discussion, I should like to say a word or two about the effect of the Federal Tariff upon Victorian industry. I know that it is exceedingly undesirable to open a general discussion on the Tariff; but we have now had some eighteen months' experience of its operation in what is admittedly an industrial centre. Without discussing whether it is more so than New South Wales or not, I think that even our New South Wales friends must admit that Victoria is an industrial centre, and that Victoria has a great deal to lose by any proposed alterations in the Tariff. It was urged upon every platform throughout Victoria that the industrial life of the State would not suffer if we entered the Federation and joined hands with our neighbours, inasmuch as the wider markets which would be open to our manufacturers and producers would be of infinite advantage to us; and statistics which have been recently published have been used, notably by the leading free-trade journal of Melbourne, to show that our people have lost nothing by the reduction of the Tariff. The report of the Chief Inspector of Factories for last year goes to show that at the beginning of 1902 there were 59,000 people engaged in the various industries in Victoria. That, says the journal I refer to, is a larger number than were ever before in our history so employed, and it argues that the increase is due to the reduction of the duties. But it must be remembered that the figures I have quoted were for the beginning, not for the end, of 1902, and that at the time to which they applied the Federal Tariff had been in existence only four months. What they really go to prove is that, notwithstanding our industrial legislation, under which the wages paid are higher, the hours worked shorter, and the environment of the workers better than in any other State, our industrial position is higher than ever before. The figures prove nothing as to the effect of the Federal Tariff on Victorian industries. I believe, however, that when statistics on that head are obtainable, Victoria will not be found to have lost much. I think that she will be found to have lost some of her local trade, but she will have gained in interest trade as much as she has lost at home. These remarks, unfortunately, do not apply to all her industries. There are branches of the boot trade, and of the coach-building trade—axle and spring works, and spoke factories—which have been absolutely closed as the result of an undue reduction of duties. The axle and spring making industry, which was giving employment to 120 men, no longer exists. That fact might be urged as a reason why Victorian protectionists should attempt to re-open the fiscal question at the next elections. But I do not think that it is a sufficient reason. I believe that the Commonwealth has more to gain by leaving the Tariff as it is for the next four or five years, and both free-traders and protectionists, who are wishful for the prosperity of the country, might come to an agreement to that effect. At the end of that time we could deal with the duties in the light of the experience we had gained.

Mr. WILKS.—Should not the people be given an opportunity at the next general elections to express their opinions upon the Tariff?

Mr. MAUGER.—I am sure that if the question is brought before them they will not vote for plunging Parliament and the country into another long Tariff discussion. Furthermore, I am of opinion that the passing of a measure like the Navigation Bill is of much more importance. Ardent protectionist as I am, I am strongly of opinion that by waiting and watching the development of our industries, we shall do more than by re-opening the Tariff discussion. I wish now to briefly refer to some of the remarks of the honorable member for Parramatta upon the question of preferential trade between the various parts of the Empire. He told us that Great Britain was never in a more prosperous condition than it is in now, that wages there had increased, that the length of the working day had been shortened, and that the working classes were generally in a much better position than they had ever been in before. He also said that Mr. Chamberlain would have to bring round the great bulk of trades unionists and members of the working classes generally to his way of thinking, before the change which he proposed could be incorporated in the statute-book. I have never been to England, and, therefore, cannot testify from personal observation, as the honorable member for Parramatta did on one occasion, to the terrible condition of that country. But I should like to read some extracts from a debate which occurred in the House of Commons in April of last year. The men whose words I am about to quote are not the members of the Ministry who are now proposing trade reciprocity, but the great leaders of the liberal party. Sir Henry Fowler, upon the occasion to which I refer, said—

I do not know whether honorable members have read Mr. Booth's valuable report on the poor of London, or Mr. Rowntree's valuable contribution with reference to the poor of York. Those two statements show that there are large numbers of the population of this country whose wages are not more than 18s. a week. It is not a question of thousands, but of millions, and there are still larger numbers whose wages run between 18s. and 25s. a week.

Mr. FOWLER.—The other day a man living in a suburb of Melbourne was found to be earning only 14s. a week.

Mr. MAUGER.—His case was an unfortunate exception; such wages are not the rule here. What I am speaking of is a chronic condition, a reiteration of the bitter cry of outcast London. Then Sir William Vernon Harcourt said on the same evening—

In 1900, according to the last return I have seen, there were 1,000,000 paupers (out of 40,000,000 of people) receiving outdoor and indoor relief.

On the 14th May following, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the leader of the Opposition, said—

Thirty per cent. of the population has been shown to be in a state hovering on the verge of poverty, if not actually plunged into it, and it is these people who will suffer. Let the House realize for a moment what this jd. a loaf means.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is unskilled and disorganized labour.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am sorry to learn that these conditions are affecting the labour connected with the clothing and boot trades, which is not unskilled and disorganized. Private letters by the last mail advise me that there is great distress in Nottingham, the centre of the bootmaking industry. The secretary to the Nottingham Boot Union, which has a membership of 6,000, has shown that there are now a larger number of unemployed there, and that the wages in the trade are lower than ever they have been before during the last ten years. I do not say that this state of things is entirely due to the fiscal policy of Great Britain. I know that the reaction which has followed the war, and other circumstances, are having their effect. But the facts show that it is the height of absurdity for honorable members to try to prove that the working people of England are in such a prosperous condition that there is no need for a change in the fiscal policy of the country.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—Will the honorable member tell us what wages are paid in Berlin, under a protectionist policy, in the trades to which he is referring? Unless he makes a comparison of that kind his figures prove nothing.

Mr. MAUGER.—I hoped that I would not be dragged into a discussion of the fiscal issue generally.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—Then why introduce it?

Mr. MAUGER.—It was not introduced by me. One side of the question has been stated, and it is only fair that I should put the other before honorable members. We on this side of the Chamber have said very little on the matter. I do not contend that protection will do everything that is necessary to improve the condition of the workers. Protection at the Custom-house is only a beginning. Let me quote another authority—one of the staunchest free-traders in England. Presiding at a lecture upon free-trade on the 26th October, 1901, Mr. Leonard Courtney is reported to have said :—

We had a long experience of prosperity, which had been the most eloquent and convincing argument that could be used in favour of free-trade. He did not himself put his faith in that line of argument. If they had nothing but prosperity to refer to in support of the argument that free-trade was right, any change in prosperity would have a very damaging effect on the force of their argument and turn aside the force of their conclusions. We are not quite so prosperous now as we have been, and it would seem as if we were on the eve of a period of largely diminished prosperity. So one of the arguments in favour of free-trade would tell more feebly than it has told.

That is not an extract from the Age; the words are those of one of the leaders of the free-trade party in England. It is because of the existence of facts such as those which my authorities speak of that a proposal is emanating from the British Government for preferential trade within the Empire, and it is strange that opposition to that proposal should come from Australia. The idea is not a new one. In 1894 a conference was held in Canada at which representatives of New South Wales and of the other States were present. That conference unanimously agreed to the following resolutions :—

1. Resolved that provision should be made by Imperial Legislation enabling the dependencies of the Empire to enter into agreements of commercial reciprocity, including power of making differential tariffs with Great Britain or with one another.

2. That this conference is of opinion that any provisions in existing treaties between Great Britain and any foreign power which prevent the self-governing dependencies of the Empire from entering into agreements of commercial reciprocity with each other, or with Great Britain, should be removed.

3. Whereas the stability and progress of the British Empire can be best assured by drawing continually closer the bonds that unite the colonies with the mother country, and by the continuous growth of a practical sympathy and co-operation in all that pertains to their common welfare.

4. And whereas this co-operation and unity can in no way be more effectually promoted than by the cultivation and extension of the mutual and profitable interchange of their products.

5. Therefore resolved, that this conference records its belief in the advisability of a Customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies, by which trade within the Empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on by foreign countries.

6. Further resolved that, until the mother country can see her way to enter into a Customs arrangement with her colonies, it is desirable that, when empowered to do so, the colonies of Great Britain, or such of them as may be disposed to accede to this view, take steps to place each other's products, in whole or in part, on a more favoured Customs basis than is accorded to like products of foreign countries.

On that occasion it was not the representatives of Australia, but the representatives of Great Britain who objected. But now that Great Britain comes forward with a proposal, the representatives of New South Wales are the very first to raise their voices against it. I could understand opposition coming from Great Britain, because to working men trained in the nursery of free-trade such a proposal would no doubt come as a great shock. Those who can read the signs of the times, however, must admit that the whole question has assumed a phase that would not have been dreamt of ten years ago. I agree in some measure with many of the proposals made by the Government, and I shall take an opportunity of discussing them when they come before us. The Government are to be congratulated on the way in which they have administered the Acts passed last session. It must be quite new to Ministers to have fault found with them for over-active administration. We have often heard Ministers reproached with laxity and with ignorance of the law, but the worst complaint directed against the present Ministry has been that urged against the Minister for Trade and Customs, that he has been too active and too eager to protect the revenue. My own feeling is that he has done his duty fearlessly and well, and I hope that he will long be spared to continue in the same course. I believe that the public generally are with him heart and soul, his detractors being found only among those who are directly interested in bringing goods into the Commonwealth with as little trouble as possible. So long as Ministers carry on the work of administration fearlessly and without favour and continue to bring forward progressive legislation they shall have my support.

Mr. WINTER COOKE (Wannon).—I had fully made up my mind not to speak on this occasion, but the honorable member for North Sydney asked me to put the

the Colonial Sugar Company before the House, and especially before the Minister for Trade and Customs. I did very carefully to the Minister's words last evening, and it struck me as very energetic, and full of wild and wonderful words. On the whole, however, it was a very good case. At the same time, I wish that the right honorable gentleman turning his mind towards those words of Scripture which he sometimes has a fondness for quoting, would remember the passage—"In quietness and confidence shall be your strength." The right honorable gentleman has very much confidence, but very little quietness, and as a result it is very difficult for one of my moderate sort to follow him. I understand that he considers that he is not at liberty to refrain from prosecuting in cases of fraud. We all desire that any one guilty of an offence upon the Customs shall be punished without fear or favour. The right honorable gentlemen also made it clear that in cases of misconstruction he was bound upon to prosecute, but I understood only that there were cases of mistakes which he had exercised discretionary power in. He did not, however, tell us upon what principle he had proceeded. From what I see in the newspapers many cases have been taken into the courts which should have been sent there. The magistrates over and over again expressed their surprise at the necessity for imposing fines, although breaches of the law had been committed, they seemed to consider that the action of the Minister had not been harshly exercised, but that his treatment was somewhat harsh. With regard to the case of the Colonial Sugar Company, I saw the statement from the manager of the company in Melbourne. I understand that he found, not so much with the laxity of the Customs authorities in neglecting the duty, as with the delay in coming to a decision as to what should be done. Over and over again the attention of the Minister, or of certain of his officials, was drawn to the alleged facts, and the only statement made by Mr.

On the 1st October, 1901, I received a telegram from the general manager, Sydney, reading—"I am sorry to inform Doctor Wollaston we have authority for stating that about 8,000 tons of white sugar being whole stocks other manufacturers have been recognised by the Customs in Queensland as free excise."

He will see it impossible for us to accept this situation, and some action on our part is imperative before taking this. Wish him to understand our position."

I went, the same day, to the Custom-house, and interviewed the Comptroller-General, Dr. Wollaston, and exhibited this message to him. He said the subject had been referred to by Mr. Knox, when they met a few days previously in Sydney, and that it had since been receiving his earnest attention. He said he had not consented to the exemption of this sugar from duty. He asked if I could give him particulars as to owners and whereabouts of this sugar. I said I understood the Brisbane collector knew all about it. He said he would immediately forward telegraphic instructions to the collector at Brisbane that he must collect excise duty on it. He said that an official decision on the question as to the liability to duty of Australian sugar actually existing in a manufactured condition at the time the Tariff was introduced would be given shortly.

On the 7th November I saw Dr. Wollaston again at his office. He said he had issued instructions to the Brisbane collector to levy excise duty on the sugar in question, that that official had hesitated to act on them and had asked that they be confirmed, and that he had not yet been able to obtain the Minister's orders to confirm them. I said the effect of the delay in confirming the instructions to the Brisbane collector to levy the excise duty on this sugar was that our Brisbane trade had practically ceased for the past fortnight. I asked him to represent this to the Minister at once, and to tell him we trusted that definite action would not longer be delayed. He said he would do so.

On the 8th November I saw Dr. Wollaston again at his office, when he said he had failed to move the Minister. I said I must press him for some definite action. I afterwards wrote him as follows:—

Melbourne, 8th November, 1901.

The Comptroller of Customs, Melbourne.

Dear Sir,—Referring to the subject of my frequent calls upon you of late, I desire to point out that when, ten days ago, I informed you we had reliable information that about 8,000 tons of sugar, being the whole stocks of other manufacturers, had been recognised by the Customs authorities in Queensland as free of excise duty; that it was impossible for us to accept such a situation; and that some action on our part was imperative, you undertook to instruct the authorities there to at once levy duty on this sugar, and so relieve us from the admittedly unfair position we were placed in by the fact that this duty was demanded on our stocks.

Though ten days have since passed, this promised action has not yet been taken; and we are still in the manifestly unfair position of having to compete with sugar which you are allowing to escape all duty, while at the same time demanding £3 per ton on our sugar which has been grown and manufactured under exactly similar conditions to the other.

It is surely not necessary for me to repeat that the position is an improper and intolerable one, and I would beg that, in common fairness, there be no further delay about putting our sugar and the sugar referred to on the same level.

I remain,

Yours very truly,

A. ASTLEY, Manager.

On the 12th November I called on Dr. Wollaston again at his office, and asked him to give me a reply to my letter of 8th idem.

On the 18th November I waited on Dr. Wollaston again, when he said the Minister had not yet given any decision in these matters.

On the 22nd November I saw Dr. Wollaston again at his office, when he said the Minister had not yet announced any decision.

On 29th November I wrote to the Comptroller-General as follows :—

Melbourne, 29th November, 1901.

The Comptroller-General of Customs, Melbourne.

Sir,—

You will pardon me for reminding you that I am still awaiting your answer to the complaint I made of the unequal incidence of your action in the collection of excise duty on sugar in store on the 8th October.

The matter is of the first importance to us, seeing that our business in Queensland remains in a crippled state, and will so long as the unfair disadvantage you have placed us at continues; and it is surely not unreasonable if I press you for a decision—either that the other sugar I have referred to be taxed as ours has been, or that ours be set free.—I remain, yours faithfully,

A. ASTLEY, Manager.

I handed this letter to him, and he said he would lay it before the Minister on the following day.

On 10th December I received a letter from the Comptroller-General saying "that the matter relating to the collection of excise duty on sugar in stock on 8th October last is now under the consideration of the Minister for Trade and Customs."

The gravamen of the charge is that the company directed the attention of the Customs authorities to what they believed to be an important fact, and asked that action should be taken. The Comptroller-General of Customs sought for the authority of the Minister, and after two months had elapsed an intimation was given that the matter was still under the consideration of the Minister.

Mr. KINGSTON.—All stocks in factories or mills were similarly treated.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—I cannot go beyond the facts stated in the letter. This is not the only case in which delay has occurred at the Custom-house. No right-thinking man will find fault with the Minister for taking care that the revenue and honest traders are alike protected, but the delays which occur at the Customs constitute a great grievance amongst commercial men. I am not an importer, and I know very few importers, but from what I can gather their complaints do not relate so much to being brought before the courts as to having to submit to unnecessary delays.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The constant delays have been inseparable from the initiation of the administration.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—I quite understand the Minister when he says that he cannot compress 48 hours' work into 24; but if it is impossible for him to do the work, surely the Cabinet is sufficiently strong to permit of the administration being shared by some other Minister.

Mr. KINGSTON.—The troubles connected with the initiation of the new administration, and inseparable from it, are now being overcome.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—I understand that the work is still so excessive that the days are not long enough for the Minister.

Mr. KINGSTON.—I did not say that as regards the present administration.

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—When federation was first talked of there was some fear that under the new condition of affairs the system of responsible government, as understood in the States, would break down. In this connexion I was very much impressed by a remark of the honorable member for Bland. He urged on the Ministry that they should be more methodical in the work they brought before the House—that we should have a Bill put before us, and that we should carry that Bill through, and not have other Bills introduced so that members forget all about the earlier measure. There was one thing that the honorable member for Bland could not find fault with, and that was the method of the Ministry in obeying his orders. Over and over again during the last session this Government yielded to the very skilful and courteous leadership of the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Did not the opposition do the same?

Mr. WINTER COOKE.—The opposition are not in a position of responsibility, but the Ministry is; and if the Ministry comes down to this House with certain principles in a Bill and presses that they shall be carried, it is not right to accept section of the House a principle to the wishes of the Government. There was the question of lascars on the male steamers. The Postmaster in the Senate did his very best to get out that that provision was valid. He opposed it. The member for the Ministry in this House gave in "towed" to the leader of the Opposition. We had again the question of duty. The Cabinet did their best to resist the abolition of that instead of keeping eight of their members they allowed them to vote for the duty from the Tariff. With that?

ANNEDY.—What are we here for if to have an individual opinion?

INTER COOKE.—The Government has said that it was important that duty should be carried for the benefit of certain States of Australia.

is the section in the Immigration Bill about contract labour, not in the measure as originally introduced.

Worse than all, we had the Democrats thrown back to the Government.

I say, without fear of contradiction if a Ministry of the Commonwealth goes on doing that kind of responsible government will be at an end of the Swiss system we shall be rid of the Swiss system and responsibility.

This first Commonwealth has done more harm to responsible government than any Ministry has ever done throughout the British Empire. I do not think the motive could be; whether the Government thought it was not good for the Commonwealth to have a swopping of the stream, or whether they should be sorry to attribute to the Government the desire for power which is innate in most men. But there is the fact: our separate occasions—and a memory might recall others—the country yielded to a section of the Government, that section which may, in fact, represent the feeling of Australia, but it does not represent the feeling of the majority of this country—has been dictating the Government. I hope that I shall be able to show my way to vote for the measures of the Government, and that they will be the sense of the Government, and not a section. There is one Bill upon which I will touch for a moment, namely the High Court Bill. I have still an open mind on that question. At present I feel pretty strongly against it; but I am going to keep my mind open until I hear what the Attorney-General says with regard to the economical side of it. One reason why my feeling at present is against it is that we can very well use the courts of Australia for deciding Commonwealth cases. In using them we should obtain the services of men of judicial experience in deciding very important questions; whereas if we establish a new High Court in all probability its members will not be drawn from the benches of Australia, but will be largely, if not altogether, lawyers who have not had judicial experience. I think that it would be better for litigants—whether States or individuals—that their cases should be brought before men of judicial experience rather than before those who have only just left the bar or the political arena. However, I am not going to say how I shall vote. There are other measures which I shall await with interest. There is the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I do hope that we shall be able to pass a Bill which will once for all do away with the barbaric method of settling labour disputes by means of strikes or lockouts. I have long thought that things should not remain as they are in that respect. This is not a new idea of mine. I have expressed it on the platform. I think that nothing could be more barbaric than the way in which the people of the civilized world have hitherto settled their industrial disputes. I have spoken longer than I intended to do, and I now conclude these remarks with the expression of the hope that we shall have a very successful session, and that we shall have a Government leading.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—At this late hour I shall not take up much of the time of the House, and I doubt very much whether I should have discussed the matter before us at all, had it not been for the fact that the honorable member who has just preceded me, has questioned the right of any person living or breathing on earth to have anything to say in this House unless he possesses a patent of nobility which represents a big banking account or a fly-blown estate. I want for a few moments to question this doctrine. To my mind it is an utter farce for honorable members to stand up in this House and say that the honorable member for Bland controls the Ministry. The honorable member for Bland is the parliamentary leader of sixteen men—perhaps not as intellectual as the honorable member for Wannon, perhaps destitute of all those divine and aristocratic feelings that are requisite for legislators. But still, they are human beings, endowed with the same sort of feelings as other men. They are men whom the great Creator had the same amount of trouble in bringing into the world as He had in the case of the honorable member. The question arises—suppose there were sixteen men in this House, not members of the labour party, not members of the steerage party, not members of an autocratic party or an aristocratic party, but sixteen representatives who had as able a man as the honorable member for Bland to lead them. If those men went, through their leader, to Ministers—supposing the honorable member for Wannon was a Minister—would they not have something to say in the moulding of the legislation of this Parliament? Surely to goodness sixteen of us in this House and eight in the Senate ought to have some voice in the moulding of legislation. And that is all we ask. The honorable member for Bland has never yet attempted to dictate to the Ministry, and the Ministry has never yet been dictated to by the honorable member for Bland. But, in a compromising and conciliatory manner, the honorable member for Bland has occasionally suggested compromises with regard to proposals before Parliament, and the Ministry have often said that they thought the suggestions were fair, and have accepted them. I venture to say that if the honorable member for Wannon were a Minister, and sixteen members came to him occasionally, all his feelings of antipathy to us as unfortunate specimens of democracy would not prevent him from listening to us. He would not be able to stand out against the call for progress which our party represents, and which this age requires. The day of death and stagnation and grave-yard politics is passing by. We represent universal trouble, and universal trouble represents universal progress. We represent the policy that will lead men to meet trouble, and the honorable member for Bland is one of those who will show the way. If we are not to have any voice in the framing of the legislation of the Commonwealth, will the honorable member for Wannon, and those with whom he sympathizes, select candidates to come and try and put us out at the next election! But if we are in this House, we are going to take part in its business, and shall have something to say in framing its legislation. We are going to do this in a humble and Christian and submissive manner, though not in a crawling manner. Now, for a few seconds, I want to congratulate the Ministry on their administration. I congratulate the Prime Minister on having had the pluck to question the right of persons to bring servile labour into Australia. I congratulate the Minister for Trade and Customs on having had the pluck to administer the Customs Act, and on having destroyed that sneaking little hole-in-the-wall policy that has been pursued for years, and under which certain persons have occupied front seats in church on Sundays, saying "Amen" in the right place, and then swindling the revenue during the rest of the week. I do not, however, congratulate the Government on not having placed in their policy the question of old-age pensions. I am sorry that they did not have the pluck to put that in their programme instead of saying that they could not do so because of the "Braddon blot." What has the "Braddon blot" got to do with this matter? If the Ministry had embodied old-age pensions in their programme they would have had a good chance of carrying it this session. Let me tell them that we of the steerage party are prepared to-morrow to re-impose duties on tea and kerosene if for the purpose of paying old-age pensions. We will pay it—the great multitude will pay it; out of the tea and kerosene duties the Government can pay old-age pensions if the States are willing to hand over the money to the Federal Ministry to pay the pensions with. It is wrong for us who have enough in this world not to think of the thousands of destitute old men and women throughout the Commonwealth who are to-night going to bed without sufficient to eat. Honorable members may have noticed the other day that that unfortunate man killed his wife and children and then himself because he was trying to live upon 14s. a week in a Christian country, where men go down to church Sabbath after Sabbath, turn up the whites of their eyes, and thank God that they are not labour chaps. I am in favour of the establishment of the High Court. At the close of last session I was not in favour establishment, and the reason why I support its creation is the introduction of the famous coercion Bill into the Victorian Parliament for the suppression of the people.

FORREST.—The existence of the High Court would not have affected that.

O'MALLEY.—My honorable friend has written of habeas corpus. We are members of the Commonwealth and then of our State. The paramount power is in the Commonwealth and the subordinate in the State. The arrogance of one has become so terrific that it thinks of the Commonwealth, but it has laid upon me than has the bite of an anopheles mosquito on the tail of the eagle. I am in favour of the creation of the High Court, when I see a crocodile is crawling in the gutter in the hands of the power of the press, proposing to put the people in gaol without a trial. I know of no country where a policeman, for no cause, can arrest a man and get him committed without a trial. Talk about Turkey! Victoria is worse than Turkey. I know of no precedent for such a situation. What can we do? We can do nothing. What can be done in the United States. The people are deprived by the States of rights which they are entitled under the Constitution. They can apply to a circuit Judge in the United States for a writ of habeas corpus and be discharged. If I thought the power would not exist in the High Court of Australia, I should not vote for its establishment. I believe in the establishment of the High Court. Only the other day, in the Employers' Federation of Victoria and the "Deform" League sent out agitators. These two paid agitators deceived the people, and brought on the strike. If I were not sure the agitators would be entitled to apply to a Judge for a writ of habeas corpus I should not think of voting for the Bill. What did they do here the other day? In the guise of a man of art, they brought a suit in the High Court against the Miners' Union for £1,000, and the heroic and valiant Judge A'Beckett, in the face of the manufactured public opinion, boldly gave judgment for the Union. That is what it is to have an honest Judge. I am beginning to have faith in Judges. We want more Judges like Justice A'Beckett. I believe that the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus will exist in the High Court. We can, if we like, give federal jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of a State. When a Judge of the High Court is on circuit he can sit in the State Supreme Court, and if any man thinks that he does not get justice in Perth, Brisbane, or Sydney, he can appeal to the Full Court at the federal capital. I propose to close my speech with a reference to the naval subsidy. I desire to show the Prime Minister that, as a matter of business, he is making a bad bargain. The original cost of the seven ships comprising the auxiliary squadron was £854,000, and the annual interest on that sum at 3 per cent. was £25,620. During the last ten years we have paid £1,500,000 for the maintenance of the fleet, and we have nothing to show for it. Supposing that ten years ago we had bought the seven ships with borrowed money and paid £80,000 a year into a sinking fund. At the end of the period we should have owned the ships and paid off the original cost of £854,000, and our naval expenditure would be costing £197,620 a year instead of, as proposed, £200,000 a year, which we are to pay away for nothing. Or, supposing that we were to borrow about £6,700,000 to-morrow. And I guarantee the money can be got in America on the bonds of the Commonwealth at 3 per cent. if it cannot be obtained in England. If we pay England £200,000 a year for ten years for the maintenance of this fleet, we shall pay away £2,000,000, and at the end we shall have nothing; whereas if we borrow £6,700,000 at 3 per cent. we shall pay about £200,000 a year, and we shall have £6,000,000 odd to put into a fleet. Establish a sinking fund, and within twenty years the loan will be paid off.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What about the upkeep of the fleet?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—I am allowing £91,000 a year for that purpose. I look at this proposal of the Prime Minister as a bad investment. I am speaking as a straight-out supporter of the Government. I ask my honorable friends in the Ministry to consider these figures like business men, and see if it is not better for us to build a navy that will relieve England of the necessity of having to keep warships here. We can look after our own coast. Take the history of the civil war in America.

When did the Shenandoah and the Alabama destroy American commerce? They came into our ports when the American fleet was fighting at certain points. If the subsidized navy can be sent to China, or some other part of the world, a fast cruiser can sail into Port Jackson, shell Sydney, pay tribute on the people, and perhaps loot the banks. That is the danger we have to face. I urge the Government to start to build a little fleet, to train the seamen, and to have men ready to jump on to the warships, and do their duty when the necessity arises. I trust that they will carefully consider what I have said; otherwise, at the end of ten years, we shall be £3,800,000 out of pocket, and we shall not have anything to show for that expenditure.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—At this late hour, and at the far end of the debate, I shall not enter into details, or detain the House at any length. There are several things I wish to say in connexion with the proposed legislation. We may divide parliamentary work into two great sections—the legislative and the administrative. The legislative, which we are now anticipating in this discussion, is altogether irrelevant to the matter before the House. I wish to say a few words about the administration of the Acts of last session. We have had proof of the wisdom of the couplet—

For forms of government let fools contest;
What'er is best administered is best.

Whatever may be said about the Government, one thing they may be proud of is the record of their administration, for without fear or favour they have endeavoured to give practical effect to the Acts on the statute-book. The member of the Cabinet who has come in for most abuse in connexion with the administration is necessarily and inevitably the Minister for Trade and Customs. I would say that we have every reason to thank God that we have such a Minister presiding over the department of Trade and Customs. As a protectionist, I remember the time when we had a highly-scientific Tariff in Victoria—a Tariff which was to all intents and purposes protective in the true and literal sense of the word, but it was laxly and loosely administered. Time and again, I have seen in this State a Minister for Customs who was an avowed free-trader—a man administering a policy to which he was utterly opposed. Consequently, every anomaly that could be laid to the charge of protection was possible. But at last we have a Minister for Trade and Customs a man who practises what he preaches. Unfortunately there are men who are free-traders who believe in it, and practise it, and who what the law of the land. I rejoice that at length we have a Minister going to mark political life in Australia, and that there is to be no such hypocrisy that associated with a man administering a tariff with which he is utterly at odds. It seems to me that it is the right and proper time to stand for political honesty in these matters. It is high time that we should stand against men who seek places in the Government of the country and bind themselves by oath to obey the law of the land, and yet, when their interests are at play fast and loose with that law, they please them. Again and again, when this subject touched upon and I have said at distantly, but no one apparently has the courage to "bell the cat." It is, however, must be spoken. We must stand for our political honesty and political integrity by protesting against such impudence as is shown by the Minister the law and policy of the country. Therefore, I say that in regard to the administration of the department, we have to thank God that at length we have reached a time when the law is administered in a Minister's room, when all who have occasion to be in the department are required to go before a Minister that knows no man either by his name, his colour, or his politics. We have heard from the Opposition accusations against the Minister for his failure to come into the cases in the Minister's room, and I have heard of the great enormity of the Minister's highly reputable and respectable company of drunkards and braggarts in the common police court. It reminds me of the story of an unfortunate Irishman who got the worse of drink. His priest came along at the time quietly laid him down in the pig-stye. When he saw the priest frequently, he said to him, "That was a spree you had Paddy." "Begorra," said Pat. "When I saw you," said the priest, "you were lying with the pigs." "What did you do when you woke up?" "You get up?" "No," replied the Irishman, "the pigs got up." They got up because they were so ashamed of their company.

the drunkards in the police court to be ashamed of the company of men, while professing to be law-makers are law-breakers. There is no righteous action which can be too strongly ex- against such a striking iniquity as associated with men who enter Par- to assist in making laws, and swear them, but yet violate them whenever we have an opportunity to do so to their profit. I wish to say a word or two with respect to the legislation to be before us. I am glad to learn that there is to be some effort on the part of the Government in the way of a spirited home policy. The meaning is this: At the present time the country in Australia is in a state of depression. We know that there are alternating periods of prosperity and adversity. We are now in a cycle of adversity. The Ministry have put forward a vigorous policy and will spend money in useful reproductive works in a time like this, rather than when commerce is bright and labour is plentiful. I may illustrate my argument— I will state it with some sympathy—in this way. Fifty years ago the method adopted by the medical profession in treating fever was to bleed and blister the patient in order to break the fever. But the result was that nine cases out of ten they killed the patient as well as the fever. The new method of treating fever is to feed and comfort the patient—and a very comfortable result it is—to enable him to fight down the fever and survive it. That is the intention of the Ministry. In times of depression they should push ahead with constructive works. But when business is bright and labour is plentiful the political world is prosperous—there are other enterprises outside—the time when we can preach economy. Therefore, I am glad to hear the way in which the honorable member for Swan—I was going to say the Minister for Defence, but in this case he is the Minister for Railways—spoke of the great transcontinental railway which is not only a big enterprise, but will be of great use to the whole of Australia, provided that it is carried out on commercial principles. I am perfectly satisfied from what I have seen in travelling from the west to the east—from what I have seen of the enormous regions of auriferous land there—that the line will tap at its far end a very resourceful country, and that if we carry that railway over the continent, we may make it the means of opening up agricultural, horticultural, and mineral resources of Australia yet unthought of. Let those who are promoting the scheme take a lesson from the past, and this will be not only the biggest thing that Australia has ever undertaken, but it will also be profitable. Let us remember the lessons of the past—let us remember the disastrous consequences of building purely political railways running to a stump and to other places where there is no need for railways. I believe honestly, from what I have seen of the western terminus of the proposed railway, that there are large, infinite, and boundless possibilities there, and that the line will be valuable, not only as a means of defence—and with that matter I have nothing to do—but will serve many other purposes. It will be useful, not merely as a conveyance to travel overland, because the sea is always preferable, but as a means of conveying marketable and perishable products to market; it will be useful in developing the wealth and resources of a wealthy country, and in bringing the extremes of Australia together. It will be not only a matter of sentiment, but a work of utility to the Commonwealth, provided, as I have said before, that it be constructed on commercial principles. I had no intention of occupying the attention of the House for any length of time at this late hour. I rose merely to say that I think the Ministry are to be congratulated on the splendid programme they have put before us. I am sure I have the sympathy of the party which has been referred to in a disparaging way by the leader of the Opposition when I say that if the Government adopt a vigorous policy and carry out works at the present time when there is a great depression upon us, that work will bear fruit, and that it will reflect to the credit of the Commonwealth and will be for the good and the welfare of Australia. I rejoice also at the prospect of the establishment of Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration. It is said that we in Victoria have suffered on account of a drastic Factories Act which is not uniform throughout the States. The enemies of that Act have again and again asserted—with what truth I am not prepared to say—that it has driven capital from this to neighbouring States. There is just a possibility that if there be anomalies or differences in regard to factories legislation in the different States of Australia, one State may profit at the expense of another, because of that advanced legislation, but what we desire above all things in connexion with this matter, is uniformity throughout the length and breadth of Australia. When we have secured that, we shall have taken away the strongest weapons which the enemies of industrial legislation have—and I grant you there is a lot in what they say—in regard to capital being driven from one State to another on account of drastic factory legislation. Let us have this legislation, and let it be fair and uniform. Let there be some court of appeal between master and man. We know that the fight is never equal when the cupboard is pitted against the safe. The cupboard goes in always, and there is no equal struggle, but if we have the dignity of justice—and let us thank God that in British communities law and justice are as nearly as possible synonymous—if we have a man raised above the suspicion of corruption to hold the balance between capital and labour as a final court of appeal, we may be perfectly sure that he will command the confidence of both master and man, and that we shall in that way solve one of the greatest socialistic problems of the present day. It is a laudable effort, and I wish God-speed to this proposed Conciliation and Arbitration Court for the federated States of Australia. I sincerely trust that the Bill will be passed and that it will show to the world that here at least we are prepared to listen to reason, that we have in truth some socialistic legislation. There are some who have an awful fear of the bogey of socialism. We have high authority for saying that we are all socialists nowadays, and so we are more or less—professedly so, and very visibly so at the time of the elections. We want more evidence of this spirit of socialism as a rational way of settling disputes. A court of arbitration is nothing more nor less than a substitute for the antiquated barbarism of war, and as all disputes are capable of being settled by reason, so there is no dispute which can arise between capital and labour in this continent, or in any part of the world, that is not capable of being settled by rational means. The question of the federal capital is one which I am not called upon to refer to at any length, but still I shall say this, that if it was promised—and I believe it was—by the promoters of federation in Australia, that the building of a federal capital would be exacted, that promise should be kept. I am perfectly sure that at the present time it might serve a very good purpose. I dread the influence of either the great metropolis of Sydney or Melbourne in connexion with the Federal Government. Isolation to some extent gives independence, and we shall never be independent of the influences until we have a territory of our own, and can from that exalted height look down upon the whole of the federated States of Australia. As one of the members for Melbourne, I may, in saying so much, be what is distinctly opposed to the interests, but I do say here, publicly, if there has been this promise given to the South Wales, let the Government of the Commonwealth be marked in future by a Government who look upon a promise as equal to a pledge or an oath. There is one for reflection, prudence, and forethought. It is not a thing to rush. The federal capital is not going to be for a day, but let us wait for ever, and therefore let us see that we have all that is necessary for the foundation and building of the federal capital. I am very much in doubt as to the question, but it should be kept before us as an ideal and our goal. I am the more urged to this conclusion on account of the pin-prick policy of those who have kept us here in our possession of these promises. Again and again it has been stated publicly that we are mere intruders who have ousted other men from their rightful place. That impresses upon us the urgency of the settlement of this matter. The Government ought not to be regarded as an intruder in any State of Australia, and certainly, the gentlemen who lead in these matters as I have referred to, will, by their action, inevitably hasten the settlement of the question of the building and the location of the federal capital very much more than any words of mine. I find that the matter, not, so far, referred to the six hatters, no speech at this time can be complete without some reference to the gentlemen. What a god-send they have been to the Opposition! What would have been heard from honorable members if it had not been for the incident of the six hatters? This matter again brings up the question of the administration of the Government. They found themselves armed with a certain law, and they have told by honorable members opposmeet for the despatch of business at half-past two o'clock on each Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday afternoon, and at half-past ten o'clock on each Friday morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday in each week, until otherwise ordered, Government business shall take precedence of all other business; and that on Friday in each week, until otherwise ordered, General business shall take precedence of Government business.

That on Friday in each week, until otherwise ordered, general business shall be called on in the following order, viz:—

On one Friday—

Notices of Motion.

Orders of the Day.

On the alternate Friday—

Orders of the Day.

Notices of Motion.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Resolved (on motion by Mr. PHILLIPS)—

That the honorable member for Riverina, Mr.
John Moore Chanter, be Chairman of Committees of the whole House.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Ordered (on motion by Mr. TUDOR for Mr. CROUCH)—

That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing—

1. The persons appointed since 1st January, 1901, as permanent commissioned officers of the Defence forces of the Commonwealth and their present rank and salary and past service, excepting those appointed only for South African service, and those who, before that date, were officers in the Defence forces of the States.

2. The number of officers of the permanent forces of the Commonwealth who have served in its permanent forces under the rank of commissioned officer.

LT.-COLS. BRAITHWAITE AND REAY.

Motion (by Mr. CHANTER for Mr. HUME COOK) proposed—

That a copy of all the papers and documents connected with the proposed retirement of Lt.-Cols. Braithwaite and Reay be laid on the table of the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Minister of Defence).—These papers seem to me to be of such a character that it is scarcely in the public interest that they should be placed on the table of the House. The Government personally have not the slightest objection to the printing of the papers, and the only reason which would influence me in advising the House not to print them would be the interests of the parties concerned. There are statements contained in the papers affecting the efficiency of persons who have done good service in this State, and who have been for a very long time connected with its citizen forces, and I think their publication will serve no good purpose. I asked the honorable member for Bourke not to move his motion. He had an opportunity, as other members of the House have had, of seeing all the papers, but he is not satisfied, and desires that they shall be placed on the table. Having made these observations, I propose to allow the decision of the matter to go on the voices.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved (on motion by Sir EDMUND BARTON)—

That the House at its rising adjourn until Tuesday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS: QUEENSLAND TEACHERS' VOLUNTEER CORPS: CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

I wish to fulfil a promise which I made to the honorable member for Wentworth that

I would indicate to the House the in which we propose to introduce more immediate measures in our program. In making this statement I want it clearly understood that it applies to immediate business. It is in no sense implied that any measure which I mention to-night will be abandoned or slighted. I do not wish the idea abroad, or to have the inference that the Government is not going to take measures because I do not mention them to-night. All that I have promised to state the order of immediate business. I wish to explain, however, that none of which the Government lays down the conduct of its business can absolutely times from dealing, as necessarily with some short Bill, or some measure of sudden urgency, or some matter from the Senate. That, of course, is always understood. I have further premise that I cannot yet find an exact time for bringing in the resolutions about the federal territories. The report of the commission is ready. I have it from the Minister for External Affairs that he confidently expects to report within a fortnight, and then honorable members must be afforded reasonable time in which to consider it before any measure is placed before them for discussion. I have cleared the way with those statements. I have to say that the Attorney-General will move the second reading of the Juvenile Bill on Tuesday. As the measure differs very materially from that which was introduced by him in an exhaustive and very elaborate speech last session, I intended to go on with the second reading of the Bill without an adjournment. I have an understanding between the acting Premier of the Opposition and myself. The Education Bill is almost part of the Juvenile Bill, and must accompany it, and be introduced with in succession to it. Then two short measures are necessary to enable the Treasurer to know his position in dealing with some matters of business. They are a Bill to abolish the rebate on sugar, and a Bill to convert into a loan from the beginning the payments which have been and are now being made. Without discussing those measures, I explain that they are to be introduced in accordance with the policy which has already been announced of treating each matter with which they deal as a separate measure.

o Bills are to be introduced, both are extremely short, in order to y constitutional objection which e taken if the subject were h in one measure. There will e Conciliation and Arbitration he proposed naval agreement. I t that statement gives honorable notice of what they will be asked th for some time to come. It is however, that I should mention s proposed shall be done in the When the other Chamber has h the standing orders—which, I ill take but a very short time—the er-General will introduce the Senate Bill, and the Naturalization Bill and ts Bill will follow. I make this for my honorable colleague subject eration which may be necessary to h matters as the approval of tele- r mail contracts—which will not time—to be dealt with. That is, s far as I am called upon to indi- nure and order of the business e Government will more imme- troduce.

E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I raw the attention of the Minister ce to the disbanding of the Queens- chers' Volunteer Corps, and par- to bring under his notice the hich appears in the Brisbane f the 2nd June. It appears that s has been in existence about years, and about 417 State have passed through its ranks, it has done very useful work tate. I think it was the desire ble members that, in cutting down mates, retrenchment should not e in connexion with useful bodies nd, so much as in the permanent staff. I will not go into the the case, but I shall be pleased if ter will inquire into the matter, e some statement to the House in it at a later date.

HANTER (Riverina).—I take this ty to tender my sincere thanks to rable member for Wimmera for nominated me to the high and t office of Chairman of Com- and to honorable members for e graciously accorded that nomina- r unanimous support. I wish to em that I shall in the future, as in the past, endeavour to do my duty faith- fully and impartially. I thank them for the generous support which they accorded me during the long session which termi- nated in October last, and ask them to again give me that support during the present session. I assure honorable mem- bers that at all times, when sitting in the chair, I shall know no party, but shall endeavour to uphold the great traditions of the British House of Commons.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan—Minister for Defence).—So far as I recollect, the matter to which the honorable member for Darling Downs has directed my attention was dealt with while I was in England, in connexion with the reduction of the Defence Estimates in accordance with a vote of this House. I do not think that it has come under my notice. I will, however, look into the case, and let him know exactly how the matter stands.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.37 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 9 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

TEMPORARY CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPEAKER, in pursuance of Stand- ing Order 25, laid upon the table his warrant nominating Mr. Batchelor, Mr. Kirwan, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Salmon, and Mr. V. L. Solomon to act as temporary Chairmen of Committees.

TELEGRAPHIC DELAYS.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Com- plaints are frequently made as to the delay which now occurs in the transmission of telegrams between the eastern States and Western Australia. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether it would be possible to make an arrangement by which public business could be facilitated without in any way prejudicing the revenue of the States concerned by using the cable be- tween the Grange, in South Australia, and Fremantle?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—So far as I am at present advised, I think that such an arrangement is possible. I intend to look into the matter to see if such relief can be given.

Mr. KIRWAN.—I should like to know from the Prime Minister whether the interruptions complained of do not occur between Eucla and Port Augusta, on the South Australian portion of the telegraph line, and whether they are not due to the nearness of the telegraph wires to the sea? If that be so, will the Postmaster-General consider an additional method to that suggested by the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython, for improving the service, namely, the removal of the line further inland or the erection of an inland line, so as to get away from the climatic influences which now occasion the interruptions?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I am not sufficiently in possession of the departmental facts to be able to answer the question without notice, but if the honorable member will give notice of it I shall obtain the information for him.

ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Sir WILLIAM McMILLAN.—I have not had sufficient time to make myself acquainted with all the ins and outs of the position in regard to the alleged discrepancy between the census returns of the different States and the names upon the electoral rolls. The matter, however, is of the utmost importance, especially since the Senate elections must take place at the close of the year, and I shall therefore be glad if the Prime Minister will make a statement on the subject, so far as he can do so at the present moment.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It is difficult for me, at the present moment, to make a statement which would be of any value, but the Minister for Home Affairs will be present to-morrow, and I think that if the honorable member will then repeat his question, my honorable colleague will be able, from his departmental knowledge, to make a fuller explanation than it is now in my power to make. I stated what I knew of the matter in answer to a question which was asked when the honorable member was not here. The course which I now suggest will be the best in the public interests to follow, so that the fullest information may be given.

THE GOLDRING CASE.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—On last I called attention to a case which occurred in Sydney, in which a person Goldring was put to some trouble in connexion with the non-delivery of goods signed to him. Both the Attorney-General and the Minister for Trade and Customs promised to look into the matter to-day, and I ask now whether any answer has been arrived at in regard to the Government?

Mr. DEAKIN.—As upon inquiry I found that the papers dealing with the subject were not in the Melbourne house, I telegraphed to Sydney for them. They may arrive by this afternoon, and in any case they should be here to-morrow. It is necessary to obtain the facts before a decision in the matter.

HIGH COURT PROCEDURE.

Bill presented.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed.

That the Bill be now read a first time.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I think we should have some little time to discuss this measure.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is not the intention to debate the motion for the first reading of a Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—I think that it is within the rules of the House in doing so.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will have an opportunity to raise the question upon any point on which he desires information upon the motion. The second reading be made an order of the day for to-morrow."

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a first time.

Motion (by Mr. DEAKIN) proposed.

That the second reading be made an order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I should like to ask the Attorney-General to give us as much time as possible to look into this Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Copies of the Bill have been circulated in a few minutes, but consideration will not be proceeded with to-morrow. It is necessary for the members to have this Bill before them to enable them to understand the provisions of the Judiciary Bill.

Mr. CONROY.—I understand that the measure is supplementary to the Judiciary Bill.

that we must make ourselves acquainted with its provisions to understand it. If the matters with which the Bill deals were to be the subject of regular debate the position would be altogether different; but when it is proposed to legislate on such matters with all due solemnity, so that amendments or repeals can be effected by the passing of Acts of Parliament, it should be given longer notice.

SPEAKER.—The only question before the honorable member can now debate is whether the second reading be made on the day for to-morrow or for some other day.

CONROY.—I am endeavouring to find reasons for deferring the second reading until some later date.

DEAKIN.—The motion now before the House is only a formal one. There is no objection to the Bill being proceeded with on the day.

CONROY.—As I have the assurance of the Attorney-General that the Bill will be taken this week, I withdraw my objection to the motion.

The motion resolved in the affirmative.

QUEENSLAND TEACHERS' VOLUNTEER CORPS.

JOHN FORREST.—On Thursday last I stated that the disbanding of the Queensland Teachers' Volunteer Corps in Queensland was a mistake, I thought, when I was absent in London. I have since ascertained that it was not, and that the disbandment was effected by myself not very long ago.

MESSAGES.

SPEAKER reported the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor recommending that appropriations be made from the Commonwealth revenue for the purposes of the Sugar Bonus Bill, the Judiciary Bill, and the Naval Agreement Bill.

PAPERS.

Papers laid upon the table the following day:—

A memorandum by the Treasurer regarding the refund of rebate of excise duties allowed on sugar grown by white labour.
A report of the officers of the permanent defence force appointed since 1st January, 1901.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In laying upon the table, in pursuance to an order of the House, Papers connected with the retirement of Colonels Reay and Braithwaite, I would like to say that an order has been made by the Senate for the laying of these papers upon the table of that House, too. As I do not want to have a second copy made, I suggest that perhaps there will be no objection to my removing them for a short time to-morrow so that they may be placed upon the table of the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I will see what can be done in the matter.

JUDICIARY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. DEAKIN (Bailarat—Attorney-General).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

When I moved the second reading of this measure in March of last year its principles and details were exhaustively explained. There is practically nothing to be taken away from what was then urged, because the Bill remains substantially the same, and it is now necessary for me only to call attention to a few minor changes, and to address myself to the criticisms offered during the debate upon the address in reply to the Governor-General's speech. A full understanding of the Bill in all its details will, no doubt, be assisted by the consideration of the measure which accompanies it, and of which the first reading has just been agreed to. That Bill provides all the necessary mechanism to enable the High Court, if established, to enter upon the discharge of its duties. It deals with the registers proposed to be established in every State, the method of the trial of issues, the taking of evidence, and the security to be furnished upon appeal, and it has attached to it, in the form of a schedule, a very full set of rules of court dealing with questions of practice, and similar matters which are usually provided for by that means. The two measures taken together would provide for the creation of a High Court of a high character, and at the same time fully equip it with all the necessary powers for exercising the jurisdiction which it is proposed to confer upon it. The first will be supplemented in the Procedure Bill and its appendix, by all the necessary provisions to enable suitors to commence without delay and prosecute without difficulty any and every case which they may wish to submit to its judgment. These measures appear to us to absolutely complete the equipment of the proposed High Court of Australia. I ask honorable members to be good enough to take as read the remarks made by me last year in expounding the general principles of this measure, and in endeavouring to properly estimate both historically and by comparison with other Constitutions the functions of the High Court. Since that time events have marched, and I find that the greater portion of the scrutiny which the measure now receives at the hands of honorable members leads them to question the urgency of the creation of a High Court, and to further question whether, if a High Court is established, the most economical means have been adopted to give effect to that design. While admitting that at any time questions of expense merit the most careful attention of honorable members, and paying due regard to the untoward circumstances in which many of the States of the Commonwealth have been placed owing to the physical circumstances and climatic conditions of the last few years, I submit that in connexion with this measure there are some considerations preliminary even to these. I admit to the utmost extent not only the right, but the duty of all honorable members to criticise this and every other proposal from the stand-point of the expense likely to be involved, but conceive it to be my first duty to call attention to the fact that we have first to look to our duty under the Constitution and the obligations therein specifically imposed upon us. The provisions of our Constitution with regard to the High Court differ from those relating to the High Court of Canada, to which attention was called during the recent debate. In Canada the appointment of the High Court was a comparatively subsidiary matter. The time and manner of appointment were both left wholly to the discretion of the Canadian Parliament. The provision was "The Parliament of Canada 'may' appoint a High Court." But in the Constitution sanctioned by the people of Australia, the form of words occurring in the Constitution of the United States was adopted deliberately and with set purpose, that the judicial powers of the Commonwealth "shall" be vested in a High Court.

Mr. Deakin.

This has been held by judicial decision by universal interpretation to imply date—not simply the choice of Parliament to create or not to create, but a demand from the people from whom the Constitution came that the Federal Judiciary should be created. In point of fact, if we look to sections of the Constitution relating to the three great powers of the Federal Government we shall find them significantly framed in the same words. In the first section of the Constitution proper, it is provided—

The legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, and a Federal Parliament has been accordingly. There was no choice of option, but it was mandatory that the legislative power should be vested in the Parliament. If we turn to sections 62 we shall find similar language employed with regard to the Executive, where the point of time preceded the creation of legislative power. According to 61—

The Executive power of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen, and is exercised by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative, and extends to the execution and maintenance of this Constitution and of the laws of the Commonwealth.

Section 62 provides—

There shall be a Federal Executive Council to advise the Governor-General.

Therefore it is provided that there shall be a Legislature, and that there shall be an Executive, and exactly the same form of words is applied to the Judiciary.

71 provides—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court of Australia, called the High Court of Australia, and in other Federal Courts, &c.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Two years have nearly elapsed since the Commonwealth was established.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. The Legislature was not brought into existence until months after the establishment of the Commonwealth; whereas the Executive was created on the very first day. Surely it is a high time that the third co-ordinating and complementary power of the Commonwealth, the Federal Judiciary, should be established in obedience to the mandate contained in the Constitution?

Mr. CONROY.—Should we not provide to make our Supreme Courts a High Court? We gave them the necessary jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not in the sense in which the words are employed in the Constitution, because if the honorable and learned member will look at the section he will see that it is provided—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other Federal Courts as Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction.

Therefore we have three classes of court to provide for. First, the High Court, supreme over all; secondly, the Federal Courts, which may be invested with local jurisdiction under the High Court; and then the courts of the States, to which the honorable and learned member has referred, which may be invested with federal jurisdiction within the discretion of Parliament. The three great powers to which I have referred are provided for in exactly the same terms, and stand upon exactly the same footing, thereby representing complete federation. Honorable members require to look at the words of the Constitution very closely and to weigh their import very seriously, because it is not possible that the Legislature and the Executive called into existence under the same set of words should now proceed to hold that the third great power provided for in exactly the same way should be treated in a different fashion. The creation of the High Court occupied no inconsiderable portion of the time of the Federal Convention in 1891, and when the Constitution was submitted to the people—particularly in the less populous States—it was continually pointed out from the platform that one of the guarantees afforded by the Constitution for the fulfilment of the many business compacts contained in it was embodied in the provision for the appointment of a High Court. It was represented that this tribunal would secure the full performance of the obligations imposed upon the Commonwealth Parliament, and thus safeguard the interests of the less populous States, which might find themselves in a minority in the legislative body. That aspect of the matter was, to my own knowledge, placed before the public in Victoria from the inception to the close of the struggle, and as far as I was able to follow the course of the electoral campaign, it was represented to the citizens of the other States with equal fullness. When the people of Australia accepted the Constitution, they did so, not only with the provision for the High Court writ large across its face, but on the assurance that the guarantee and security afforded by the Judiciary would be provided for, as well as the Legislature and Executive which they were about to call into being. It would, therefore, be a very grave departure from the Constitution submitted to the people if we either sought to escape or attempted to postpone that fulfilment of our obligation beyond that reasonable time necessary to call the High Court into existence. In the third year of our federal existence we have certainly reached a period at which the third power of the Constitution, the only remaining great power not yet organized and established, should be launched on its career. Under these circumstances I am relieved from the necessity of making that apology which might, under other conditions, be called for in bringing forward a measure involving public expenditure at such a time as this. The Constitution, irrespective of all vicissitudes or events which may follow, contains what are practically instructions to Parliament. The creation of the judicial power was not made conditional, as it might easily have been. No time was mentioned, no conditions were imposed such as abound in other portions of the Constitution. The High Court was regarded as one of the paramount parts of the Constitution, and as one of those which it would be necessary in the very first stages of the Federation to call into existence. Since that is the case, the burden lies upon the opponents of this measure, if they propose to evade the Constitution, to satisfy this House and the country that the mandate, as I read it, in section 71, is capable of being escaped from without a breach of faith, and without a disregard of our obligations. From a practical stand-point it must be admitted, even by those whose knowledge is gained only from the news columns of the daily press, that Federal issues, to the legal decision of which much importance attaches, are multiplying. Under these circumstances we have to ask ourselves how long it is right or reasonable that these issues should be dealt with by purely local courts, and how long it is desirable that the Federal Constitution should be interpreted by the local courts. The law, as it is interpreted by the State Courts, requires to be acted upon in their territory. Should any question be pressed further to a Court of Appeal, decisions from that quarter cannot be ignored. At the same time we are faced with the very serious responsibility of allowing questions relating to the construction of the Constitution, in regard to some of its most important principles, to be prepared for that oversea tribunal upon arguments perhaps of a relatively casual and incomplete character in some State court. Under these circumstances can we afford to rely upon these Courts supported by an oversea appeal? But before dealing with that aspect of the question, I should have called attention to the few alterations which have been effected in the measure before us. The provisions contained in clauses 20 and 24 have been transferred from a later portion of the Bill, and now appear a little earlier than they did previously. Upon examining the Practice and Procedure Bill, honorable members will find that it is proposed to add to this Bill four of the clauses which it was intended to embody in that measure. They will also notice that clauses 17, 40, and 41, whilst remaining the same in substance, have been recast. Clauses 40 and 41—perhaps the two most important in the measure—have been recast in the Bill, whilst clause 17 has been redrafted in the sheet of amendments which has been circulated. Honorable members will further observe that clauses 12 and 13 are new additions to procedure. Clauses 56 and 57 are also new, whilst the last portion of clause 36 from line 30 to the bottom of the page has been added. The sheet of amendments shows that in clause 7 we propose to omit the last three lines referring to the avoidance of the office of Justice of the High Court, as this method of discharging the office does not appear to be consistent with a reading of the Constitution. Another amendment is proposed to clause 44, under which an order for removal can be obtained as a matter of right. With this short list, I think I have directed the attention of honorable members to every alteration that has been made in the Bill that is more than verbal in character. In this connexion I have to express my indebtedness to the Chief Justice of Queensland Sir Samuel Griffith, the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, who have been good enough to call attention to questions of phraseology and of power, and some of whose suggestions have been embodied in these amendments. This little list should have been introduced earlier. I interposed it when submitting to the House that the discharge of our obligations under the Constitution required the immediate establishment of this court. If honorable members will look at the Constitution, or recall to mind the Bill, they will notice how much this view is supported by the very nature of the chapter relating to the Judiciary. It has not been introduced by Parliament, as it was in Canada, to establish some court after its own mind, but according to its own will. The measure upon which this tribunal is to be established is contained in the Constitution. Parliament is allowed to fix the time of its initiation, and to exercise certain powers which are left to it under the Constitution, but speaking broadly the High Court, as it is intended to be, is already created. Its powers and its nature are strictly defined. If honorable members look at the Constitution they will find in section 71, in addition to containing the direction that the judicial power shall be vested in the High Court, adds that the number of Justices shall not be less than three Judges appointed for that Court—two, besides the Chief Justice. If they examine section 72 they will find it provided that these Justices shall be appointed by the Governor-General, and they shall not be removed except upon certain conditions, and that they shall receive such remuneration as Parliament may determine without reduction during their continuance in office. It will also be noticed that in section 73 the Court is to have jurisdiction as a Court of Appeal over the whole of the jurisdiction covered by the States, and that the hands of Parliament are so bound so that no exception or regulation proposed by it shall prevent the High Court from hearing and determining appeals from the States Supreme Courts in any matter in which an appeal lies from those Courts to the Privy Council at the time of the making of the Constitution. In the next section it is provided that no appeal shall be admitted from the High Court upon constitutional questions arising between the Commonwealth and the States. The reason has to be advanced to permit of appeals being taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and a leave of appeal is required in order to bring any other questions may be taken on from the High Court to the mother country. The following section provides e matters enumerated therein, the court shall have original jurisdiction. Section 80 it will be found that the indictment of offences against any one Commonwealth shall be by jury, the same form of words—peremptory andatory—runs through the whole of the matter. Parliament is directed both as to the character of the original jurisdiction, and as to the appellate powers of this court. The matters which are left are important, but they are such as enable the bold design of the Bill to be filled up. I have already drawn attention to the first option that is presented to Parliament. There must be three options, but there may be more. The next option to be found in the fact that while the judges must have a fixed remuneration, Parliament has to determine what that remuneration shall be. Under section 76 the High Court may make exceptions to the provisions as to the hearing of appeals from the States Courts generally, and in section 74 there is an option that Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council may be granted, a very important option indeed.

HENRY WILLIS.—Is that provided for in the Bill?

MR. SPEAKIN.—We are not taking advantage of that power in this measure. The option is contained in section 75, which confers the original jurisdiction on the High Court. Section 76 a further jurisdiction may be conferred on it, and this Bill proposes that in the case of that jurisdiction shall attach to the High Court. Section 77 contains three very important options indeed. This Parliament may confer the jurisdiction of any Federal Court on the High Court. It is not intended to exercise that option, because, for political reasons, we do not intend to confer that power for the establishment of any Courts other than the High Court. At the proper time comes such tribunals as may be created, and under this section their jurisdiction may be defined. Under the second option this Parliament has power to confer the jurisdiction of any Federal Court on the High Court. The third option is that Parliament has ample opportunity of conferring any court of a State with original jurisdiction. Of that advantage no use is taken. This Parliament may authorize suits to be brought against the Commonwealth, or against any State, in respect of matters within the limits of the judicial power. The federal jurisdiction of any court may be exercised by the number of Judges which this Parliament chooses to fix. Advantage is also taken of these. Honorable members, therefore, will see that there remain practically only two options of which it is not proposed to take advantage. It is not proposed under section 73 to restrict—as Parliament may, if it thinks fit—the appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States to the High Court in matters of their ordinary jurisdiction; nor is it proposed to ask the House to curtail the right of appeal which is created from the High Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Neither of these appeals is sought to be restricted by this Bill, but practically every other power which the Constitution presents is accepted. Advantage is taken not only of that part of it which says that jurisdiction shall be vested under these conditions, but also of those portions which provide that the Parliament may exercise the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. In point of fact, nothing has been omitted which could add to the dignity, scope, or influence of the High Court. The whole range covered by the jurisdiction of the States Courts prior to the accomplishment of federation, or at the present time, in matters which are altogether outside of Federal affairs, are made subject to appeal to the High Court, at the discretion, of course, of the litigants. In addition to that, the whole of the federal jurisdiction which this Parliament is authorized to confer upon the High Court is here conferred upon it. Consequently it is, in the amplest sense, all that the Constitution designed that it ought to be or might be—an Australian Court of Appeal for the whole of the courts of the States, and a Federal Court fully exercising the whole of the jurisdiction which the people have placed within its power. How would its creation alter the existing state of affairs, and what is the prevailing condition of affairs in the various States in respect of their reliance upon their judicial tribunals? Honorable members do not require to be reminded that each of the six States of the Commonwealth has its own Supreme Court. They do not require to be told that the jurisdiction of those courts extends over the area of each State and no further. They do not need to be informed that each of these courts is at perfect liberty to pursue its own line of interpretation, its own reading of Commonwealth legislation, or of the legislation of its own State, subject only to the fact that from each and all of these six separate and independent courts an appeal lies to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London, whose judgments are binding upon all. But except in regard to matters in which that appeal is taken, the Supreme Courts remain free. Of course, as a matter of fact, they do in practice follow to a very large extent the decisions of the English tribunals, and particularly those of the House of Lords, the final court of appeal for the citizens of the Empire who are resident in Great Britain, but not for her citizens over-sea. And they do so far as they choose, follow judgments which have been given in neighbouring States. Here we have six separate and independent tribunals whose recognition of each other's judgments, or of any others except those of the Privy Council, is purely a matter of their own choice. It is a matter in which they are free to exercise their discretion. They are in point of fact absolutely unfederated at present; and unfederated they must remain—as unfederated as the six States were, or as any of their powers were, before this Constitution came into force—unless in this, as in the political sphere, federation is brought about by the creation, not only of an Australian Parliament and an Australian Executive, but of an Australian Judiciary. As a matter of fact, this condition of affairs has been unsatisfactory enough for the last 30 years, since it led to a proposal for the establishment of an Australian Court of Appeal, which, even if no federation took place, should undertake to do, in a large measure, for the Australian people themselves what at present the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is often left to do if it is done at all. As long ago as 1870 a commission in this State reported strongly in favour of the creation of what would then have been called an Intercolonial Court of Appeal. While laying stress on the change which has been brought about by the passing of the Federal Constitution, and all it implies, it must not be forgotten that long before federation came within the sphere of practical politics, and quite independently of the whole federal movement, looked at simply from the stand-point of the States themselves, and the litigants in those States, it was proposed, and has been generally supported by high authority, that a Court of Appeal should be established, because it was seen that some kind of legal federation was necessary, even if political federation were ignored.

Mr. GLYNN.—That was to be a Court of Appeal from the States Courts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There was to be a Court of Appeal from the States Courts, and the proposal made in Victoria was, that it should consist of Judges taken from the different States.

Mr. GLYNN.—As it is in New Zealand now.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. The Prime Minister reminds me that a conference of the Chief Justices of the States was held in this State some ten or eleven years ago, and that this project was then set aside by the Chief Justices themselves for reasons which at the moment I do not recall. But at all events the need had been felt, and the proposal had been made before federation, and therefore those who deal with this question, strong as is the case from the federal stand-point alone, cannot ignore that fact.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It was discussed by the Federal Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, but nothing followed. If such a Court were established it would naturally deprive the States Courts of a portion of that independence which they now enjoy, and would make their jurisdiction subject to another tribunal which would be created between them and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In the same way now that federation has taken place, now that the Federal Constitution has become the supreme law of the land, and contains upon its face a mandate for the creation of a High Court, it becomes peremptorily necessary to undertake a step which previously was one merely of convenience or opportunity. The High Court now proposed to be created is not by any means to exercise a wholly new jurisdiction. A large proportion of its authority will be carved out of the jurisdictions of the States Courts on the one side, and to a smaller extent, from the Privy Council on the other. The High Court which is to be created between the Supreme Courts of the States and the Privy Council will be debtor to both, and it will relieve both of some of the duties and responsibilities which they now have.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Will five Judges be able to do all that work?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall consider that aspect of the question in a moment. But what the five Judges or any other number that may be appointed will do will be work of which the Supreme Courts and the Privy Council will be to an extent relieved, and that is an important consideration, as honorable members will see at a later stage. For the present, however, I wish to point out that this does not imply a reflection upon the Supreme Courts as unqualified to deal with the bulk of the tasks which they have been discharging. Some of these courts have been more fortunate than others in having a smaller proportion of their judgments overruled. Some of our Supreme Courts have been remarkably fortunate. Others have not because all State Benches are not upon the same level, nor are the Benches of the same State maintained invariably at the same standard. The fact that it would be possible and profitable to have an Australian Court of Appeal above them does not necessarily imply a reflection upon the States Courts so far as they are States courts. But it offers a very obvious contrast between the kind of tribunal which will be necessary in order to discharge what, so far as they are concerned, may be termed extra territorial duties and the tribunals purely local in character and constitution, if they were called upon to deal with matters outside their own boundaries. Nor do I wish it to be taken as a reflection upon the Privy Council that the desirableness of a High Court now being embodied in the Constitution, its creation is being pressed forward. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs reminded us how much the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and particularly Lord Watson, had contributed to the interpretation of the Constitution of Canada. That debt may freely be acknowledged. But it is also to be remembered that the High Court under our Constitution has a different position and a higher authority than the Supreme Court of Canada. The provisions contained in section 74, if no others, place it distinctly above and beyond it, and outside the category in which the great Supreme Court of Canada is placed. Because the Privy Council is sought to be retained as the sole tribunal of appeal, and because its great services to Canada may be admitted, it does not necessarily follow that the Privy Council, as constituted, is beyond improvement. In the first year of the existence of the Union a conference was held in London, at which the Commonwealth was represented, and admirably represented, by Mr. Justice Hodges, of the Victorian Supreme Court Bench. The conference, by a majority of voices, decided that they would not ask for any present change in the constitution of the Privy Council, and Mr. Justice Hodges, on behalf of Australia, entered a strong but respectful protest. This may serve to indicate some of the matters in respect of which the Privy Council, even as strengthened of recent years, is not an entirely ideal body. Twenty or thirty years ago it was very much less so, but it is not necessary to speak of that time. Mr. Justice Hodges sent in a protest against the present practice of maintaining two courts of final appeal, one for India and the self-governing colonies—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—and another for the citizens of Great Britain—the House of Lords—for these reasons—

1. Because of the danger of inconsistent and conflicting decisions by two tribunals each final, and the uncertain and unsatisfactory state of the law that would result therefrom.

2. Because there is a feeling that the home tribunal is favoured at the expense of the Indian and colonial one, and because the legislation on this subject to some extent justifies the feeling.

3. Because, even if legislation left perfect equality, the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary would naturally be more interested in questions arising in the United Kingdom than in those arising abroad, and would decide any doubt as to which court required their presence in favour of the home tribunal.

4. Because even if there could exist absolute impartiality in this respect, there is likely to be some distrust, and possibly there will be some suspicion that the home tribunal is getting most attendances from the best men.

5. Because as long as these tribunals remain separate it is difficult, if not impossible, to provide satisfactorily for the appointment of Indian and colonial experts.

6. Because the Privy Council is a board, and not a court. I should further add, that as legislation is desired and expected by the majority on this subject, care should be taken that the legislative rights or judicial power of the Commonwealth of Australia are in no way impaired thereby.

What Mr. Justice Hodges was advocating was the substitution of one Imperial Court of Appeal for the two Courts of Appeal which at present exist in the mother country, and for myself I heartily concur with his representations on the subject. But I wish to point out that these considerations not only suggest certain imperfections which necessarily attach to the Privy Council as it now stands, but also indicate certain imperfections which must necessarily attach to any Imperial tribunal when it is established in London, gathering into one all the different kinds of law from all parts of the Empire—the Roman-Dutch law at the Cape, the French-Canadian law of Canada, the Hindoo law, and many other systems. In such circumstances honorable members will realize that frequent appeals, even to a single tribunal in London, will not be sought after; that English legal authorities do not call for that frequency of appeal. What is sought is to establish a single Court of Appeal for the whole Empire, which shall be moved only in respect of cases suitable for the consideration of such an exalted tribunal. Those, it is unnecessary to say, will in our case be few and far between, since the bulk of the work undertaken by the Privy Council at the present time would be far better transacted in the interests of litigants by an Australian Court of Appeal than it could ever hope to be by any oversea tribunal. The class of cases to which I allude are those which are more particularly based, not upon those general principles of law which are common to us and to the mother country, but those special to the development of Australia on its own lines, and in particular directions. Law is only the reflection of the community from which it springs, and especially is it so in a democratic community. In Australia not only do we live under different conditions of social growth, of national development and of climate, not only have we differences of political conditions, but different problems. The laws which we pass possess an Australian atmosphere, and require to be interpreted with a knowledge of the circumstances under which they are passed and applied.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The Church lands case of New Zealand, for example.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is no reflection upon a great Court like the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to say that it must necessarily labour at a disadvantage in some respects when compared with competent courts nearer home or on the spot. One of the first considerations which we face is that its distance involves delay, and what those delays are I have taken the opportunity of ascertaining. Having sent out all the appeals sent from New South Wales to the Privy Council during the last five years, I have noted the time which has elapsed between the judgment at Sydney and the judgment in London—the shortest—and they are only two—under one year; the longest is only four months under four years.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Has the honorable gentleman ascertained how much delay was owing to the inaction of the Privy Council?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, but I consider I am relieved from the necessity of investigation, because I have taken for the last five years, and am going on the average.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But that does not answer my question.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Practically none of these cases has been tried in less than a year; the longest case has taken four years, and the average time has been just under one year and a few months.

Mr. GLYNN.—How many cases have been set down for hearing and not proceeded with? I think that point was mentioned in the Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That does not answer the question. I have taken the cases which have been decided. I have not followed those which have not been pushed to a hearing.

Mr. GLYNN.—Some were not set down for hearing, and some were not set down for hearing by the litigant.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As to that I am not in a position to speak.

Mr. GLYNN.—It was mentioned in the Convention, but the argument was not conclusive.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Of course it is not conclusive. The only case we have—part of the delay has been owing to the substitution of another defendant—we have any experience as a Commonwealth is the case of Kingston against Gadd. Judgment was given on the 9th Dec. 1901; an appeal went to the Privy Council, and, as far as I know, it has not yet been decided. I believe that Mr. Gadd is deceased, and that the company of which he was a member has been substituted as defendant, and may be the cause of a very short

Here is a case which left us on the 9th December, 1901, and of which I have heard nothing.

Mr. CONROY.—Is it still going on?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The case is still going on, so far as we know. Take the next difficulty under which a court oversea must always labour, and that arises out of its remoteness. Of this we have a very striking illustration immediately to hand. From the Times of the 29th April, which has just arrived, I find that the Chief Justice of New Zealand had cabled to London, by means of Reuter, a précis of the important pronouncements recently made by himself and his fellow-Judges on the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Wallace against the Solicitor-General of New Zealand. Sir Robert Stout, who was not one of the Judges whose judgment was appealed against, and who, therefore, was quite dispassionate, sums up the case as follows:—

1. The Council makes the cardinal blunder of assuming that the Maories could dispose of their lands, but Royal charter and instructions of 1846, issued by authority of 9 and 10 Vic., c. 103, as well as 3 N. Z. Statutes, clearly prohibited the disposition of even Maories' occupancy titles.

2. The Council shows its ignorance of the fact that the title was in the Crown, and that only by a grant could the bishop in question obtain the land, and that the Crown was for the foregoing reasons a donor.

3. The charge of misconduct made by the Council against our Solicitor-General was made in ignorance of the fact that, by our procedure, the Solicitor-General, being defendant, had a right to show, in any suit to settle a scheme, that the land had reverted to the donor, and was not a bequest of general charity.

4. The amendment in the pleadings asked by the Solicitor-General, which the Council so severely condemned, was made by the court with the consent of both parties.

5. The Council rely, in aid of its conclusion, upon a Maori war where a war never existed, and on the absence in England of Bishop Selwyn when, in fact, he did not leave New Zealand for nine years after he had given up the trust.

6. That the colonial court, in this case, is charged with grave misconduct, although this alleged misconduct consists only in its own numerous precedents extending beyond 1847, and treated unquestioningly by the courts and legal profession as settled law.

7. That the court did not, as the Council declares, decline jurisdiction, but determined that the land had reverted to the Crown.

Reuter's report goes on to say—

The Chief Justice then, in proof of the Privy Council's ignorance of our laws, gives a series of blunders they have made, most of them in recent years, in deciding other New Zealand appeals. One case, that of Plimmers, is cited, in which the Council, in ignorance of a colonial statute of 1854, expressly forbidding the making of a certain class of contract, decided that such a contract could be made.

The report concludes with some general observations. That shows what errors are possible in a court removed by many thousands of miles from the scene of litigation, when the subject-matter, is peculiar to the country in which it arises.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—It shows also how imperfectly the barristers did their work.

Mr. GLYNN.—They must have been very badly briefed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I can only speak of that which I know. Take the famous New South Wales case, McLeod versus the Attorney-General of New South Wales. That went, on a question relating to bigamy committed abroad, from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. The Privy Council chose to decide the case, not on any of the points raised before them in argument; but on a question of jurisdiction. They turned up the Criminal Law Amendment Act of New South Wales; they took the jurisdiction laid down in that Act as being the whole jurisdiction claimed in New South Wales, and gave their judgment accordingly. As a matter of fact, the point had never been taken in Sydney, and, therefore, the question could not have been argued; but if it had been taken, it would have been known at once that the jurisdiction was claimed under an unrepealed section of a British Act—an Act which had been repealed and re-enacted in Great Britain, but was still held to be in force in New South Wales. Consequently, in looking only to the local Act and ignoring an Imperial Act, probably because it had been repealed and re-enacted in Great Britain—the Privy Council chose to give judgment on a point never raised before them, and gave it in entire ignorance of the local law, which would otherwise have determined it. I shall not labour these points, because to do so, unduly would make it appear as if I were endeavouring to base my argument on an attack upon the Judicial Committee. I have already said that I have no such intention, but we cannot forget the risks to which all litigants expose themselves when dealing at such a distance with intricate questions of purely local law, or determining any right under purely local law.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Or any other law.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They must take the same risks that we all take in our business or other pursuits when they enter a court; but they take a special risk when they allow questions of this sort to be decided over-sea. I admit that a great part of the danger can be removed if each question is first thoroughly thrashed out before a competent court of high standing in Australia, so that every point which can be discovered on either side is carefully taken, so that all the over-sea body is asked to do is to review data which are not disputed. That is a different state of affairs, and to that I do not address myself.

Mr. CONROY.—The Bill will still allow an appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. What I am concerned to point out is that, even allowing for the high prestige of the Judicial Committee in certain matters, it is an undesirable tribunal without a preliminary investigation of the case, which requires to be of a broader and more thorough character than that which has sometimes obtained in all the Supreme Courts of the States. With an Australian Court we should have local judgments sifted more rapidly and more cheaply, a smaller number of cases would go to the Privy Council, and the cases that did go would be better prepared for inquiry and investigation. Honorable members will recollect that in answer to the interjection just made—that we do not propose to abolish the appeal to the Privy Council—I have already called attention to the last part of section 74 of the Constitution, under which—

The Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked.

When the High Court is established; when it has felt its feet, so to speak, in its new jurisdiction; when we are fully informed as to the character and class of cases that come before it, to what extent it, of itself, by the inducements it holds out to suitors, is able to attract appeals which would otherwise go to the Privy Council; then we shall know not only the extent, but the manner in which it is desirable to exercise the power intrusted to the Parliament under that section. How far it will be desirable for us to limit appeals from the High Court to the Privy Council has to be determined. The power of limitation rests in our hands. It is not sought to be exercised at this stage, because it is felt that there should be some practical experience of the working of the court about to be established, and some better idea of the standing it will acquire before we take advantage of it. That is a power of which no doubt Parliament will take advantage hereafter. It is to be remembered also that the power as of right to appeal to the Privy Council has gone under the Constitution. The only appeal that remains is the appeal by special leave—what is sometimes termed the appeal as of grace.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the honorable and learned gentleman say the appeal has gone?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The appeal as of right from the High Court. I am speaking only of the High Court. The appeal as of right has gone, but the appeal as of grace remains. This appeal is what remains in Canada; and, in regard to Canada, the Privy Council itself has already declined to be made the channel for every suit which Canadian litigants wish to send to it. I do not wish to take up the time of honorable members by labouring this point, but the legal community know the cases which are quoted in Wheeler's Confederation of Canada. Honorable members will find there cases in which the Privy Council, without being moved from Canada has sought to restrict the area within which it will grant special leave to appeal. There is not the least doubt that the same principle will apply with an even greater force in regard to appeals from the High Court of Australia. Even before the establishment of the High Court, we have this guarantee that the Privy Council itself, so far from lending itself to the multiplication and encouragement of our appeals, desires to restrict them. If the High Court of Australia be a body of the standing and reputation which this Bill supposes, that tendency on the part of the Privy Council will be strengthened more and more. The consequence is that, what between our legal power of restriction—by legislation—and the restriction which the Privy Council itself imposes, crowded as it is with business from all parts of the Empire, we have every reason to believe that within a very few years a High Court of Australia established on this scale would be practically the final court of appeal in ninety-nine out of every hundred cases arising in Australia, and that a great number of those cases which are now taken to the Privy Council will stop short in Australia. As I have said, the High Court is partly built up by the jurisdiction which it will acquire from the Privy Council. There are first of all the appeals on constitutional questions which cannot go to the Privy Council without the consent of the High Court. The consent of three Judges is required. Then there is the special leave to which litigants are limited; and then there are a large number of cases which will prove to be too precarious when they have been examined by the High Court to justify litigants in going to the large expense of further appeal. These cases, coupled with the power of restriction which we possess, should make this High Court the final court of appeal for Australia within a few years, and should secure to it sure cases except important issues involving points of general law in which it may be desirable to have a Privy Council decision. The Supreme Courts of the States are the other judicial bodies which are asked to part with a portion of their jurisdiction under the Constitution. By the creation of the High Court—under clause 41 of the Bill—which gives the courts of the States federal jurisdiction—but only as courts of first instance—they part, first of all, with some of their appellate jurisdiction. They may also part with power in suits between residents of different States, such as those relating to matters of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction; suits which are brought under the Constitution for its interpretation; or suits which depend upon the interpretation of federal law. If honorable members look at clause 40 of the Bill they will see the matters in which the Federal Courts will have exclusive jurisdiction. They are matters relating to States arising under any treaties; matters affecting consuls in their representative capacity; matters between States and Commonwealth, or of State against Commonwealth, or in which officers of the Commonwealth are concerned.

Mr. CONROY.—“Suits against the Commonwealth,” that is very sweeping.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the honorable and learned member turns to the previous Bill, he will see that this provision has been curtailed, but he must not ask me to discuss details at this stage. With regard to the whole of this original jurisdiction, it is to be remembered that if litigants so desire, they may pass by the Supreme Courts of the States altogether, and begin their suits before the High Court. They are enabled to do this by clauses 40 and 41 of this Bill. Under these provisions they may commence their cases in a Federal Court without touching the Supreme Courts of the States at all. The States Supreme Courts may now lose the jurisdiction they have exercised over appeals from a single Judge. These appeals may be taken direct to the High Court. The jurisdiction which the States courts part with will be taken up by the High Court of Australia, in addition to that jurisdiction which it possesses under the Constitution. We have power to take over matters relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, and also divorce and matrimonial causes. As honorable members know those are branches of the law in which our courts are kept pretty busily occupied; and their transfer to the High Court would mean another large body of business taken from the Supreme Courts and attached to the High Court. The new business of the High Court is extremely important. But it is this existing business to which I desire to first of all call attention; because there cannot be the least doubt that, if this High Court possesses the strength which we desire it to possess, it will by the attraction of its reputation and standing more and more divert business from the Supreme Courts of the States, particularly from any State in which the Bench of Judges at the time may not be thought to be equal in standing and ability to a Bench such as the Federation will supply.

Mr. CONROY.—I should think that the High Court will attract the greater part of the cases.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The greater part. We come to the question of economy, that is an aspect which I ask the House to consider. If we look at section 73 of the Constitution, we find that the High Court is to be a body capable of hearing appeals from the Inter-State Commission on questions of law. It needs very little reflection on the part of honorable members to realize how difficult it would be either to send questions of law, such as would arise from the Inter-State Commission, either to the Supreme Court of any one State—and probably more States than one would be interested in such a decision—or to the interpretation which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would give upon questions requiring the Australian stand-point and knowledge of the peculiar physical, climatic, and other conditions of Australia. What alternative is suggested to the creation of this High Court? If honorable members look at the exclusive jurisdiction mentioned, and at the other appellate work from the States, it will be clear to them that a High Court of the standing which our Constitution contemplates, is a body in which there would be entire confidence throughout the Commonwealth, and to which both people and States would turn with complete satisfaction in the knowledge that they would receive justice from it—which they would receive from other courts—impartial treatment, which would also be meted out to them by other courts; but that they would receive that justice from a body of high standing, far removed from all possibility of suspicion. The probabilities are that there would be no hesitation in submitting to it the most important issues that could arise. I ask again—What is the alternative? One suggestion is that we should be content with things as they are—that we should take the existing courts, with their varying decisions, and be satisfied, in case of any doubt, to abide by the ultimate decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is for the first few years, until the proper organization of the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—My honorable and learned friend says we should abide by that state of things for the first few years. I do not know how long a "few years" may be; but I believe that in the whole of the Convention debates when this question was threshed out, as the honorable and learned member knows, with great thoroughness—because he took a conspicuous part in the discussions—no such proposal was put forth as that we should wait for years until we established the High Court. As far as I know no such suggestion was ever made at the Convention.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But the Constitution has been changed since then by Downing-street, and also by the blunder of the draftsman at the final revision.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If I were to grant all that it would not remove the remarkable fact that at the time when the Commonwealth Bill was under consideration and when all courses for its amendment were open no member of the Convention urged that while these States should be federated in every other respect we should leave the Courts unfederated. And what is even by the most economical or the federal—

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I think the suggestion of the kind was made at the Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. The original native proposal, was that made by the honorable and learned member for New South Wales, Mr. Glynn, who proposed the creation of a High Court, composed of State Judges, with a Federal Chief Justice presiding over it.

Mr. GLYNN.—But I also proposed to abolish the appeal to the Privy Council, and so give the Judges of the High Court something to do.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There was a proposal for the creation of a kind of High Court, which I shall presently consider—The High Court built up out of the State Judges. That was a nominal High Court. But I proposed that there should not be a simulacrum shadow or phantom of a High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No one thought of that. You would leave an optional appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Convention consisted of federalists who were determined to unite these Australian States and did not fail to realize that legal unity was one of the most important direct results which federal unity could occur.

Mr. GLYNN.—It was stated that the Convention did not abolish the appeal to the Privy Council a Federal High Court was necessary.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No one contemplated that we should be asked to rely on the existing federated courts, and that we were to have the advantage of State tribunals without the bond of union except that derived from their common subjection to the Privy Council. For us to do, as now recommended, would be almost a violation of the Convention; it would be an intimation that we did not intend to give effect to its main object, and it would be imposing upon the States an obligation which might result in serious loss to litigants, and a grave injury to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—State courts have complained of federal jurisdiction being imposed upon them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The federal jurisdiction will impose upon them a liability to ral cases. There are cases in which to me highly improper to impose ties upon the States Courts, though courts would, no one doubt, decide adiciously.

HIGGINS.—They were imposed upon adian courts.

DEAKIN.—But the Canadian consist of Judges appointed by the Government, not by the States ments as in Australia. The State of Canada are under the High Court Dominion. The Canadian legal differs from ours.

CONROY.—What is the position of orts in Germany?

DEAKIN.—I should be led too far f I were to contrast the conditions gs in Germany. The proposal here for the time being, until we get the a of the Privy Council, we should e under these different sets of courts ith its territorial obligations and though no decision of any one of eing binding outside the State in it was given. My honorable and friend the member for Northern rne interjected a little earlier this y that the Supreme Courts of the ay regard to each other's judgments. EDWARD BRADDON.—Is not that in stitution?

DEAKIN.—No. They do pay re- o each other's judgments, that is y true, but in what position does ce us? We are subject to the possi- at the first court to deal with an ant question might be the weakest r the weakest in Australia. That ives a lead to all the rest, and they extremely unwilling to disturb the nt arrived at. In answer to the ction of the honorable and learned r for Bendigo that the Supreme Courts t complained, I am reminded that the ole and learned member is in error. x that the Supreme Court of New Wales has complained on two t occasions that a High Court has n constituted to relieve them of the ibilities cast upon them.

JOHN QUICK.—They have not com- of the work.

DEAKIN.—They have complained High Court exists.

GLYNN.—They have complained that ve not been invested with Federal ction.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That is the point. They have complained that no jurisdiction has been conferred upon any of them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And we could give them that jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I should be very sorry to do so. That is the very thing to avoid. I say that the jurisdiction given them under this Bill is ample. That is their jurisdiction as courts of first instance, dealing with matters in their first stage. That involves a Federal appellate jurisdic- tion, and I venture to say the Federation will not be complete unless the Bill gives it. I was speaking of the difficulty of having six different courts, and my learned friends cannot but admit that if an important point is first raised before the weakest court in the Commonwealth, any decision given by that court may be followed by the other courts, or else we shall have varying deci- sions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The other courts will simply look at the decision carefully before they decide to reverse it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly. I venture to think they would look at it carefully before they refused to follow it. But what will follow if they do decide to reverse it? We may have four, five, or even six different in- terpretations of the same section of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We have the same thing with regard to commercial matters now. We have six different courts and no great in- convenience.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have six different courts and a very great deal of inconve- nience. Why was a Federal Court of Appeal proposed, quite independently of federation, if not because of the difficulty arising from varying decisions in the different States Courts? Besides, in the matter of com- mercial and mercantile law we have in the Privy Council one of the highest tribunals in the world. Its members have been dealing almost daily with questions of mercantile law, and have given decisions of great value, of light and leading. In deal- ing with a question arising under our Constitution, we might, until a decision of the Privy Council is registered upon it, be at the mercy of any one of six States Courts. My esteemed friend the honorable member for Gippsland, in his powerful speech the other night, was good enough to refer sarcastically to myself as having thrown a halo over Hades. That I take it would be a great strain upon my capacity; but to throw a halo over six Hades at once is certainly beyond my capacity.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The difference is between six and seven. There will still be six.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I gather from the interjections of honorable members that in their judgment there are no cases in which the Supreme Courts of the States could not deal with the issues submitted to them as well as could a High Court. Let us take the matters which we propose for that very reason, under clause 40 of this Bill, to make exclusively federal, and ask whether the States Courts could deal with these questions in any manner that could be comparable to that in which they could be dealt with by a Federal High Court, no matter how excellent the States Supreme Courts may be. First of all there are matters arising under any treaty. They arise very rarely, but there is one of them above the horizon already. It has arisen in regard to the Vondel case.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—There has been no litigation about that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There has been no litigation about that yet, but it has been threatened. I wish to ask the honorable and learned member whether he thinks that such litigation should be brought before the the State Court of South Australia? The Government of South Australia advance the doctrine that the only executive power vested in the Commonwealth Government is to administer the laws passed by this Parliament. Although we claim an endowment of executive power under this Constitution, direct from the King himself through the Governor-General, it is suggested that we have no authority whatever, except as a committee to enforce laws passed by this Parliament. Are we to be deprived of that executive power, which every State possesses direct from the Sovereign, and every Government in Australia possesses? Are we to be a helpless Executive, incapable of any action until there has been legislation upon the subject? Is a question of that sort to be decided by any State Court in Australia, or even by the Privy Council, until it has been threshed out before an Australian Federal Court capable of weighing the issues.

Mr. GLYNN.—Does the honorable learned gentleman think that the case is a judicial question at all?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I know that the Government of South Australia expect an intention to make it a judicial question.

Mr. GLYNN.—But does the honorable learned gentleman think it is a judicial question?

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a different question. I do not think it can be settled that way, but the South Australian Government believe it can be so settled, and then the compliment of referring the case as an illustration.

Mr. GLYNN.—Good men as they are cannot settle everything.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Next we have affecting consuls in their representative capacity. I shall not trouble about as few cases are likely to occur. But the next matter of cases between States. It may be said that these have not occurred. They have not occurred yet, because they were not provided for. But they are provided for in our Constitution and in this measure. Where are these cases to be tried? Is the possibility of a difference of opinion between the Victorian and Tasmanian Governments with regard to a consular revenue.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Could not one of the State Supreme Courts decide that?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I agree with the honorable and learned member that we could ask either a Victorian or a Tasmanian court to decide such a question, which we could ask a Federal Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I should ask either a Victorian or a Tasmanian court. I have the least doubt that either would do justice in the matter.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have not the least doubt that either court would intend to do justice. But I do say that it would be entirely improper matter to submit such a question to a State Court, and that it is one which ought to be recognised as improper for decision by a State Court. Otherwise we should not a Judge sit in his own court. What foundation principle is there more sacred than that which says that no Judge shall sit in his own cause.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Our Judges in this country are as much Australians as Victorians.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I believe they are, but it does not follow that with their territorial jurisdiction and limited experience these matters they are the proper parties before whom to bring a neighbouring State. Whether we are dealing with the profession or not, and, in fact, even leaving the profession aside, I take it that the majority of the people would feel that that was not a proper question to submit to either of those tribunals.

Mr. CONROY.—The case would go on to the Privy Council if that were done.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly, it would go on to the Privy Council.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Where is the honorable gentleman going to get men of more extended experience?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We propose, under this Bill, to select the best men from the benches and bars of the States and to put them in a position to do impartial justice to all Australia.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The Bill will not make different men of them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, it will not make different men of them, but it will put them in a higher position. Amongst the different State benches there are some distinctly weaker than others, and there are some members of every State Bench distinctly weaker than other Judges upon the same bench. The object of this Bill is to get five of the strongest men picked from all the benches and the bar, so to make up the strongest court Australia has ever seen. No such court exists to-day in Australia as could be created from all the benches of Australia.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—It will after all be only a matter of the opinion of those who select them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But sentiment moves the world, and opinion moves the world.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—There are very few disputes between the States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am very glad to know that, but there are some already on the carpet, and others are foreshadowed.

Mr. FOWLER.—Western Australia may have a big case against South Australia over the railway shortly.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall not deal with that, but refer honorable members to a question in connexion with which litigation is threatened between some of the States, and that is as to the disposal of the waters of the River Murray. The three States of South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales are concerned.

Mr. CONROY.—We could not appoint a court in any one of those States to decide that case.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The question of the disposal of the Murray waters would not be a proper one to submit to a tribunal in any one of those States.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Chief Justices of the remaining three States could perhaps settle it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall deal with that proposal later on, but that is not a High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—What about actions by the States against the Commonwealth?

Mr. DEAKIN.—If honorable members have any doubt upon this question, I hope they will take the opportunity of reading as they may in the library what Story in his famous work upon the American Constitution has to say in regard to cases between States. The passages are too numerous and too lengthy to read, but I shall take one or two of them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They are written after 100 years' experience.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, they are written in the light of experience. In Volume 2, page 492, dealing with controversies between citizens of different States, Story says—

Although the necessity of this power may not stand upon grounds quite as strong as some of the preceding, and I have been dealing with some of the preceding here, there are high motives of State policy and public justice by which it can be clearly vindicated. There are many cases in which such a power may be indispensable, or in the highest degree expedient, to carry into effect some of the privileges and immunities conferred, and some of the prohibitions upon States expressly declared in the Constitution. For example: It is declared that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. Suppose an attempt is made to evade or withhold these privileges and immunities, would it not be right to allow the party aggrieved an opportunity of claiming them, in a contest with a citizen of the State, before a tribunal at once national and impartial?

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—In some of the States the Judges are elected.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In some of them. In different States there are different practices. Story goes on to say—

These cases are not purely imaginary. They have actually occurred, and may again occur, under peculiar circumstances in the course of State legislation.

Our Constitution contains prohibitions upon the States themselves. It contains also immunities of citizens which may require to be enforced upon the States, and are these questions to be tried before States Courts? Are such courts proper tribunals for the trial of such cases?

Mr. O'MALLEY.—In many of the courts of America the Judges hold office at the will of the Legislatures of the States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Story goes on to point that out, but to my mind the objection applies equally, whether the States Judges are elected or appointed.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Cannot the honorable and learned gentleman trust them?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I say that the request is an improper one to make to them. The honorable member seems to forget that the Federal Court will represent the whole of the States.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—They are the same people.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Of course they are the same people, but this is the essence of the matter: That instead of having a tribunal, which, in the public opinion, will be exercising its jurisdiction under a possible bias, we shall create a national and impartial tribunal, national and impartial in every man's eyes. Little thinking that there would be so much discussion upon this particular point, which is taking much more of my time than I anticipated, I consulted Story's book on the subject to-day, and could refer honorable members to a dozen passages in which, taking those very particulars which we propose for exclusive Federal jurisdiction, he gives the strongest reasons, gained by experience in the United States, for the necessity of having them dealt with by a national and impartial court. Every court is impartial, but a Federal High Court would be national and impartial by the very circumstances of its creation. If we take the next class of cases, those of the Commonwealth against a State, we shall see that if we are to remain subject to the jurisdiction of the States Courts, whatever protection we have gained under section 74 against the determination of constitutional questions by any other than an Australian tribunal goes by the board at once. The only power we were able to gain over appeals to the Judicial Committee was this. The British Parliament has carefully exempted all questions as to the constitutional powers between the wealth and the States or between themselves. It has given to the Court the power to pronounce an final decision upon all these cases, and that itself limits the matter which can be taken to the Judicial Committee.

Mr. GLYNN.—Is not the honorable learned member making too large a matter of it? Is not the matter only a question of constitutionality between the States?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I used the words "constitutional powers." I was referring to their limits inter se. From the federal point of view those are the most important vital questions of all, and they are constantly occurring. We have in our Constitution the right to finally decide such cases by a national tribunal, and if that tribunal is created, section 74 becomes a dead-letter. It might as well have been passed. The great effort is to secure it will have been made. If I am told that we may go for a few years, my reply is that in a few years many of these cases will have been decided and decided against us, in defiance of the Constitution. Take the very instance of judgment which has been given in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, the Commonwealth has no power to impose duties upon goods imported by another State. Will honorable members say that is an important and vital matter is not decided by that judgment, quite apart from the amount of revenue involved? At the loss of revenue is immaterial, the money collected goes to the States in any case, but in the future it will be of importance.

Mr. McCAY.—The Tariff, as proposed, decided the question straightway in favour of the States, because the Government put State imports under the head of special exemptions.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Our original intention was to make the special exemption apply to State importations of temporary goods. But it came to be seen that to do so would create a dangerous precedent, and the proposal was withdrawn. For the next few years, and possibly for a longer period, duties upon State importations could have practically no effect upon their revenue, and it therefore at first seemed to us a very courteous thing to provide that the States should be allowed to import goods free of duty. But w of the precedent which would be observed, the Government, on their initiative, withdrew the proposal. That is in which the Commonwealth and States are at issue, and upon which it is the highest value to have the very impartial national tribunal.

GOINGS.—The question is whether the Court will be more impartial than the Council.

DEAKIN.—I believe that the High Court will be as impartial as the Privy Council.

GOINGS.—Will it be more so?

DEAKIN.—All these courts are impartial.

A justice of the peace is impartial to the extent of his ability and conscience.

EDWARD BRADDON.—Is not the learned and learned member questioning the impartiality of the States Courts?

DEAKIN.—No; but I question the impartiality in their impartiality when they decide questions arising between the Commonwealth and the States, or between the States. Take the difference which exists in Western Australia in regard to the interpretation of its Tariff, and about to be decided by the courts in any case should be decided by the national tribunal, that is one. Then take the case which occurred in New South Wales, and to meet which we passed the Act of 1902, temporarily endowing the States Courts with federal jurisdiction. I obtained that Act with great reluctance, as a temporary emergency, and we have a particular reason to be satisfied with the result. The Act, perhaps, created a necessity to carry us over, but the provision for which it was passed is the subject of an appeal. As it is sub judice I shall not speak of it further.

GOINGS.—Unless the States Courts have jurisdiction, claims against the Commonwealth for an amount of only £50,000 to be prosecuted in the High Court.

DEAKIN.—Yes. But when the learned and learned member learns how the Court is to work, he will have no objection. Take the latest case which has been in Sydney, that of Goldring, who does not propose to allude to it because, if it is not sub judice it will probably be so. It comes under the last heading to which I refer, one of those cases in which an officer of the Commonwealth is being sued. In that case the State court held that it had no jurisdiction to issue a mandamus against a federal officer. I am of opinion that in cases of that kind the proper tribunal is Federal. I have now given honorable members two or three instances of recent disputes under each head of the proposed exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court. The cases I have cited will, I think, commend themselves as those which can be dealt with more satisfactorily by a Federal High Court than by tribunals of the States. Some honorable members have indicated that they will not look with favorable eyes upon any proposal to allow or to encourage the interpretation of the Constitution by the courts. They would rather see Parliament left to provide for amendments from time to time when necessary. But such a position ignores the fact that a precise and reliable interpretation, which means a judicial interpretation, is necessary before Parliament can tell what amendment is needed. Before we can rely absolutely on our reading of the Constitution it must have been submitted to the courts. Little satisfaction would be gained by asking Parliament to amend the Constitution if we could be told by those who held a different view that the amendment was not necessary, because, by a proper interpretation, the power that was sought would be seen to be already there. What we need before endeavouring to obtain an amendment is a final interpretation. Such an interpretation would come, as a rule, under section 74, defining the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and the States respectively, or of the States in relation to each other, and should be obtained from an Australian tribunal whose decision would be absolutely final.

Mr. THOMSON.—What about the cost?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am coming to the question of cost, but first it was necessary to explain what the jurisdiction of the High Court will be. I have endeavoured to show how much will be taken from the Supreme Courts of the States and from the Privy Council. I have indicated the provisions which are more or less new, and have called attention to certain classes of cases which, while dealt with by a Federal Judiciary with particular appropriateness, would be inappropriately dealt with by the State courts. I have alluded to the importance, from the Parliamentary standpoint, of obtaining interpretations of the Constitution which will be consistent. If we rely upon the courts of the six States, it may happen that one part of the Constitution will be questioned in one State, another part in a second State, another part in a third State, and so we shall have perhaps six interpretations by courts whose experience in dealing with federal issues will depend upon the number of such issues arising within the States in which they have jurisdiction. There will not be such a body of federal business in each State as will suffice to give to its courts that breadth of experience and knowledge which must come to a body of men, the greater part of whose time will be taken up in dealing with federal issues arising in all the States. Each State will pour into the Federal Court its flood of problems, and thus the Judges of that Court will become practised in dealing with federal questions, and will be able to deal with them consistently. Let federal issues come from what State they may, and impinge upon what provision of the Constitution they may, they must all come to the High Court, whose Judges will be able to lay down lines of consistent interpretation which will establish an authoritative decision upon its dubious passages. For that purpose alone the creation of a High Court is largely justified. If we wish to see all their scattered strings drawn together and twisted into a rope of interpretation which will stand any strain, it must be done by able men whose energies are specially devoted to that end. I come now very close to the question of cost. Honorable members who have done me the honour to follow me so far will have no doubt but that the High Court will have an extensive jurisdiction, which will be taken largely from that of the Supreme Courts of the States. It will relieve them of work which they are now doing, and of some of the work which they did before federation was established.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is very questionable.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Will the result be economy in the administration of the States courts?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think so.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—How?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In the same way as economies have been effected in other departments affected by the Constitution.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The economy effected by the proposed arrangement will be just about the same as the economy which has been effected in other directions!

Mr. DEAKIN.—When the jurisdiction which has been conferred upon the State courts is transferred to the High Court, the Governments of the States will, to a great extent, which they think necessary, effect curtailments and retrenchments.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—They say they will, so now, but they do not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—They say they cannot be retrenched.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Within the last few days Victoria has lost one of the members of her Supreme Court Bench, and the Government of this State has announced that it is not intended to fill the vacancy. In the State there are Judges of advanced age, who will shortly have to retire. It is therefore an opportunity to retrench by removing Judges, but by taking advantage of the termination of the services of those who retire.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—These retrenchments are often long deferred.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In one of the States two-thirds of the Bench are expected to retire within the next twelve months or thereabouts. Honorable members keep too constantly before their eyes the circumstances of the State from which they come. If they look their eyes over the whole Commonwealth, they will see abundant opportunities for an increase of population or the increase of prosperity does not bring more work to the Supreme Courts of the States—for a reduction in the expenditure upon the courts.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—If the Minister suppose that in the case of the States he has just referred there will not be a large number of Judges in the future?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I presume there will always be three, but I do not think that the State concerned may not have the advantage of the example set by the Government of Victoria a few years ago in the measure altering the remuneration of future Judges because of the circumstances of the State, and the work which the courts were asked to do. I have to deal with this subject quite delicately, because it is a matter which affects the responsibilities of other representative bodies. It is not for me to tell them what they should do, but I will do what they think right, and I will do it for me to indicate the opportunity en to them if they choose to take work that is now being done by the Supreme Courts is transferred to the High Court. If the whole of the Federal Court, which will undoubtedly be of great use before very long, has to be taken over by the States Courts, the States Courts will have to be enlarged, and the cost of legal administration in the States may easily be so great that it will exceed the amount required for the High Court. I am reminded that the Commonwealth of Australia will have to pay in either case, which is perfectly true, but the argument is not in both ways. The people will act in favour of them if they pay to the Federal Judges, which they would otherwise have to pay to extra State Judges. I know that the people pay the money in either

Mr. McLENNEDY.—But we do not want them to take over.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. But when it is the Federal High Court is the best, and that its work should be done through federal channels, the way is not open for those who are charged with the local administration of justice to refuse if they choose. The people of the States are now insisting upon economy in the administration of State, and properly so, too.

Mr. McLEAN.—I venture to say that out of every twenty of the citizens of the Commonwealth would declare themselves in favour of the creation of the High Court on the ground of economy.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am confident that I did not do any such thing. In the Bill, provision for the creation of the High Court was deliberately placed in the Bill, and in some of the States the Bill was used as an important argument in favour of entering the federal Bill. I have very little doubt that the people were induced to cast their vote in favour of adopting the Federal Bill because of the reliance they placed on the national tribunal which it was to appoint to deal with national cases.

I believe, further, that if they had appealed to upon the subject of the Bill regarding the proposal to appoint a High Court as wise and judicial, and an economical standpoint.

They say a few words as to the cost of the High Court. Honorable members, regarding their criticism to the expense of the Bill, have taken the figures which I gave last year without paying regard to the explanation which accompanied them. I shall now quote for the first time from the remarks which I made last year as to the estimated cost of the High Court. After going into considerable detail I said—

Honorable members will notice that we put down only the sum of £6,000 per year to provide for all its officers, say £7,000, including the salary of the Crown Solicitor.

I allowed £1,000 for the salary of the Crown Solicitor, but I advertised for applicants for the position at a salary of £800, and hope to receive the nominations of the Public Service Commissioner in the course of a day or two. I went on to say:—

That, added to the £15,000 paid as salaries to the Judges, after allowing for their travelling expenses, associates, &c., will bring the amount up to £30,000 as a maximum.

Every gentleman who has done me the honour to quote my remarks, has left out the words "as a maximum."

Mr. A. McLEAN.—We have known one maximum of £300,000 to be increased to £700,000.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As Rudyard Kipling says—"That is another story." What I am pointing out is that my estimate of £30,000 was given as a maximum. I do not expect that for the first few years the cost of the High Court will nearly approach that figure, but as the result of some experience make a point, when using figures, of stating the case against myself. I named a sum that would be ample for several years, but have already pointed out that while £30,000 provides for a comparatively full equipment in every way, the actual proposal of the Government is to take advantage of State officials and local judicial administrations, to utilize the State buildings, and to avail of existing legal machinery in every possible way. As a consequence, for the first two or three years at all events, the cost of the High Court will not much exceed £20,000.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—It is a pity the Government do not propose to use the existing Judges as well.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will give reasons for not following that course. I have referred to the estimate which you, Mr. Speaker, laid before the Federal Convention at Adelaide, which was the subject of many conflicts during the federal campaign. There the sum set down for the cost of the High Court, excluding the Bankruptcy and Patents administration, for which another £12,000 is provided, is £23,715.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—That was for three Judges, and now it is proposed to appoint five.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I beg the honorable member's pardon. That estimate was for a minimum of three Judges.

Mr. CONNOR.—A Bill could be drawn in such a way that the expenses of the proposed High Court would not exceed that sum. The Bill which is now before us does not meet that requirement.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am now confident that we shall not exceed the sum named in the estimate given by Mr. Speaker. If we have five Judges instead of three, so much more economical we are now in providing for their necessities. After having carefully considered the whole of the surroundings, I can see my way to assure honorable members that I do not anticipate that the expenses of the High Court will exceed £23,715. Having said so much I would ask honorable members what they suppose is the amount spent upon the administration of justice in the six States of the Commonwealth. It totals £1,750,000 per annum, taking into account all branches of that administration.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—That is surely enough to spend. Why add the expense of a High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—But when I am told that a proposal which involves £20,000 a year is the height of extravagance, by what standard am I to measure it—by the cost for the whole of Australia or by the cost for a single State? Even little Tasmania, which spends the least of all the States upon the administration of justice, devotes to that purpose a sum little less than that which it is proposed to spend upon the judiciary of the Commonwealth. Reducing the amount which I have mentioned for the whole of Australia by £1,000,000, the amount spent upon the police, there is £750,000 left. From that I deduct the cost of maintaining the gaols, which brings the amount down to £446,000 per annum. After also deducting the cost of the minor courts, I find that the Supreme Courts of Australia cost £186,000 per annum. Now when a proposal to spend £23,000 upon the Federal Judiciary is denounced as gross extravagance, I want to know what combined States standard of 4 is kept in view.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The proposed expenditure would be an additional enormous cost.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will not. 4 is now spent upon the existing Courts, and the total cost of the Judiciary will not exceed £23,000 per annum, the greater portion of which could certainly be saved by reducing expenditure upon the States courts.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—What is the cost of the Victorian Supreme Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The expenditure of the Supreme Courts of the States is as follows:—Victoria, £43,000 per annum; New South Wales, £79,000; Queensland, £27,000; Western Australia, £10,000; South Australia, £10,000; and Tasmania, £8,000. Included in the Tasmanian expenditure, to which I referred some time before, is the cost of the minor courts and the gaols, the total being £22,000 against the proposed expenditure of £23,000 upon the Federal Judiciary.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. The Minister says that the effect of establishing the High Court would be to relieve the State Courts of half their work.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not say that. I did not say that the State Courts would be relieved of a half their work or any other proportion.

Sir EDWARD BRADY.—The Minister's statement with regard to the cost of the proposed High Court includes the cost of the gaols, which does not afford a fair comparison.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is included in the cost of the administration of justice. I do not say that half the work of the State Supreme Courts would be performed by the High Court, but that half the work of the State High Courts would be taken from the State Supreme Courts, that is a very different matter. There are many matters which the High Court will have exclusive jurisdiction and which the State Courts will be unable to touch, but much of the work which is now transacted in the State Courts could be brought before the High Court. The volume of such business will depend entirely upon the extent to which the suitors feel that they can repose confidence in the High Court and rely upon it to serve their purpose.

ly. Of course there will be business for the minor courts under Federal jurisdiction; but I do not wish to allude to that now. The question at present is whether, with £100,000 spent upon the States Supreme Court, an opportunity is not presented for the States which may make up a good deal of £23,000 required to meet the cost of a Federal Judiciary. Honorable members will see that a very small percentage of the money in the States would be sufficient to make up that amount.

WILKS.—That would be robbing Peter to pay Paul.

DEAKIN.—It would not be robbing any one. The same people pay in every case; but if they pay through a new channel proposed, they will have a Federal High Court. I have already explained reasons why the Federal tribunals would be better, and have shown how they can, with great advantage and profit, meet the expense of the Federal Judiciary without having to incur any great outlay, but simply by savings. In the States in which private practice have assured me that if the residents had an opportunity of appealing to a High Court of Australia a great deal of business would be taken to the Federal Tribunal. They are States in which the professional men do not think that the present Bench is as of high a standing as it might be, and these openly declare that if the High Court were established, a great part of the business which is now done by the Supreme Courts would be taken to it.

A. McLEAN.—They say that they do not know who will constitute it.

DEAKIN.—It will be constituted by gentlemen chosen—

A. McLEAN.—Not by competitive examination or by any test?

DEAKIN.—They will be chosen by the tests which it is possible to apply, and those of present position and social status. Certainly no man will be appointed to it who has not served his apprenticeship in the public bar on the Judicial Bench or in the law bar. Not a word has yet passed in the Cabinet in regard to any particular arrangements, but if the honorable member is satisfied with the selection which has been made by the States Governments in the past, he may rest content that the Commonwealth Government will do its duty none the less well in choosing its Judiciary. The Constitution declares that there shall be at least three Judges, but there may be more. The whole difference, therefore, between myself and the advocates of economy, is as to whether there should be three Judges or five.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If we establish the High Court, it will be necessary to have five Judges, and the tribunal will, therefore, cost far more than £30,000 annually.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I agree with the honorable and learned member that we must have five Judges, but have my doubts as to the expenditure, and will explain why. The Government have decided that five Judges is absolutely the smallest number with which it would be wise to launch this court, because it must be an Australian tribunal in the sense that its members must visit every State in the Union. For this purpose it is proposed to establish a district register in every State capital. Our intention is to take advantage of the State judicial offices, and of their machinery. There is to be a register in every State, and each State is to be visited by a Judge of the High Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—How often?

Mr. DEAKIN.—As often as may be necessary. When I speak of a Judge visiting the States, perhaps honorable members would like to refer to that portion of the Bill which deals with this question. Clause 14 says—

The jurisdiction of the High Court may, subject to the provisions of this Act, be exercised by any one or more Justices sitting in open court.

Clause 15 provides—

Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to any rules of court, any Justice of the High Court sitting alone, may exercise in court, or in the cases hereinafter specified, in chambers, all or any part of the jurisdiction of the High Court.

If we appoint five Judges to the Federal Judiciary, we shall be able to provide for judicial visits to every State of the Union at comparatively short intervals. The quorum needed to hear ordinary appeals will consist of three Judges. These can be engaged in transacting business whilst the remaining two are visiting the different States. But when appeals come from the States Supreme Courts, which themselves consist of at least three Judges—sometimes, indeed, of four or five, and upon special occasions of six—we require that they shall be heard by not less than four Judges of the High Court, and that the concurrence of three of them shall be necessary before a judgment of the Supreme Court of any State can be reversed. Honorable members will see that if we created a tribunal consisting only of the number of Judges named in the Constitution, they would require to be travelling the whole of their time in order to deal with the cases coming within their jurisdiction in all the States. Three Judges would constitute an inadequate Court to hear appeals from the States Courts. In this connexion I would point out that the quorum of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council consists of three members, but most cases of appeal are heard by five Judges, and very often by more. If the High Court of Australia is to fill the position outlined for it under the Constitution, it must be an appeal court so strong that in going to it after their cases have been heard by the Supreme Courts of the States, people will feel that they are going to an appeal court of a higher grade than is at present to be found in Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We cannot get that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think we can.

Mr. CONROY.—Shall we not want ten Judges at first?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think not. I have said that when this Court is equipped, and in full swing some years hence, I think it will cost £30,000 a year.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—It will have no local habitation till the federal capital is established.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It will have a local habitation under the Bill until the capital has been built.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—What will that cost?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is intended that we shall use either the States Courts or any public building of which we may have control till the seat of government is removed to the federal capital. If honorable members reflect upon the matter, I think that very few will hold that less than five Judges are adequate to constitute the High Court. They will feel that five Judges, sitting together if necessary, will be able to deal with the business coming before them, and that the decision of Australian appeal cases, instead of occupying one year and nine months, as they sometimes do when they are taken to the Privy Council, will not absorb more than six months.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Litigants will bring their cases home afterwards.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think not. A tribunal were in existence such as was to be established, very few litigants whom an adverse decision had been rendered would be bold enough to proceed. When the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is satisfied as to the quality of the judgments which it receives from Australia, it will be very slow to alter them. That tribunal, so far as it can, upholds the decisions of the States Supreme Courts. How much more will it uphold those of the Federal Judiciary?

Mr. McCAY.—Does the Attorney-General include New Zealand?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Occasionally there are lapses, I admit. The High Court of Australia has been well supported by the Committee of the Privy Council, and there is not the slightest doubt that the Australian tribunal will be similarly supported. When we seek to appoint five Judges to the High Court, what do we ask? In New South Wales there are still five Judges, notwithstanding that this State has just parted with a high judicial dignitary; in Queensland there are five, in New South Wales there are five, and I am told that applications have been made for the appointment of an eighth Judge. I believe that the establishment of the High Court will render the appointment of an eighth Judge in New South Wales unnecessary. In Western Australia there are five Judges. Altogether there are 27 State Court Judges in the Commonwealth. If we compare the proposed strength of the Federal Court with that of the Supreme Courts of the States, it will be admitted that five is not an excessive number of Judges to appoint, and when a High Court is in existence, the number of State Supreme Court Judges will be open to a reduction as the States Parliaments think fit to effect. I find that the High Court is already occupied more than double the time I had intended to take up. I had proposed to direct attention to what is a very important part of the Bill, namely, the provisions from clause 42 onward, relating to the removal of causes from the State courts to the High Court. Honorable members will realize that the proposal of vesting the States Courts with federal jurisdiction has been taken full advantage of. Almost the whole range of federal jurisdiction has been entrusted to the States Courts.

Sir LANGDON BONTTHON.—But, as a rule, will not increased expenditure prevent their removal?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not able to under- stand why the honorable member for South Australia assumes that there will be in- creased expenditure in cases coming before the High Court, as distinct from those coming before the States Supreme Courts. I take it that the scale of fees would be the same.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There would be an increased expenditure if we had to pay fees both to the States Supreme Courts and to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It might be so in that case.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If there is a removal it must mean more expense.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It might not mean more expense. By taking their cases to the High Court, instead of to the Supreme Courts, litigants remove the risk of an appeal being necessary. If they chose first to go to the Supreme Courts of the States, and subse- quently to the High Court, the expense would be greater than if they took their cases to the High Court in the first instance. But any expense directly involved in the removal of causes would be relatively small.

Mr. GLYNN.—The main expenses in matters of original jurisdiction are those relating to witnesses.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But as every capital is to be visited by a Judge of the High Court there can be no greater expense in bringing a witness before him than there would be in bringing him before the States Court.

Mr. GLYNN.—There will not be much use, in that case, in having a High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It appears to me that it will be of great use. While the State courts can be utilized to the full, this power of removal provides a safeguard. If a liti- gant is satisfied, there will be no removal; but if either party is dissatisfied except in the cases named, there will always be an opportunity of removing the case to the High Court. I pass hastily from this subject to deal with the alternative proposal, which I really should have reached long before. There are many other points, but leaving them untouched, let me thus briefly dismiss the proposal that there should be no High Court; that we should trust to the Supreme Courts of the States as they are, and to the final appeal from them to the Privy Council.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Only for some years to come.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I understand that. But there is another alternative. It is that we should have a High Court in name—not a High Court such as is shaped in the Constitution, but one constituted by taking its members from the Benches of the different States. Some have said that the court should consist of the Chief Justices of the various States, while others have said, "Choose your Judges from the States Benches." We should thus create a High Court of a certain number of State Judges sitting together from time to time.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—That is implied in the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In my opinion, it is not only not implied, but presumptively forbidden. The Constitution says that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in certain courts, and may be vested in others; but it goes on to say that the Justices of the High Court shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council. Would these various Judges be appointed by him? There would be no great difficulty in doing so; but, having been appointed, their positions would be permanent, until proved misbehaviour or incapacity. This High Court is not one that we can have to-day, and get rid of next year, or whenever occasion arises. Commit yourself to this once, and you commit yourself to it indefinitely, because the Constitution provides that our Judges shall not be removed except on an address from both Houses of the Parliament praying for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity. If we are going to create a High Court consisting of Judges who are to act for and serve as Judges of the High Court under this Constitution, they must be appointed in this way and upon these terms. They must be appointed by the Governor-General in Council; they will not be subject to removal except on an address by both Houses of the Parliament, and the remuneration must be such as this directs.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—But we have such other federal courts that the Parliament creates.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That provision in the Constitution does not refer to a Court. Of course I am not expressing this matter to my right honorable friend. He has foreseen the consequences of the proposal.

Mr. GLYNN.—They could be easily come if we wished to carry it out.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know how they would be overcome. Does my honorable and learned friend propose to ask the Judges to place their resignations in the hands of the Government before they are appointed, so that their services may at any time be dispensed with? Or does he propose that we shall be bound to the Judges for the terms of their natural lives, in the case of proved misbehaviour or incapacity?

Mr. GLYNN.—There would not be any inconvenience if we did that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In which course?

Mr. GLYNN.—In any course.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I contend that the temporary appointment is prohibited by the Constitution, and contrary to every principle.

Mr. CONROY.—But the honorable learned gentleman proposes in his course to make temporary appointments.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. I have no intention of that clause to get rid of the very object to which the honorable and learned member refers.

Mr. CONROY.—I see that the honorable learned gentleman has done so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What I am pointing out to the House is that in my opinion the alternative proposal would not result in the creation of the High Court intended by the Constitution—the High Court to be the third power of the Constitution. In the first place it implies a breach of the Constitution.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Not a breach of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes. In the first place it would make fulfilment of the requirement of section 72 of the Constitution extremely difficult. If we committed ourselves to a court it would be no temporary appointment, but a commitment once and how are we to choose the Judges to sit on that court? Are we to draw from the Chief Justices of the States? If so, we shall commit the choice of the Judges to the States and not to the Federal Government? Are we to say that the Judges shall be picked out? That would make a matter of choice or of chance. Choice is invidious and chance is dangerous. How are we to select the various Judges from the various States Courts? That is a critical question. It must be obvious to hon. members that if we are to have a Court all that I have been saying as to the extent of the jurisdiction, the powers, or the influence of the Court, might as well have been left to the States.

A. McLEAN.—If it were once decided the whole question would drop very easily.

MR. DEAKIN.—I think not. That is not the State view of the matter. It is the view of the State judiciaries admirably, but there would be no reduction. There would be an increase in business, an increase in the number of Judges in the various States, and an increase of expense. That would be the only effect. If we took Judges from the State benches; if we took a Judge, for instance, from the bench of New South Wales where, it is said, there is sufficient litigation to justify the appointment of an additional Judge, we should be asked to pay—and it would be a proper obligation—the cost of the Judge. At all events we should be asked to pay the cost of the Judge who would take the place of the Chief Justice or other member of the bench whom we called away to attend to federal work. Would it be satisfactory that the Federation should pay the cost of the States in order that they should be able to attend to federal work from time to time instead of paying for Federal Judges, who would form the tribunal contemplated in the Constitution? Are we to depend on the convenience of the States as to when the Judges can be spared?

MR. EWING.—Would they be able to spare them?

MR. DEAKIN.—Would they be spared at any time to federal business?

In point of fact, would not the proceedings which this kind of court would be subject to the convenience of the various Courts, the States Judges, and the convenience of the States? After the State business had been dealt with and the State courts satisfied, the leisure time of the Judges or some of them might be given to the requirements of the Federal court. No such body as that would draw any number of appeals from the State courts. Probably no such body as that would command the confidence of the Privy Council or of the public to a greater extent than the judgments of the Supreme Courts do now, because these particular Judges would not be chosen by any one responsible for the choice of those best qualified for the particular class of work required of them by the Commonwealth. In the various courts of the States there are men who are practically specialists in particular directions. Some of them are specialists whose knowledge might be called into account so far as the High Court was a court of appeal from States business, but which would be wholly inapplicable in regard to the difficult and bulky matters of federal jurisdiction.

MR. GLYNN.—Would not that difficulty—the diversity of legislation—arise in regard to the High Court as proposed by the Government?

MR. DEAKIN.—But nearly every State can be represented on the High Court Bench, as proposed in this Bill. We have six States, and five Judges are to be appointed so that four or five States can be represented.

MR. HENRY WILLIS.—That is the way in which the Government expect to make the choice.

MR. DEAKIN.—Yes. Each of these men will come over not only as a federalist but as one possessing a knowledge of the laws of his own State, to assist the court in coming to a decision in regard to those laws.

MR. CONROY.—Why a federalist? Is not the only consideration to be the question of fitness? Is not a good Judge a good federalist?

MR. DEAKIN.—He may be. I do not know what Marshall's chief qualifications were in other directions; they may have been excellent, but they were quite sufficient in his federal jurisdiction to enable him to make an imperishable name by his judgments. And so of the men to be appointed to our High Court. Some of them may be excellent in other directions, but we hope to find certain of them with a special aptitude for dealing with and interpreting the problems afforded by the totally new conditions of federated Australia.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What if the Government should find two Marshalls in the one State?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In that event we shall break our rule. I shall be glad to be advised of their existence. I know that in speaking of this federal interpretation I expose myself to the sarcasm of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who told us with perfect truthfulness the other evening that there was no mystery about the Constitution, that it was "only a law." But the Bill of Rights was only a law. The Reform Bill of 1832 was only a law. Every charter of liberty to Great Britain is only a law. The Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of Canada, too, are only laws. But by calling either "only a law," do we deny the fact that they operate over an enormous area, and that they impinge on an immense complexity of National, State, and local interests?

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Does the fact that a man is called a federalist make him any the more competent?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, but if he is a federalist he should be more competent to interpret the Constitution. It is not the mere name of federalist that makes him competent or endows him with the necessary qualifications. We can point to particular members of the United States judiciary who have made names for themselves by exhibiting their particular federalist competency in the construction of their Constitution. Other names remain besides these, names that are great, it is true, but of men who were without that special qualification for the interpretation of the Constitution. It is equally true to say that all the liberties and privileges we have, or which the people of the mother country enjoy, rest only upon laws, and that a law might take them away to-morrow. When, therefore, we see that the Federal Constitution is of peculiar complexity—that it is drawn in such general terms, and involves such an enormous area that it requires special wisdom in its interpretation in order that its interpretation may be effective; when we see that we shall be bound by that interpretation, my honorable friend will admit that the Federal Bench, from the mere fact that its Judges are to be composed of men of continuous federal experience—men who are constantly dealing with the Constitution from some point of view, and constantly harmonizing the sections of it which are brought before them—will have a fitness for dealing with these matters which no ordinary court could possess.

Mr. HIGGINS.—What the honorable learned member evidently wants is a bench.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No such suggestion has been made by me. The federal bench, because it is federal will be impartial in dealing with every State and every interest of the community. It will represent the community. Even as regards the Commonwealth, it will not have an overwhelming interest in any one interest may be balanced against another interest; the interest of one State against that of another State, or some part of a State, while the court will also deal with matters in which the interest of some class of the community is in conflict against those of another class. It is not possible to imagine a conflict between State and federal duty in the matters which will be brought before the High Court. The whole trend of my argument has been to show that the federal bench will be lifted above local considerations, and that it will give to every State and to every interest that consideration which is its due. I mention only one more point under this head, which I desire to refer. I allude to the salaries of the Judges, which, perhaps, it would best be discussed in committee. The sum proposed to be set apart for the salaries of the five Judges is £15,500 per annum, not taking into account any reduction which might be made in the expenditure on the States courts in consequence of the reduction taken off them by the creation of the High Court. New South Wales at present pays the salaries of its Supreme Court £19,100 a year; Victoria, even on its reduced scale, £11,500 a year; Queensland, £11,500 a year; Western Australia, £7,100 a year; South Australia, £5,400 a year; and Tasmania, £3,000 a year.

Mr. WILKS.—But those courts will have to work all the year round.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The High Court will have to work all the year round. The other States will have to be visited. The objection made a few minutes ago by the honorable and learned member was that the Judges would not be able to take all the work. They will be a full year's work in visiting all the, and transacting the business in original and appellate jurisdiction.

EDWARD BRADDON.—They will not the different States unless they have there to do?

DEAKIN.—No.

EDWARD BRADDON.—And they will little work to do.

DEAKIN.—In my opinion they have work to do in every State, and in of the less populous States more relatively speaking, than in the more populous States, because of the greater strength of the Federal Bench. I know I shall have offered to me a few pensions, which I venture to anticipate. In the United States the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is 2,100, of the other Judges £2,000—and it is an appellate court practically without original jurisdiction. Those were the sums in 1787, when a very different state of things was obtained. But it has only been maintained by the practice of taking wealthy men, at the bar had accumulated sufficient to enable themselves to live at Washington. Only at the end of the session just past, in consequence of a strong party fight, a measure was thrown out which sought to raise the salaries of these Judges to £3,000 a year. What American knows of the salaries of Judges is shown by this fact: that in the State of New York, where modern conditions prevail, there are 34 Judges now—drawing a salary of £3,500—as much as we propose to give the Chief Justice of Australia. People in Australia with America, but they are comparing salaries which were fixed more than a century ago, under circumstances entirely different, and which legislators have been seeking to alter time and again. They do not compare Australia with New State.

O'MALLEY.—One tenure is for life, the other is for only five years.

DEAKIN.—In New York they are actually paying 34 Judges as high a salary as we propose to pay to our Chief Justice.

MCCAY.—How are those Judges appointed?

DEAKIN.—In New York some Judges are elected. I notice that when I talk of salaries, I am asked how the Judges are appointed, and when I talk of their appointment then I am asked what about their salaries. However they are appointed, it shows that the scale of salary for the Judges of the chief court of the United States is not the scale of salary which is adopted in America to-day. The States are setting it aside, and in the session just closed the Congress was asked to set it aside.

Mr. WILKS.—Will the salary of our Chief Justice carry a pension?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We propose to give a pension on a fixed scale with which the House will deal. Again, take Scotland and Ireland. The population of Ireland is 4,500,000, not three quarters of a million more than the population of Australia. The Lord Chancellor gets £8,000 a year, the Master of the Rolls £4,000 a year, the Vice-Chancellor £4,000 a year, while even a land Judge gets £3,500 a year.

Mr. MCCAY.—That is why it is called a most distressed country.

Mr. DEAKIN.—On the King's Bench the Lord Chief Justice gets £5,000 a year, the Chief Baron £4,000 a year, and all the other Judges £3,500 a year.

SIR LANGDON BONYTHON.—Were not those salaries fixed when the population was much larger than it now is?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know, but what about Scotland. That is not a most distressed country. It looks after its expenditure most carefully, and its population is nearly similar to our own. They pay the Lord President £5,000 a year, the Lord Justice Clerk £4,000 a year, and the other Judges £3,600 a year.

Mr. McDONALD.—I think the honorable and learned gentleman is in error about the population.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The last return showed that the population was a little over 4,000,000.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Who appoints the Judges in Scotland and Ireland?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Crown.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The Crown is not a Scotchman or an Irishman.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Crown represents Scotchmen and Irishmen.

Mr. CONROY.—We could not give less to our Judges than the States are giving to their Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In Australia three States pay £3,500 a year to their Chief Justices.

Mr. TUDOR.—What are the salaries in Canada?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In Canada they pay £1,650 to the Chief Justice, and £1,450 to the Associate Judges; but every profession and calling there has a scale different from the English scale, and different from our own scale.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is merely an appellate court, and it sits only three times a year as a full court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—In Victoria, the chief railway commissioner is paid £3,500 a year, and he has two associate commissioners at high salaries. I take it that the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth will do work not less important than that of managing the Victorian railways, great as they are. However, I hope that honorable members will share with me the responsibility of having detained them so long in the endeavour to answer the queries which they have put to me.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—How about the writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. DEAKIN.—There will be provision for that. I put once more the consideration with which I opened my speech—that we are called upon by the Constitution in a mandatory and peremptory fashion to vest the judicial power of the Commonwealth in a High Court. I have not heard of any proposal in this House or any other House from the most infatuated States rights man that the proper way of establishing this Parliament was not to elect one but to constitute it from the members of the State Parliaments. Nor have I heard of any proposal for forming the Government of the Commonwealth by asking the State Premiers to meet together and transact our business for us.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—The Premier of each State was taken.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Premiers of the States were taken—

Mr. A. McLEAN.—If the Government act upon that precedent, they will take the Chief Justice of every State to form the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Even so, their standing as the Judges of the High Court of the Commonwealth would be very much better than it would otherwise be. If our Government is composed of those who had previously held high office—and the highest office—in the various States at all events, it was a condition of their exercising their present power that they should lay down their former office, cease their old relations, and owe allegiance to no one except the Commonwealth. But the proposal that although we have a Parliament by the people of the Commonwealth Executive which is under their control are to have a judiciary which is not under their control, but which is selected simply from the State judges. Of course, it would be unreasonable to push that comparison too far. Nevertheless, it brings home the fact to the eye of the Constitution the three stand together, and that the judiciary is the third power in the Commonwealth which is ordered to be constituted precisely the same terms as the Executive and the Legislative. There is no difference ever; precisely the same phrase is used in it is of the same mandatory character.

Mr. CONROY.—There is no provision for replacing the Executive.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is provision for replacing the Executive, and in an easy fashion. I have no doubt but that an honorable and learned member would take to do it at very short notice. There is justification for creating the High Court that it should be high not only in name in character, in standing, and in influence. I freely confess that if honorable members propose to have a court, it should be composed of two or three members chosen casually from the State by some method yet to be disclosed. It will be little to be said for its expense. It will be an addition, with the expense it costs, to the expenditure of the Commonwealth. It will not be a substitution. It will not allow for economy in the future. It will be of comparatively little use except to keep the place warm for the High Court to be afterwards created. But if the High Court is created of at least five members and these are to be picked men from the States, then it will discharge, first of all, the great general duty of providing a Court of Appeal for all matters that are judicable in the State. No matter what they are, or where they are, they may be brought on appeal to the High Court, and with a High Court of that nature very few of them will go to the Privy Council, even if the appeal to the Privy Council is not restricted.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Most appellants ignore the High Court and go to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I undertake to say that most appellants would not ignore the go another apportionment. This task is indeed unwilling to trust to chance Courts or to a scratch court built up of the States Courts in their moments. It seems to me it is work worth doing for the Commonwealth—worth far more than we propose to spend.

A single erroneous or mistaken decision which drives us into the cost of an appeal to the people, for an amendment of the Constitution or other costs which may follow from the defeat of our administration in consequence of adverse decisions, may easily involve far more than the £20,000 a year proposed for the High Court. When I speak in this way I do so certainly with no personal motives and with no personal ambitions; not because it has fallen to my lot to occupy this particular office, but because whether my conclusions be justified or not they are formed from the experience gained during my term of office and uttered with a due sense of responsibility. What I have said in regard to the need for the High Court and its potencies applies to the High Court which I have described. Nothing I have said attaches or can be attached to any other.
I must not be held responsible if a court of another complexion is created. Those who create it will take the responsibility for its character, cost, and consequences. I have simply sought to deliver my soul by giving a careful and exhaustive study of this question in all its branches; first, to learn our duty under the Constitution, and next to devise the most practicable way of giving effect to its mandate. The measures which I have placed on the table are the result of great technical labour given by others besides myself, upon whom I have been bound to rely, and at all events constitute a machine which is certain to work, and work well. Justified as we are now and at all times in passing proposals under the microscope of economical examination, we must remember that after all we are not looking at a State institution with only a local operation. We are not forbidden to lift our eyes, but are called upon to do so to the full extent of their federal capacity, which embraces all the States. We have to remember that this court is intended to visit all the capitals of Australia, to deal with business in all of them, and to gather it to a centre. It is to be a federal body, which must inevitably take its place even above the admirable courts which we have already established in the States. We require to use the federal telescope as well as the State microscope when we look upon the work which the High Court has to do. Surely the cost to Australia becomes small in comparison with the nature and magnitude of the work to be done and the area over which it has to be transacted. It is an area six times that of the States, yet there are States in Australia which spend more than twice the sum upon their Judiciaries that we propose to spend upon the High Court of Australia. Look at the continent over which the operations of this Court will extend, consider the difficulty of its task, the work to be done—work which some honorable members are prepared to say is more than five men can do, but which I believe five men can do; that work is certainly worth the sum which we propose to spend upon it. Nearly all of us who are here have been members of State Legislatures, and too many of us are prone to bring with us into the consideration of federal concerns the scale which we have formerly applied to State affairs and State finances. We are scarcely federal yet, even after our three years experience. I remember that the instant we met in this Parliament we forgot all the former predictions of the glamour that was to surround a Federal Parliament in the new era that it was to inaugurate. There was to be opened before us a fairy region from which we were to derive miraculous advantages. I do not think that any one can accuse this House of having been carried away by federal or any other kind of glamour. Directly we got to work we dropped down to the old parliamentary jog-trot, and fell at once into the familiar parliamentary ruts. Since then we have worked with our noses to the grindstone, without a thought of the fairy realms on which we were supposed to be entering, or of the new era that we were presumed to be enjoying. We never hear of the glamour, and of the fairyland now, so sternly practical have we become in our application to the business before us.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There will be a jog-trot about the High Court before it has been established long.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Here we are now, after two or three years of practical labour, in which we have been called upon to look after the affairs of all parts of Australia—to the extreme north in connexion with the question of a white Australia, and then again to the extreme west, as often as my right honorable friend, the Minister for Defence, has called our attention to it. We have been compelled to think on an Australian scale, and it will be well if we do so in connexion with this question. We shall then have no difficulty in the establishment of an Australian Parliament. We seem to be, as Matthew Arnold says, "Terribly at ease in Zicm." In this Parliament be pictured under a name. We deal with these great problems which are brought before us not on the basis of the interests which are involved in them, but according to the narrower considerations of our former local politics. The creation of this Court affects every class, affects every interest, in this community. If it is created, it will surely become for Australia the Supreme Court, and stand above all other courts. No one can say that the matter is a light matter, or that the price of it is too much for such an end. It is measured either with the work which the Court has to do, or with the area over which it has to do it in. Let us then once lift our eyes forward to that future Commonwealth in the shaping of which constitutionally, this Court will play a large part.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—The Attorney-General certainly must compliment the Attorney-General upon the ability and the tenacity of his speech. That it would be eulogized by every one who knew him was perfectly assured; his nice sense of what the occasion demanded made it comprehensive; our apprehension was certainly assisted by the gift of phrase which enables the able and learned gentleman to be perfectly lucid. In following him I express my feeling by a quotation from the Attorney-General may remember

As in a theatre, the eyes of men,

After a well-grac'd actor leaves the scene

Are idly bent on him that enters next

Thinking his prattle to be tedious.

My position is perfectly expressed by the quotation in following the Attorney-General while honorable members have his eloquence still ringing in their ears. At the time I was pleased to find that on this important occasion he has come rather close to the subject than was the case in the very recent address which he delivered last night, and to which it was not my good fortune to listen. I thought after reading that address—and after re-reading it last Sunday in order to refresh my memory—that perhaps after all, it was not an unmixed evil that he was not present to listen to it, because it was a very exercise of such gifts as please charm into ineffectiveness our power. But the question is not to be decided by any indulgence in rhetoric or by dealing with generalities. The question is one of sound common sense and prudence, if there is not, as the Attorney-General seeks to assure the House, a clear intention in the Constitution for the immediate establishment of this High Court. I am going to be influenced by no ideal considerations, and not by grandiloquent expressions of the Attorney-General, as to this glorious tribunal to be set up in Australia. As to the question upon which the honorable and gentleman laid greatest insistence—not at greatest length—and which, I admitted, would be conclusive as to the question for the establishment of the Court, namely, the question of the question being mandatory upon the honorable members will perhaps be decided that at the very outset the Attorney-General stated that there is no intention. He said that there is a clear intention contained in section 71 of the Constitution for the immediate creation of a Court; that we are bound not to delay the people, but that we must be guided by the faith which the people reposed in him and others told them that the High Court was to be immediately established. All I can say is that I never told the people that there was a mandate for the instantaneous establishment or creation of a High Court. In fact I mentioned that my intention was that we ought to proceed slowly and cautiously. I said that at the time when the High Court was in its infancy, we should be particularly cautious, and I rather endeavored to lead the people to assume that the economy we hoped to prove deserving of their trust. Indeed, I said that if we do not have an appeal court, we might have been suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith to have a court constituted of State judges which would be quite adequate to meet present necessities. I would again thank the Attorney-General for that that of appeal court which came under the censure of his eloquence to-day and was suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith in a DEAKIN.—No, it was suggested in a different way.

GLYNN.—It was put forward by Sir Samuel Griffith as a suggestion well worthy of consideration at the beginning, whether we should not constitute a court of Judges of the State courts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Convention decided that we should not do so.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Convention was too pedantic in regard to many of these points. It showed too great a tendency to follow closely the example of the United States. Because in the United States they have an Inter-State Commission and a Supreme Court, we in Australia, on the principle of analogy, were to have these bodies also. But the analogy of the United States is not applicable at all, for the obvious reason that there was no court in America to control the dissentient and conflicting decisions of the tribunals of the different States, whose temper was in the true sense of the word out of sympathy with the Federal spirit. If we examine this recommendation of Sir Samuel Griffith for the establishment of a temporary High Court we shall find that it was made as recently as 1897, and I am unaware that the Queensland Chief Justice has publicly annulled the expression of this view—unless the Attorney-General in the communications which he has received from Sir Samuel is in possession of information showing that he has changed his opinion.

Mr. CONROY.—I understand that six months ago he was still of the same opinion.

Mr. GLYNN.—I am glad to hear it. At all events there has been no public abandonment of that opinion, which was made in the interests of economy. Now, is the establishment of the High Court really mandatory upon us? Suppose the High Court were not constituted—what tribunal could compel us to establish it? Could we be compelled by mandamus? If it had been really mandatory the intentions of the framers of the Constitution would have been expressed in different terms. The expression they would have used was not that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the Supreme Court, but that there shall be established a Supreme Court in which the judicial power shall reside. I think that those alternative suggestions were made at the Convention—if not in open convention, certainly at some of the meetings of the Judicial Committee. Had that mandate been imposed upon us the wording of the section would have been very different from what it is. If the contention of the Attorney-General be right, then, during the last two years, the various decisions given on Federal laws are nullities; because, if there are no courts in which is vested the judicial power of the Commonwealth until you establish the High Court of Australia under the Constitution, there has been no court during the last two years to decide either on any point of interpretation of the Constitution, or in regard to any laws passed by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And all the revenue collected must go back.

Mr. GLYNN.—Everything is wrong; laws have been without a court to enforce them, and all things judicial that have been done under the Constitution have been nullities. As the true test of an argument is to push it to its conclusion, the reductio ad absurdum of the Attorney-General's argument is that everything that has been done has been futile, so far as legal remedies are concerned. But apart from that, is there any present need to establish the High Court? The court has two jurisdictions, one appellate and the other judicial. Does the Attorney-General say that the judicial power of the Commonwealth is not vested in the Privy Council in appellate matters? Will the power go when we establish the High Court? Undoubtedly not. You will only have interposed between the litigant and the Privy Council another appellate tribunal; and probably instead of expediting the final attainment of justice you may have ministered to its retardation. Again, as regards the temporary High Court, it is significant that in 1870 an Act was drafted by the Commission to which the Attorney-General has referred, under which Act a court to be composed of some of the Judges of the States was to be the supreme tribunal throughout Australia. The terms of office of the Judges under such an arrangement must then, as now, have been prescribed by the States Constitutions. The Attorney-General, in this connexion dwelt upon the difficulties under the terms of our Constitution of establishing such a court, owing to the fact that under section 72 the Governor-General would have to make the appointments, but the terms of office would practically depend upon the State laws. There was a similar difficulty urged in 1870, but difficulties exist to be overcome when a reform has to be effected. They are not to be made mere pretexts for avoiding what should be done. There are not to be made objections, as there have been by the Attorney-General, to what is clearly expedient. They are to be for statesmen to overcome. Those who have advocated a separate tribunal recognize that the Constitution contained a few difficulties, but none of us for a moment thought of sitting down and saying that they were insuperable. I am sure that with the diplomatic tact which the Attorney-General is always able to display, he will find, if he approaches the Executive of the various States, that they will be too happy to fall in with his suggestions. Where is the difficulty of the terms of office being prescribed by State law? We do not wish to dismiss our Judges every year, but can select two Judges in each State, and there are six States we can have six Judges from whom the necessary quorum of five may be formed. What harm is there in the fact that their terms of office are prescribed by the Constitution until incapacity or misbehaviour is established against them? They do not anticipate misbehaviour on their part, but if we are in a fix about getting rid of them we should be able to show incapacity if by reason of their State duties they cannot devote themselves sufficiently to Federal matters. Their incapacity may be explained in an address to both Houses. I mention this to show that the difficulty will disappear if there is a will to do it. They should, though when magnified by the easy eloquence of the Attorney-General, they may appear stupendous. As New Zealand they have there a court on exactly the plan recommended by Samuel Griffith. The Judges of the islands constitute really the persons of the Appellate Court in New Zealand, and I think they meet three times a year at Auckland. This is a scratch court, and it is found that they dispense a good deal of justice. Though this composite court does not exist under a Federal Constitution, the conditions are not dissimilar, and the efficiency we know that the Justice of the two islands of New Zealand have shown against the Privy Council in a manner which has secured the eloquent approval that we have listened from the lips of the Attorney-General himself. So that the honorable and learned gentleman's eulogium I may say that courts of this character are likely to be adequate of very high functions. The learned gentleman in dealing with New Zealand referred, as one of the strong points against the opposition to this Bill, to the fact that the Privy Council as a tribunal has latterly been declining in popularity, or, shall say, in efficiency, because there had been cases like that in New Zealand over which they were pretty strongly taken to the Judges of the Court of Appeal.

MR. DEAKIN.—I said they had rather improved of late years.

MR. GLYNN.—Then, what was the burden of the attack the honorable and learned gentleman made upon the Privy Council?

MR. DEAKIN.—I say it is dangerous to have a remote court dealing with matters purely Australian.

MR. GLYNN.—That is to say that the diversities of our laws render them difficult of interpretation. As regards difficulty of interpretation, I cannot see that the situation will be much improved when we establish a High Court of Australia. We shall have, in non-federal matters, six benches with six sets of laws, which will have to be interpreted by a tribunal which is purely local. There are great differences in the laws of the various States of Australia, at all events in relation upon the settlement and tenure of land and the various Acts will have to be dealt with by a Federal Court that has no State experience. In this matter there may not be the same objection to the creation of a High Court of Australia that is now taken to the Privy Council? There will probably be few experts in local law on our High Bench as there are in the Privy Council.

MR. DEAKIN.—How can that be?

MR. GLYNN.—Not a single State in Australia has copied the land laws of any other State, and their laws are not similar in many respects.

MR. DEAKIN.—In many respects they are not.

MR. GLYNN.—We must remember that the High Court of Australia will have to deal with upon appeal matters arising under the various laws, and which have been dealt with by Judges of the different courts in the various States.

MR. DEAKIN.—We shall probably have five of the different States represented on the Federal High Court.

MR. GLYNN.—On an appeal from South Australia, for instance, we shall have at least four Judges who will know no more about the particular legislation of South Australia than do the members of the Privy Council, assuming the honorable and learned gentleman's argument to be correct.

MR. DEAKIN.—There is much similarity in our State laws.

MR. GLYNN.—On the subject of local laws I need only refer to the name of Lord Watson, to whom the honorable and learned gentleman appealed, and his reputation is known to almost every one who has studied jurisprudence as that of a man who has an extraordinary knowledge of civil law.

MR. HIGGINS.—The mining laws of Western Australia are quite different from the mining laws of the other States.

MR. GLYNN.—No doubt they are, and a little consideration at once shows that it is only a question of degree as to the comparative ignorance of our State laws by the Privy Council and the High Court of Australia—that is, in purely State matters. So that upon close examination I think that several of the objections raised by the Attorney-General ought not to strike the House as being quite as potent as, owing to the honorable and learned gentleman's powers of attractive expression, they may seem to have been. My point is that there is no mandate which we are obliged by any sanction to obey, nor is there really any clear mandate in the Constitution as to the immediate creation of a High Court. I need not press the point, but really, if honorable members will look at section 73 of the Constitution, they will see that it must appear absurd to suggest that we are obliged by the intent of the Convention and the letter of the Constitution to create a High Court at once, when the power is vested in us by the Constitution to take away all its appellate jurisdiction. The Attorney-General knows that under that section the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court can be cut down to zero.

MR. DEAKIN.—No, the honorable and learned member must recollect that he moved an amendment himself.

MR. GLYNN.—I did in respect of non-federal matters, because I pointed out that the provision in America had been used to destroy the jurisdiction conferred upon the Federal Courts created by Congress. Honorable members will see that under section 73 Parliament can absolutely cut down to zero the federal jurisdiction, but what we cannot do is what my amendment provided for. We cannot take away the right of appeal from State courts to the High Court in cases in which a right of appeal to the Privy Council existed at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth; the object of that provision being that, if appeal to the Privy Council is eventually abolished, there will be in substitution an ultimate court of appeal in Australia. Otherwise it would be in the power of the Federal Parliament to take away the right of appeal which previously existed to the Privy Council without allowing an appeal to the High Court of Australia. Subject to this exception, this Parliament can take away the whole or reduce almost to zero, if a nominal balance is to be left, the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court. That being so, there clearly cannot be an imperative direction to us to create a High Court at once, so that the only point which, if established, would be conclusive as regards the alleged mandatory provisions of section 71, comes to nothing upon examination. Now, as regards the work of this tribunal, I hold that the real point which we have to consider is whether at the present time it is expedient to create a new tribunal in Australia manned by five new Judges with an original jurisdiction, which admittedly they can only exercise by a very large encroachment upon the jurisdiction of the State courts, and with an appellate jurisdiction which is really not final in a single instance. Is such a court as that really necessary at this stage of our career? I say that if it is not, the plain duty of honorable members is to vote against this Bill. I say that in no case will the decision of the High Court of Australia be absolutely final. In every case there is the power of appeal on application to the Privy Council, except where the point involved is the constitutionality of the statutes of a State or of the Federal Parliament, or a question of constitutionality between a State and a State. These are the only two cases of constitutional power in which the only power of appeal which may be exercised must be on the certificate of the High Court of Australia. But, again, there is a limitation there, because it is only in respect of a constitutional matter that the certificate of the High Court is necessary, while on all other points, even in the very same case, there is an appeal left open to the Privy Council. So that if we do create a High Court at once, we may have a case refused by the High Court on one point, granted by the Privy Council on another, and alternative appeals in connexion with the very same case. We may have an appeal by the defendant on the one point, and an appeal by the plaintiff on the other. We may have an appeal on a question given by the High Court on a question ultra vires, and an appeal by permission to the Privy Council without the permission of the High Court upon another point in the same case. So that it seems to me that we are really be mixing matters to some extent, and an immediate creation of this High Court. I was one of those who advocated the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council, but it has been retained, and for that reason I believe the creation of the High Court is premature. The jurisdiction of the High Court will be appellate or original, and as regards the appellate jurisdiction, shortly, it will have an appellate jurisdiction in all decisions come to original matters and—

Mr. HIGGINS.—In all matters.

Mr. GLYNN.—Perhaps the honorable and learned member is right in stating it shortly, but really I think it is to divide the question for the purpose of enabling laymen to comprehend the matter more clearly. The matters specified and enumerated in the Constitution for greater clearness, and that is the reason I proposed to follow the principle of the Constitution. There can be an appeal from the Supreme Court to the High Court in a matter above a certain amount fixed by the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—£300.

Mr. GLYNN.—Practically in all cases of State or Federal, above the limit fixed by Parliament there can be an appeal. In cases where an appeal did not exist before federation, a State matter to the Privy Council, and under State law an appeal has been allowed since federation—I do not think it must, by the Constitution, be an appeal to the High Court of Australia in the first instance, as Parliament can take it away, perhaps the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne put the point strongly. We are given, subject to the exceptions imposed by Parliament, an appeal in all matters from the Courts of the States, with a certain limitation preventing the abolition of the right has existed to the Privy Council prior to federation. I do not, however, wish to go into details in the matter, and I accept the statements of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, that practically upon all matters there may be an appeal to the High Court of Australia, but from that court, as I have already said, there is still another appeal to the Privy Council. Though in federal matters following the analogy of the Privy Council, I acknowledge that there will not be appeals, because in the Canadian case Prince v. Gagnon, it was laid down that an appeal would not be allowed when the matter was of public interest and importance. In Canada they do not allow an appeal to the Privy Council unless some matter of importance or public rather than of pecuniary interest is involved. Still there are appeals from the High Court of

I think they average one and a half a year, though they are not so long as direct appeals from the courts of the Provinces. The position as regards appeals is qualified by the fact that if there is an appeal in all matters, still in numerous instances—appeals from the courts in State matters—there is not an appeal as of right to the Privy Council.

There is an appeal from the decisions of the Supreme Courts of the States in all State matters, direct to the Privy Council. With that right of appeal we cannot interfere; we cannot restrict it, cut it down, or restrict it to any particular class of cases.

These appeals will constitute the greater bulk of the appellate business for the High Court, but to the extent of probably two-thirds they will go direct to the Privy Council, because about the percentage of the Canadian cases that overlook the Supreme Court of Australia and go direct to the Privy Council.

These cases may go also. In these circumstances it is idle for the Attorney-General to describe the High Court of Australia as the court that will finally interpret the Constitution. How can it, if there may be a conflicting decision of the Privy Council? How can it, if an ultimate appeal is to be made to the Privy Council? How can it, if an appeal will be exercised in constitutional matters, because these are cases of great importance, and cases in which the appeal will be extended to the litigants to go from the High Court to the Privy Council, even if in Federal matters they cannot appeal direct? Practically it amounts to this: that a case in which the interpretation of the Constitution is involved, being a matter of public interest and of great importance, will be exactly the case in which the Privy Council or High Court will give consent for an appeal to the Privy Council until we have abolished appeals to that body. It is for this reason that in the Convention I, and I think also the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, advocated the abolition of, failing all, direct appeals to the Privy Council, and desired to send all appeals to the High Court of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—A resolution was carried providing that there should be no appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of a State.

Mr. GLYNN.—The suggestion, after that was cancelled and some appeal home was to be retained, was that all appeals to the Privy Council direct should be abolished, and that an appeal, whether upon a State or a federal matter, should lie first to the High Court, and then to the Privy Council. The Melbourne Convention reversed the Adelaide decision, abolishing all Privy Council appeals. If the Constitution had provided for an appeal through the High Court to the Privy Council, or as might be, until determined by the Federal Parliament, it would have left us masters of the situation, because, then if we came to find the power of interpretation passing out of our own hands into those of the Privy Council, we should have been able to put a stop to it. Had that arrangement been made, a great deal of the opposition to this Bill would not exist. In this connexion I should like to repeat a few of the figures which I have already given to show how small the number of appeals to the High Court is likely to be. When speaking on the subject upon the motion for the address in reply, I mentioned that the total number of appeals to the Privy Council from all the States during the last twenty years was 223, about a dozen of which—six from Victoria, but I do not know how many from each of the other States—were not adjudicated upon. That is less than twelve appeals per annum from all the States. But over a longer period the average would be much less. Tarring, in his Law of the Colonies, says that "from the beginning," which I take to mean from the beginning of constitutional government, down to 1893, the appeals aggregated 174, or less than four a year. But dealing only with the last twenty years, the appeals averaged only two per annum for each State. If what has happened in connexion with Canada happens here, two-thirds of the appeals will still go to the Privy Council. It was thought in 1875, when the Canadian Supreme Court was created, that it would be called upon to decide most of the local appeal cases, but the appellate reports from month to month show that the greater number of the appeals still go direct to the Privy Council, and the last copy of the reports contains, I think no fewer than three appeals from Canadian courts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It all depends upon the court.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Attorney-General will not say that, as a matter of necessity, the Australian tribunal will be superior to the Canadian tribunal.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It must be remembered that Canada is nearer to England than we are, and that it is easier to appeal to the Privy Council from the Canadian courts than from our courts. From what I know of the Privy Council, I think that the High Court will be able to rival it.

Mr. GLYNN.—The fact that it takes three or four weeks longer for a steamer to go from Australia to England than from Canada to England will not make much difference in regard to appeals to the Privy Council. I think that we may fairly be guided by the Canadian statistics, and therefore we are not likely to have half-a-dozen appeals a year brought before the High Court. The total number of appeals in Canada down to the year 1893 was only 155. The Attorney-General referred to Marshall. It was of great assistance to the members of the Convention, in framing the Constitution, to have such a splendid exemplar as was afforded by the Constitution of the United States, which has been referred to by Mr. Gladstone as one of the clearest and simplest charters that the pen of man ever wrote. But we have this further advantage, that for some years to come we are not likely to be troubled with many of the vexed questions of interpretation which in the beginning distracted the people of the United States, because many of the decisions given by the leading American jurists, and particularly by Marshall, are absolutely applicable to our Constitution, since in regard to many points its lines are practically identical with the Constitution of the United States, its spirit the same.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Does the honorable and learned member think that it will not be contended that the differences between the two Constitutions render rules applicable under one, inapplicable under the other?

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt it will be contended; but the clearer the law, the clearer the litigation under it. It has been estimated that not more than 25 per cent. of the cases which are taken to law are brought before legal tribunals, the remainder in 75 per cent. a fairly good lawyer, notwithstanding the absence of provisions in the statute books, the multifarious decisions of the courts, is able to advise his clients not to follow Marshall's judgments are always regarded as models of lucidity and consistency, exactness, and will it be said that the lines of our Constitution are not laid out in the American decisions which, for instance, that Acts of Congress repugnant to the Constitution are void, that the rights of States to pass laws where the Constitution is silent is clearly established, that the judgments of the courts of the United States are supreme over inconsistent laws, and that the authority of Congress to implied or reserved powers is established, which establish the power of the Parliament in matters of trade and commerce? Are not all those decisions here? And in regard to many other points to which I need not refer, the principles of interpretation have been practically finally laid down for us by American decisions. The decisions of the American courts are therefore, in settling these matters, a good way to prevent appeals to our High Court. Furthermore, we must recollect, in dealing with the American cases, that the subjects were brought forward for decision which cannot come before our own courts. During the first fifteen or twenty years, about 153 out of something like 1,000 cases dealt with questions of international law, which cannot arise here.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Has the Commonwealth made any treaties upon which questions of law can arise?

Mr. GLYNN.—We have adopted many of the Imperial treaties, but, so far as I am aware, there are no treaties in which litigation will arise.

HIGGINS.—There has never been a case relating to treaties raised in the courts.

GLYNN.—A case like the Vondel is not a matter for decision by the Court. It is a matter for diplomatic arrangement between the States and the Commonwealth of Australia, the Imperial authorities, a matter governed by etiquette and custom, not a matter for judicial decision. I cannot see the possibility of treaties coming before a judicial tribunal here. Then in America protracted cases affecting questions of impairment of contracts were brought before the courts. There was the celebrated Wright case, in which the validity of a contract and the question whether it was in violation of the principles of the Constitution arose. In that case it was decided that the obligation of a contract was to be maintained, and was not affected by ex post facto legislation; but no such case will arise here. Therefore it is plain that there will be fewer cases brought before the Court of Australia than were brought before the Supreme Court of the United States. Between 1790 and 1801 there were six decisions upon constitutional questions given by the Supreme Court of the United States.

DEAKIN.—I think that there are as many cases as that under weigh here now.

GLYNN.—Some constitutional questions have arisen because the Government has not attend to suggestions made in the House.

DEAKIN.—I do not know what cases are.

GLYNN.—I will tell the honorable member one. There is now on business paper a notice of an amendment moved upon the Judiciary Bill, giving power to compel by mandamus the performance of a Federal officer of a statutory duty. It is suggested that power should be taken for the purpose in the Claims Against the Commonwealth Bill.

DEAKIN.—We could not consent to that.

GLYNN.—We are really creating difficulties that will have to be settled by a judicial tribunal for which we are now asked to provide. We should be performing our duty to the public more strictly if instead of creating difficulties we endeavoured to remove them. In reference to the proposal to give certain rights of action against the States and the Commonwealth, I urged time after time at the Convention that this should be provided for in the Constitution itself. I think the Attorney-General will admit that the cases which have occurred here during the last twelve months have not arisen out of the Constitution itself, but have been brought about by carelessness in legislation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Three or four of the cases arise under the Constitution itself.

Mr. GLYNN.—There are certainly not many such cases, despite the fact that it is at the beginning of our career that points involving the interpretation of the Constitution are most likely to arise. When such points are once settled they will be disposed of for ever, because the decisions of the High Court will be final if the Attorney-General's hopes are realized. For the period from 1801 to 1825, 62 constitutional cases, or less than two per annum, were adjudicated upon by Chief Justice Marshall in the United States. At present, the most numerous of all the cases are those relating to patents. Now, if there is one part of the world in which patent cases might be expected to arise with great frequency it is the United States. The admixture of races, together with the necessities of the people in the development of a new territory abounding in magnificent and various resources, has resulted in unparalleled fertility of invention, and consequently the patents applied for in America per head of the population are far more numerous than in any other country. Curtis, in a recent work upon the American judiciary, says—

Patent cases form the most important branch of civil jurisdiction, both in the magnitude of the interests involved as well as the amount and quantity of litigation.

I hold, therefore, that for the next fifteen or twenty years we are not likely to have many patent cases to take up the time of the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We ought to have a Patent Bill passed this session.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt, but we may have to wait some time before the High Court is appealed to upon any question relating to the patent laws. I may point out that in America the Federal Judiciary, owing to the greater powers of Congress, has a far larger jurisdiction than can possibly be conferred upon our High Court. The Federal authorities have control of the land, and questions between the State and Federal authorities are continually cropping up.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Except in that regard the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court is narrower than ours will be, because there is no appeal from the States Courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—But they do appeal from the State Courts to the Supreme Courts.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Only upon matters within the Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes. What I wish to point out, however, is that in the United States the power of legislation by the Federal authorities is far greater than here. Land legislation, which, as a subject, really absorbs the greatest proportion of the time of our States Legislatures, has to be dealt with by the Federal Government in America, and as mining matters are to a large extent under State control, there is a continual clashing of jurisdiction. For that reason a great many cases in connexion with land claims have to be adjudicated upon by the Federal Court. With regard to the appellate jurisdiction, all I have to say is that there will be too little business for the High Court to transact during the next fifteen or twenty years to justify us in creating any such body. It is proposed under the Bill to give the High Court original jurisdiction of a very extended character.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As large as the Constitution will permit.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, practically all the powers that are optional under the Constitution have been assumed by this Bill. Some of those referred to in section 74 have been assumed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No, we have not touched upon the question of appeals dealt with in sections 73 and 74.

Mr. GLYNN.—At any rate all the matters referred to in section 75 of the Constitution are included. Some of these powers are not likely to be frequently exercised. It is conceded that there will not be many treaty cases, and the same remark applies to "cases affecting consuls or other representatives of other countries." The suits between States are not likely to be of great frequency here, whereas in America owing to the large number of States they are continually cropping up. These are the only cases, except those relating to the positions of ambassadors and consuls, in which the United States Supreme Court has original jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They do not fully exercise their original jurisdiction, because none of their business begins in the District Courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, it begins in the Federal Courts, but not in the State Courts. The United States Supreme Court has a very limited original jurisdiction over a few cases beyond those which arise from disputes between the States. Owing to the large number of States in the Commonwealth, a class of case is likely to occur here with far less frequency than in America. The frequency of this kind would increase, not in a geometrical, but rather in geometrical proportion, according to the number of States. In the United States there are six States in one federation, and in twelve in another, it is likely that the number of cases to be dealt with in the latter case would not only be double, but much more numerous, because, as the Bill shows, the large number of States in the American Union results in a considerable proportion of such cases being referred before the Supreme Court. In giving the proposed High Court very extensive powers, the whole of the jurisdiction now conferred upon it in regard to original matters is proposed to be taken under the Bill, and independently of that an attempt is to be made to practically take away original jurisdiction in Federal matters from the State Courts. The Attorney-General has admitted that after the Bill becomes law, much of the business will be drawn from the State Courts of the States to such an extent that an opportunity will be afforded for an extensive economy in connexion with the States' Judicature. In Hansard, page 10, the honorable gentleman expressed his opinion that the High Court would draw to itself naturally, and without any aid, a considerable share of the litigation which has hitherto flowed to the Supreme Courts of the States.

To provide for this, extraordinary powers of removal are to be given. A defendant will have a right in any case, at any time, to remove litigation from the Supreme Court of a State into the Federal High Court. That is centralization with a vengeance. What does it mean? It will permit a defendant to absolutely deny justice to a poor plaintiff simply by putting him to a great expense. Supposing that action is taken in the Supreme Court of New South Wales by a comparatively poor plaintiff against a mining company in regard to a federal matter, the company might a giving security, have the case removed from Western Australia to the jurisdiction of the High Court in the capital. A rich defendant in such a case could force a poor plaintiff to come to Western Australia to a court somewhere in the backwoods of New South Wales.

If the Attorney-General thinks that it is working in the direction of economy, I do not know what economy is. A proposal would involve centralization in its most aggravated form, and might involve itself into a practical denial of the right of the parties. Under clause 45, it is provided that either of the parties who desires to have a case removed from the jurisdiction of the State Court to that of the Federal Court, as omitted to exercise his right at any stage of litigation, he can do so at any stage.

MR. DEAKIN.—That is, if he shows cause.

MR. GLYNN.—Yes, but even with that condition, there is nothing to prevent a party from availing himself of his right to have the case removed without any qualification whatever.

MR. DEAKIN.—But a Judge of the High Court would be able to sit in the State in either of the plaintiff and the defendant.

MR. GLYNN.—Very true, but the Attorney-General proposes to cheapen justice at the expense of its efficiency. Are we to substitute for the Judiciary of the States, which is effective now, one Judge of the High Court who may sit at intervals be able to go on circuit? Itinerant Judges are detained for any length of time upon circuit duty, the court will either be undermanned or have to delay the transaction of its business until the itinerant Judges can reach the capital. We shall be marring the efficiency of the Federal tribunal in bringing justice to the doors of the States.

If the Bill passes as it stands, bringing about centralization in original matters, will entail very great expense upon litigants, and probably crush out the poor. The original jurisdiction conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States is very small. Upon this Mr. Willoughby says—

A large majority of cases are those brought on appeal from the lower courts. The cases in which its original jurisdiction are now few in

Why, then, should we depart from the American precedent we have followed in creating a High Court, and propose to enlarge to the fullest possible extent its original jurisdiction, instead of, as in America, cutting it down as far as possible? Curtis remarks—

The most important class of cases under the original jurisdiction—in fact, the only class which has been of any practical importance thus far in the history of the court—has been suits between States, or between a State, and the citizens of another State.

MR. DEAKIN.—And not between the residents of a State and the State.

MR. GLYNN.—The Attorney-General mentioned such cases, and it struck me at the time that his statement was not in accordance with the authorities I have quoted. The cases to which they refer are those between one State and another, or between one State and the citizens of another State. The cases, therefore, which come before the Supreme Court of the United States are very few, and the tendency there is to cut down the original jurisdiction. The United States is a very large federation, embracing 45 States, with a population of 76,000,000, and a wonderful complexity of interests, and so they are able to bring Federal justice to the doors of litigants by means of subordinate appellate courts. There are nine districts with such courts, and there are also a multiplicity of district Federal Courts. The decisions of the nine local appellate tribunals are practically final, because appeal to the Supreme Court is allowed only in very rare cases, either as a matter of grace by the Supreme Court, or on the special certificate of the circuit appellate court. The Bill proposes to overcome the difficulty mentioned by me in regard to the probable centralization of justice under its provisions by the adoption of the circuit system. The objection which I have urged against that system is that its establishment will necessitate a cessation of the work of the Court of Appeal, if it is, as the Attorney-General says, likely to have very much work during the first years of the Federation, or else result in the undermanning of the Court, whilst two of the Judges are absent on circuit. It is also open to the still further objection that a tribunal consisting of one circuit Judge in a State deciding upon Federal matters would not be as efficient as would be the Supreme Court of any State if vested with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It depends upon the State.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not draw much distinction, in the matter of the efficiency of the Judges between State and State. It sometimes happens that the smaller States have the best Judges. In New South Wales there are seven members on the Judicial Bench, whilst in South Australia we have a particularly small tribunal, consisting of only three members. But it can scarcely be said that the judicial intellect brought to bear upon cases heard in the two States is in the ratio of seven to three. Nor are the State courts less intellectually fit to decide many questions than the High Court is likely to be. Indeed, the probability is that the less efficient tribunal will be the High Court, because the State Courts are constituted of Judges chosen from the Bar in actual practice, who, as a rule, are not politicians. I understand that in New South Wales men in politics have absolutely refused to accept positions which seemed, as a matter of right, to belong to them, preferring not to occupy seats on the Judicial Bench, because their inclinations did not lie in that direction. There is nothing to justify the Attorney-General in hoping that the mental equipment of the High Court of Australia, which he idealizes from start to finish, will be superior to that of the State tribunals. Indeed, if one were disposed to be captious, he might say that the Commonwealth will have to be content with the residuum from the State tribunals, otherwise it will have to draft some of the Judges of the State courts to the Federal Bench. If so, I do not see why we should not utilize them at once by giving them complete Federal jurisdiction, and constitute from their ranks a court of appeal. There should be no difficulty in regard to the salaries to be paid to the members of this scratch court if it were established. It would only be necessary to give them a salary sufficient to cover any additional expense which they might incur in travelling. They would constitute only a court of an appellate character, and would not be required to sit once in six months. If in twenty years there have been less than twelve appeals in State matters to the Privy Council—and there is no likelihood of there being twelve more Federal cases—surely the Attorney-General will not say that the sitting of the appellate court will be continuous?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I believe that the Constitution, and the laws under it, will create a great number of appeals.

Mr. GLYNN.—If that be so, I think the electors had been informed of this prior to the referendum being taken, as they had imagined that the production of a Federal union would be an increase in the amount of litigation, I venture to believe that they would have hesitated before voting in favour of Federal union. The perfection of a Federal system consists, first, in the justness of its spirit, and, secondly, in the clearness and simplicity of its terms. If the real object of Federal endeavours is to improve upon the action of the State Parliaments, and to provide such an amount of justice that a new tribunal of this sort is not required to deal with it, it is a matter for little concern. Personally, my opinion is not in that other direction. We can only improve upon the 39 subjects which have been referred to us, and I am sure that many of them are matters of such continuing and pressing interest that legislation will be frequent. Indeed 99 per cent. of the work of legislation still belongs to the State Parliaments, although it is in the States a great deal of the important administrative work is undertaken by the Commonwealth. For example, the Postal department, the Customs department belong to the States, but there is only one Act to be passed in each case, and therefore the likelihood of litigation ensuing there would be if six different Acts were administered. By federating the Acts and reducing them to one short lucid Act the work of the six States in regard to the administrative departments of the Commonwealth, the Customs, and Defence, proportionately there must be a reduction in the amount of litigation. Of course the administration of the Customs department is more difficult since its jurisdiction is extended throughout Australia than in the case of any of the States, and the process of litigation is shorter and simpler, and that is the test we ought to apply. It was not till yesterday that I was called upon to-day when I heard the Attorney-General gushing, as he did, over the possibility of an increase of litigation under this federal machine. My hope is that they are otherwise. I cannot see that there is any chance of the appellate tribunal being required to sit more than once in six months. If, then, we allow that the sitting of the appeals from the Supreme

States—of which two-thirds go home in Canada—will be determined by and if we fix the number of Federal cases likely to arise at twelve a year—we shall not have twelve a year in Australia for many years to—we shall have only twenty-four cases as a maximum. Surely we do not require an appellate court to decide these cases. An appeal will deal, not with the facts of any case but with the law. It is not created for the purpose of dealing with facts. We asked to create a High Court to decide important matters of law, and these often take up far less time than do nisi prius cases in which the matter at issue is one of fact. Some of the very biggest cases sent to the High Court, though they may have to wait six or twelve months before being heard by the High Court, are decided at one sitting, by the use of the well-trained judicial minds of the Justices. The members go at once to the effective work for a decision. If there is to be a High Court in Australia manned by Judges of the capacity referred to by the Attorney-General, in nine cases out of ten the sitting of that court will not extend beyond one or two. Then we shall have a High Court to which we can address our grievances as exhibiting the splendours of the law, while it is sitting in solitary seclusion and waiting for business to come. Thus, whilst on the one hand it might be an ideal subject for contemplation, on the other it would appeal to the ludicrous instincts of the people in the sorry spectacle of a trial of mighty potentates sitting in solitary seclusion unused grandeur. In this connexion I might appeal further to the experience of the United States. I find that in the discussion which took place in the Federal Convention of 1787 the appellate clauses of the Constitution. Senator O'Connor declared that during the first years in Canada, whilst there were seven appeals from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council, there were 23 appeals to the courts of the Provinces direct, thus proving the two positions which I have stated; first, that the majority of appeals in State matters at all events will go to the High Court of Australia, but not to the Privy Council; and, secondly, that there are some appeals still allowed from the Supreme Court of Canada to the Privy Council, there being ten in six years, or an average of about one and a-half a year. But the great leakage will tell against the use of the High Court of Australia as the court of final appeal. I regret it. I wish that we had abolished that right of appeal. I believe that when a little more development takes place, and when there are less political predilections to be avoided on the part of the Bench, we shall be quite competent to decide all judicial questions that may arise. But we must deal with the position created for us by those who drafted the Constitution, under which an appeal, direct or indirect, is still allowed to the Privy Council. Everything therefore that the Attorney-General has said regarding the ability of the local court, the desire to temper justice with a sense of local needs, and to amplify our jurisdiction where the Constitution is not sufficiently elastic to enable amendments to be effected, is so much beside the question because the Constitution is not framed in the way he approves, and which I would prefer.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member wishes to see a High Court established?

Mr. GLYNN.—If it is necessary. Some honorable members think that it would be better to have an Australian tribunal interposed between the Privy Council and the State Courts. I have already pointed out that such a tribunal could be created at a comparatively trifling expense—an expenditure of a few hundred pounds a year instead of thousands of pounds. I am quite sure that the Judges upon the appellate court would require no more in the way of emoluments than would be sufficient to cover their expenses.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does not the honorable and learned member think that some court of that sort is necessary?

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not think it is necessary at this stage. I do not believe, if it is desired, that the difficulties in the way of its establishment are worth a moment's consideration. If we can make use of the Judges of the State Courts and constitute them an appellate court with a quorum of five, I am sure we shall get from the Australian Bench as efficient a tribunal as can be obtained in any part of the world. I say that without any disrespect to the Privy Council. Indeed, in justice to that tribunal—whatever effect the reference to the New Zealand case this afternoon may have had of the records of honorable members—I do not think it is not every lawyer reading that I have read a seven-column summary of it—who would come to the conclusion that though the Privy Council might be wrong in its interpretation of the statute law of New Zealand, it was wrong in the final justice which it administered. I believe, as a matter of fact, that the courts of New Zealand were wrong, not technically, but in justice, and that the Privy Council, soaring higher, overlooked the petty technicalities of the local law, brushing them aside as possibly not existing. They could scarcely contemplate the position which existed in New Zealand, although it did exist under the local statutes. What was the position? There was a grant made by a Maori chief for a charitable purpose, and as the machinery of making the grant effective the Crown was used. There was a surrender of the land to the Crown. The Crown was to re-grant the land to the Church of England for the purpose of a school. The school could not be established, and 60 or 70 years afterwards, when the Maories could not possibly get it back, the Crown interposed to prevent the application of the grant to another charitable purpose. Originally the idea was charity. The representative of the Crown steps in and says, "You are now asking the court in its equitable jurisdiction, as one charity cannot be established, to apply the grant to another charity which is nearest in kind to it"—a thing which is very often done by the Court of Chancery and the Courts of Equity throughout the Empire. The Solicitor-General stepped in and on a technical point defeated the application of the trustees to have the charity to some extent carried out, and the land reverted not to the Maories, who really were the benefactors, but to the Crown. What did the Privy Council do? It brushed aside technicalities and sustaining the higher justice, the more liberal view, carried out the intent of the donors. So that when one reads that decision it is really due to the Privy Council to remember that although they may have erred technically, in regard to the reading of certain charters, regulations, and procedure in New Zealand, nine persons out of ten would have considered that they came through a mistake to the right decision.

Mr. McCAY.—The great objection raised to the judgment of the Privy Council was based on the ground of the strictness of the probity of the New Zealand Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Alleging as an act of reference what was a statutory duty.

Mr. GLYNN.—I quite agree with the honorable and learned friends there are times when Homer himself might be even the rather matured gentlemen on the Privy Council are occasional be a little off.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Any very remote must be on a subject like that.

Mr. GLYNN.—At all events, was a judicial pronouncement was one which was open to such a suspension from the point of view the reference to the calibre of the New Zealand Judges and the motives which actuated them—it shows that the effect of the decision must have struck the Privy Council as being particularly open to criticism. I would ask honorable members, to say that, from the point of view of the late jurisdiction, it is not advisable necessary to establish a fixed High Court with new Judges at salaries amounting to £15,000 or £16,000. Secondly, as to the original jurisdiction, it is not necessary to cause the Supreme Courts of the Empire to discharge all the original jurisdiction in most cases better than the High Court, and so far as the Empire is concerned, they discountenance the Acts of Congress and the Convention of a centralization of justice such as proposed in this Bill. The Attorney-General has colleagues some of whom might cite in support of my opinion that we should for some years to come utilize events in original matters, the tribunals. The Minister for Trade and Customs said in the Convention—

I think that our various Benchmen reason to fear comparison with courts of parts of the Empire. We might wish to utilize the services of some of these common with the new courts we propose to establish.

I know that he favoured my suggestion and I think he spoke in its favour of utilizing existing courts for all matters, and a temporary court of State Judges for the purposes of late jurisdiction. We have too often think, relied upon the example of the United States. We ought to be grateful for the splendid suggestion which we have obtained from its Convention which is the true exemplar of

we must not be such pedantic legislators to blindly adopt all federal analogies without consideration of existing circumstances. Right through that mistake has been made. Because a thing has existed in America it ought to exist here. We have all these grandiloquent references to Marshall's separation of the departments. "The Executive executes"—of course it does, what else could it do—"Parliament makes the law, and the Judiciary declares the law," and the Judiciary is the keystone of the Constitution and so on. These references and analogies are certainly applicable to the conditions of America, but are not applicable to us because we have and shall have a key-stone to our Constitution, if a High Court is ever created. But look at the position in America. At the time of the foundation of the constitution at the end of the colonial days there was no Privy Council to keep the courts of the States in check. There were thirteen States, which, if I remember aright, had displayed towards one another the most extraordinary animosity in their mutual relations. In fact it has been stated by Lecky in his history that the movement which animated the men who led the American union, and which led to the severance from England, was one actuated, not by the highest impulses of patriotism, but simply by the mere sordid consideration of personal advancement and national interest; and the same thing is perceptible after 1774, after the declaration of independence was made, because during the con-federal days it was with the greatest reluctance that a single con-federal session was made by the State Parliaments. The courts absolutely refused to enforce the con-federal laws. Time after time they followed the suggestions of the Parliaments, and refused to regard as imposing any obligation on them the laws enacted by the old confederation. For that reason the Federalist—that great series of essays which more than anything else, perhaps, helped to the acceptance of the new constitution—pointed out as the chief necessity for the establishment of an independent national, the fact that the State courts were reluctant to regard the old con-federal laws as imposing the slightest obligation upon them. At page 507 of the Federalist it is said—

"State Judges, holding their offices during pleasure from year to year, will be too little independent to be relied upon for an inflexible execution of national laws."

The position is absolutely non-existent in Australia. Why should there be all this distrust of local tribunals? The Attorney-General seems to approach a State tribunal with positive suspicion. Only the other day you had a decision by the Chief Justice of Victoria as regards certain provisions of the Customs Act, and immediately afterwards three Judges, constituting the Full Court, unanimously reversed that decision and established the validity of those sections. In that case was there the slightest leaning towards State matters? The occasions upon which the personal interest or the State interest of a local tribunal can become operative will be almost infinitesimal. Can honorable members conceive of cases in which the impulse of local patriotism will sway judicial decisions? When will it arise? Do honorable members think that your State tribunal would be locally biased on such a question as that of the rivers? However strongly I feel with the position of South Australia, I would not for a moment distrust the Judicial Bench of New South Wales in giving a decision. It is possible for South Australia to test the question of riparian rights in the courts of Victoria, or in the courts of New South Wales, and I am sure that there would not be the slightest fear of local partiality influencing the decision. But are you sure that your federal tribunal will be so pure in the beginning? Human nature is what it is. No matter from whence you may take your men, there is an unconscious bias, do what you will, amongst politicians. If there is to be any colour given to judicial pronouncements from old political leanings; if the spirit of the battle in the arena of politics is to actuate the cool determination of the Judge on the Bench, there is far more likelihood of that being done in a High Court of Australia than in any State tribunal, for the simple reason, possibly, that some men who were in the active arena of politics at the time of the framing of the Constitution, who were in the Convention, may find their way on to the Bench. Was Marshall a member of the Convention that framed the American Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I believe he was.

Mr. GLYNN.—He was a member of a State Convention that urged the adoption of the Constitution, but he was not a member of the Convention that drafted that document.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I would not be sure of that.

Mr. GLYNN.—If I am not mistaken it was one of the special qualifications of Marshall that he came to that Bench with an original purity of mind and brilliant intellect, absolutely unaffected by the unconscious bias of old political predilections. So that if there is to be a comparison made, I think it tells rather against the case set up by the Attorney-General than for it. Again, why should we not equally protect the States against the encroachment of the Federal power, if there is to be the possibility of an interference on one side or the other? Why are we always to sit down and protect the Federal view of matters as against the State view? In America there was some reason for it: the Constitution was declared to be the supreme law of the land. It is not so declared with us. The necessity for the creation of this tribunal does not exist, because under covering section 5 of the Act the Judges of all State courts must carry out and obey the Constitution, and every statute passed under its provisions, unless the jurisdiction is taken away, and that of course is what is proposed to be done to some extent by this Bill. If there is to be protection, why should it not be extended all round? Why state that you must have a tribunal that will probably amplify according to your growing necessities the interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution? That was justifiable in America. There the benefit of a doubt must always be given by the Constitution to the conservation of Federal interests, because it is declared by the text to be the supreme law of the land. For that reason nearly all of the constitutional decisions of Marshall—all, I believe, except one—were unchallenged, because, however strong may have been the State view advanced, if a doubt did exist, he was bound to sustain the Federal aspect of the Constitution. But the same provision does not exist here. In America the amplification was condemned by some statesmen. It may have been justified by the difficulty of amending the Constitution. I do not think there have been more than fifteen amendments in the course of 100 years, although scarcely a year passes that there is not some suggestion for an amendment of the Constitution, but it is practically in a strait-jacket, utterly incapable of elasticity, and the consequence is that whenever an opportunity arises for meeting growing necessities, judicial pronouncement, great Judges and Marshall take advantage of it, but without some challenge. In the beginning of the last century Jefferson condemned this tendency. He spoke of—

The spectacle of the Judiciary, in the management of its powers, advancing its noise like a thief over the field of jurisdiction.

Take the Dartmouth College case which was decided in 1818. When there was a majority of five to two, the Chief Justice suspended the decision of the Court for twelve months. In the meantime the political aspect of affairs that had been reflected in the court in the first place was viewed right through the States. It was an agitation on the question—what was the result of the decision? It ought to be taken. The outcome—whether it was in consequence of the decision or not—was that the decision was believed to be by five to one in one year before it was suspended was changed by a majority the other way at the end of the year. There was a case of amplification of jurisdiction. Do members justify this by mentioning this to show that you must not be deluded into thinking that Federal rights are supreme under the Constitution. State rights may be of equal value with Federal rights upon whatever Judicature you have established. You cannot pound the Constitution. The Attorney-General to-day referred to the Constitution. I might mention that when the question of the retention to the appeal to the Privy Council was discussed there were some members of the Convention who thought that if the appeal was not abolished, there was no necessity to create the High Court of Australia. This opinion was expressed by those whose authority will be accepted. It was from the report of the Adelaide deputation to the Convention, page 984. Senator Deakin said—

If you strike out this clause—

That is the clause to take away appeals from the Privy Council—practically to take away them.

—on which we are engaged, then I am certainly prepared to go for certainly for the repeal of the clause with regard to establishing the High Court. That clause was struck out. The divisions in Melbourne meant the retention of the appeal to the Privy Council, but that really in effect the very al-

What I would state, then, is that not really require for some years

any other tribunal than the ouncil to reconcile the divergent decisions of State tribunals. The Attorney-General says that if you have those courts deciding Federal cases, you may have a decision at the outset given by one of the weaker tribunals settling the law until some other tribunal has given a decision the other way, and the Privy Council has adjudicated, and that an interval of, say, eighteen months, may occur before the final decision is given. But you have no reason to assume that the weakest decision will be given in the beginning, or that the Supreme Court of any State will be intellectually so inefficient that the decision which it gives will be wrong. Take the case of Queensland, which is one of the smaller States.

Could there have been a more dispassionate judgment or one more impartial in its pronouncement than that given in the long Customs case in which the firm of Robert Reid and Co. was concerned, by a local tribunal the other day in Brisbane? I am not speaking of the merits of the case at all, but I do say that the decision given was one with the Federal note in it. It was given in favour of the Federation. That was a decision of one of the State Courts, some of whose decisions are now open to ridicule on the ground of the comparative insignificance of the States over which the courts preside.
But there is one other point to which I may refer, namely that if you get a decision of your High Court, whether it is good or whether it is bad, there are no other courts to correct it except the Privy Council. If you have a decision from a weak local court upon some case it is open to you to check it by an examination of the decision in other States Courts. But when you have a decision from a High Court, if it is a weak one there is no other local court to which you can take it. So that the argument of the Attorney-General is a bad one to advance at all, and when it is advanced it is capable of being turned to other purposes than the Attorney-General thought. If you do wish to create an Australian Court it can be created from the Judges of the State Courts. I think it ought to be invested only with appellate jurisdiction, except with regard to the matters arising under section 75, where large interests are concerned. But they would be very few. If a matter like the rivers question should arise, original jurisdiction might be given to a State tribunal in respect to the case, and the decision in the one case would practically stand for ever. You are not going to have a High Court of Australia deciding on the rivers question every ten or twenty years.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That question will be decided politically.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think it will. I have too high a sense of the liberality of the Federal Parliament to believe that they think that cases like these need not be subject to the process described by the bard in the lines—

Right and wrong,

Between whose endless jar justice resides.

My own opinion is, that after the interchange of opinions that must arise, the good sense of the Australian Parliament will enable the rivers question to be settled, to the satisfaction of the State Parliaments, without an appeal to the law at all. One leading decision upon the question of the rivers will settle it practically for ever. That was the one question mentioned to-day by the Attorney-General: the one great State question. The expense of calling this tribunal into existence for settling the rivers question would be more than the cost of its solution by locking the rivers. If you have to spend £30,000 or £40,000 in the beginning in order to settle the rivers question by establishing the High Court, that sum might just as well be expended as interest upon the cost of locks which would effectually settle it in another manner. There are a few other matters to which I wished to refer, but I find that by the ripper wisdom of the Ministry the points which I intended to make have been anticipated in the form of amendments in this Bill. There was the question of the right to proceed against State or Commonwealth, which ought to be embodied in the terms of the Bill, and that has been done by an amendment. I have endeavoured, I hope with judicial impartiality, to put what can be said against the immediate creation of this Court. I feel that we do not require it for appellate jurisdiction, and that we do not require it for original powers; that it can only have a large original jurisdiction by encroaching upon duties which can quite as effectively, more expeditiously, and certainly far less expensively, be discharged by the courts of the States. Believing this, I think it is certainly my duty not to allow this Bill to get into committee, where, between various suggestions of amendment, the Government will ultimately succeed, but to vote against its second reading.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern M.—Whatever is our opinion with to this Bill, I think we all recog it has been put in the most manner in which it could be p Attorney-General. Mr. DEAKIN.—This Bill gives no advan- tage to the lawyers.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. But there will be an advantage to the lawyers if the Bill be carried.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I shall appeal to any one to confirm my statement. There is a distinct advantage to every lawyer in keep- ing as much legal business as possible in Australia, and the object of this Bill is to keep business in Australia as far as it is possible for the Bill to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Bill will not only remove some of the leaders from the com- petition of the Bar, but it will also have the effect of giving every member of the Bar an extra chance of obtaining valuable and pro- fitable work in the High Court. There are other advantages, and I say that it is to the credit of the profession to which I have the honour to belong that a very large num- ber of its members have set their faces against the proposal. I do not think that this measure should be dealt with in any party spirit. I believe honorable members on both sides of the House are disposed to treat it as a very grave matter which ought not to be dealt with on party lines.

Mr. CONROY.—It is a matter of justice, and therefore above all party considera- tions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. There is nothing to be gained by either of the three great parties in the House, and although discouraged by the fact that the Govern- ment as a whole, as well as the leader of the Opposition, and the leader of the labour party, have declared in favour of the Bill, I still consider that there is a very good chance of the Bill being rejected on the second reading. I desire to put a few con- siderations before honorable members. There are two objects for which the High Court is to be established. One of these is that it shall deal with Federal constitutional sub- jects, and with laws made under the Con- stitution; the other is, that it shall take the place of the Privy Council in dealing with appeals. I do not think there is anything else which can be had. As a court of appeal I favoured the crea- tion of this court at the Convention. If any one is curious enough to examine the votes of the Convention, he will see that I persistently voted in favour of a High Court—a High Court occupying a strong position—from which there could be no appeal to the Privy Council, and which could not be ignored by an appeal direct from a State Supreme Court to the English tribunal. But owing to a mistake made in the final revise of the draft of the Convention Bill, the right of appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of a State was left optional. It was not taken away. I have a draft of the Constitution Bill as framed at Adelaide, and it was provided in clause 75—

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any State, or from the High Court or any other federal court.

By a mistake in the final framing of the clause, that provision was omitted. The attention of the leader of the Convention, as well as that of the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was called to the matter at the time, and, they assured the Convention that there was no mistake, that there was no optional appeal. It now transpires that there is an optional appeal. Not only is that so, but as the result of the amendments which were made by the Imperial Parliament at the suggestion of Lord Halsbury and the Imperial Government, it has been placed beyond all doubt that there can be an appeal to the Privy Council direct from the Supreme Court of a State, thus ignoring the High Court. Any one who looks into the matter will see clearly that nothing could be more damaging than to have two courts to which parties can appeal from the same judgment. A litigant wants to win—that is his chief object—and he will select a court in which he has the best chance. The man who appeals has the option.

Mr. FOWLER.—What does the honorable and learned member mean by “the best chance”?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The court in which the litigant thinks that the minds of the members of the Bench are inclined towards his way of thinking. Of course honorable members will recognise that all men have idiosyncrasies, and that it is possible to learn the idiosyncrasies of a Judge just as you can learn the idiosyncrasies of a schoolmaster. A litigant will go straight for success, and if he does not find any difference between the High Court and the Privy Council in that respect, he will go for the court which gives finality. He will go for the court which is the stronger, and the court which answers better the conditions of being the stronger and of absolute finality. That is the Privy Council. Although for a time it will be found that the mere novelty of the thing, some of some institutions will go to the High Court, in the end they will prefer to go to the Privy Council for many years to come. Nothing which a litigant deprecates as the losing of his case; next to that he hates to have his action long drawn out, and he objects to any uncertainty as to whether his appeal will be final or not. May I ask the House that even on constitutional grounds the High Court can be ignored? A man is beaten on a constitutional point or upon the interpretation of some law, in the Supreme Court, say, of New South Wales, he may give the go-by to the High Court and go straight to the Privy Council. Those who have read the Convention Reports will remember that nearly all the banks and financial institutions, and the large boards or organizations, proposed to the Convention to allow the appeal to the Privy Council to remain. I think the honorable members from my own country are aware that the principal appeals from the Supreme Court of the States to the Privy Council are on the part of big organizations. Those organizations will prefer the Privy Council, and if they can get it, they will go to the High Court, they will.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Because the appeal to the Privy Council is more costly, it prevents the other side very frequently from carrying on.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think the honorable member is under a misapprehension. We have the scale of costs taxed in the Privy Council for the last five years, and the average cost for an appeal is £2 10s. I do not think an appeal to the High Court could be conducted for much less. There is a clause in this Bill which is designed to meet the difficulty, and to compel the constitutional points to be brought to the Privy Council. I refer to sub-clause 2, (b), of clause 41. I need not go into detail. The Attorney-General, I know, admit that the clause is designed to compel litigants who appeal from the Supreme Court to bring the constitutional point straight to the High Court in a bill involving a constitutional point. I want to say that that provision, if passed, will be ultra vires, and that we shall not have the High Court as an arbiter on constitutional points.

cs. Some grand language has been in reference to this court being the arbiter of the Constitution. That may be advisable, but the Government have not got out of this difficulty. We have to deal with the facts, and to face them. The facts, as they are present in the Constitution amount to this: That a man who wishes to appeal from the Supreme Court, whether on a constitutional, or commercial, or other point, can flout the High Court and go direct to the Privy Council. I repeat this paragraph or sub-clause will, if amended, be ultra vires, and, more than that, is unwilling that it should be submitted to an impartial lawyer who is not interested, but to abide by his decision. I assert that there is no power to pass paragraph (b), and that it will be nugatory and ineffective.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Have we no power to do under section 77 of the Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Attorney-General is good enough to fully explain to me what he meant, and I have come to the conclusion, after looking carefully into the matter, that this provision which seeks to give constitutional points for determination by the High Court exclusively would be ultra vires. That is my deliberate conclusion, although, of course, others have a right to come to an opposite opinion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Does the honorable and learned member say it would be ultra vires, notwithstanding section 77?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes. I find that there is a great misapprehension in regard to constitutional points. There is a kind of current phrase—"Oh, we will leave the laws to the State courts, and the federal laws to the federal courts." But we cannot do anything of the kind. Our laws, whether made by a State Parliament or by the Federal Parliament, are one and indivisible, wherever a case arises, whether in the State Court or the High Court, effect must be given to the law as it stands. The Australian court will have to give effect to the States laws, and the State courts must give effect to the federal laws. For instance, an assault case may be heard in the Port Melbourne police court. In that case, though it appear to be a very simple one, there may be raised the question of a right under a federal law. For instance, the man charged might say, "I was there doing a certain act by virtue of a federal law. I was employed by the Customs," or something else of that kind. We can never tell when a constitutional point will arise, but any court before which the case comes must decide it some way or other. Even a Police Court or a County Court, as well as a Supreme Court, must decide any constitutional point that arises no matter how grave it is, subject of course to the power of appeal. There is a case in point which provoked a great deal of interest some years ago in California and which was known as the "Pigtail Case." What happened in that case was that a Chinaman brought an action against a man for having cut off his pigtail. The man who was defendant in the case was a sheriff of the county and had charge of prisoners and of the gaol. He raised a constitutional point at once, and said that there was a State law which enacted that every prisoner within a certain time after his coming into the gaol should have his hair cut off within an inch of the scalp. That looked very harmless, and, at first sight, the case appeared very simple. But the Chinaman brought evidence to show that that particular law of California had been enacted for the express purpose of interfering with the immunities and privileges of Chinamen as citizens of the States; and under the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States, it was held that the sheriff had acted illegally, and he was mulcted in damages. What I desire to show is that we cannot divide the law up in the way suggested. We must take the laws as we find them, and we must in the State courts apply the federal laws just as in the Australian court we must apply the State laws, whenever they arise and are relevant to the facts of the case. We must apply the appropriate law no matter where it originates. It is quite true that there is a power of removal at certain stages which must be canvassed very closely, but I shall leave its consideration to the committee stage, should the Bill ever arrive at that stage. There appears to be some mystical notion that a distinctive federal court is essential for all federations. What is more natural than to say that there should be an Australian court as well as an Australian Parliament for an Australian people? But in Canada they have no distinctively federal court at all, and they have done very well for forty years without it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They have a Dominion Court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so, but it is not a distinctively federal court.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is practically the same thing.

Mr. HIGGINS.—With all respect to the right honorable gentleman, I am speaking advisedly when I say that it is not at all the same thing. At page 514 of Clement's Canadian Constitution, the author gives the 101st section of the British North America Act. The words are these—

The Parliament of Canada, may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance, and origin of a general Court of Appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the Laws of Canada.

There it is made clear that they have a Court of Appeal for Canada that is not a distinctively Federal Court at all. There is power, it will be seen, to establish additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada, but no such court has ever been constituted. The fact is that they have never felt any need for them, because they know that their provincial courts, their police courts, county courts, and district courts have full power to deal with all matters, subject, of course, to the right of appeal. Then at page 228, the same authority says—

It is almost unnecessary to say, there was no limitation of jurisdiction in any provincial court, along any line identical with, or in any sense analogous to, the line of division now existing between matters within the legislative competence of the Dominion Parliament, and the provincial legislative assemblies, respectively.

There is no such line of demarcation between the courts of Canada. Clement also says, at page 229—

The phraseology of the last clause of this section is a clear recognition of the fact that the provincial courts would necessarily be called upon to administer the laws of Canada, as distinguished from the laws of the various provinces, and the provision was inserted with a view to the better administration of those Dominion laws through the medium of additional courts established by the Dominion Government should occasion arise.

Then he says at page 230—

The only additional courts which have been established by the Dominion Government are the Exchequer Court of Canada and the Maritime Court of Ontario, each with a specially limited jurisdiction sufficiently indicated by its name. But any duly created court, no matter by what authority created, or no matter by what authority the different parts of its machinery may be supplied, may be called on to determine cases involving the application of either Dominion or provincial law.

Then at page 231 he shows how provincial courts and Judges can be called upon to accept any new jurisdiction, not by virtue of any words used in the Constitution, but simply because there is a power to impose any duty upon any person throughout the whole of the Dominion for the purpose of carrying out the law. At page 232 he says—

However constituted, the provincial courts are called upon, we again repeat, to administer Dominion law as well as provincial law.

I think I have established clearly, far, that there is no distinctively federal court in Canada. There is an additional court which is not for constitutional purposes, though it may entertain appeals, but simply for appeals from the lower courts. In Canada, therefore, we have no precedent for the proposal that is now being made here. And I do not think that Canada has done badly. I think that there are as prosperous and progressive countries as we are. I think that the outlook for Canada is quite as good as the outlook for Australia as regards material resources. In everything else, and having regard to material development it looks as if Canada is doing better. The matter of population and so forth, is not able to hold her own even with the United States of America.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have there a nearer approach to uniformity in legal procedure than we have.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Canada has followed the Australian system. Australia has not. Canada has followed Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I spoke of legal uniformity.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But the honorable learned gentleman desires us to draw a distinction here between courts which administer federal law and courts which do not administer federal law, though they do not follow that practice in Canada. They have had in Canada courts with the same difficulties as are before the respective jurisdictions of the Dominion and State Parliaments, but they have no occasion for the distinctions proposed to be made here.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have an appeal court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is purely an appellate court, and they have the right to appeal from that court to the Privy Council.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is also the right of appeal from the courts of the provinces to the Dominion court.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, and a very good illustration was supplied by the hon-learned member for South Australia, Mr. Linn, when he pointed out that there were very many more appeals from the provincial courts of Canada to the Privy Council than to the High Court of Canada. I desire to give the reasons why, in the United States of America, they have a distinctively Federal Court. Probably a considerable number of members have read Bryce's book upon the matter, but they can refresh their memory, if they are curious, by looking at page 228 of the first volume of American Commonwealth. He gives a few words of the reasons why, in the United States of America in 1789, they created a distinctively federal court.

It is—that a Federal Legislature had been established whose laws were to bind directly the whole citizen, a Federal Judicature was evidenced to interpret and apply these laws and compel obedience to them. The alternative would have been to intrust the enforcement of laws to State courts. But State courts were not fitted to deal with matters of a quasi-national character, such as admiralty jurisdiction and rights arising under treaties.

First of all I am sure that that does not apply here, because our Supreme Court does not deal with the Admiralty jurisdiction. A Supreme Court Judge in each of the colonies—at all events, it is so in Victoria—is the Admiralty Judge under the Admiralty Acts. Then as to State rights and treaties, there are very few such cases arising here. They arise in connexion with litigation cases, and the Supreme Court does deal with them and have been able to deal with them. Bryce says, speaking of these State courts, that they find no means for deciding questions between the different States. I should like to know what litigation there could be between the various States of Australia. They have been quarrelling with South Australia for 40 years about a piece of land, and as that referred to in Hamlet, for two armies destroyed one another. They have never gone into a fight nor into litigation upon it.

JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister for Trade and Customs threatened a fight a while ago.

MR. HIGGINS.—So far that has never been brought into litigation, and I desire to ask practical men, is it likely when a matter has never given rise to litigation though we have had the Privy Council appeal to, that the parties interested will go to litigation before the High Court? Then with regard to the Murray river navigation. That question so far as I can see will be settled, not legally, but politically under the Constitution of Australia.

MR. CONROY.—Even if it be settled legally, the Privy Council would be considered the more impartial body by the opposing States.

MR. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned member is quite right. If we want impartiality, the further afield we go, the better.

MR. DEAKIN.—Then why have not English appeals been sent to Australia for decision?

MR. HIGGINS.—Simply because I suppose it is an historical fact that they have had their appeal court established and have seen no reason to change. We cannot expect in a small community like this to have men of the extreme training and familiarity with cases of all sorts which may be gained in London which is the financial capital of the world, and which has been for years the place where the biggest friction of interests has occurred. Bryce goes on to say, speaking of State courts—

They could not be trusted to do complete justice between their own citizens and those of another State.

I can appeal to any one who knows our Supreme Court Judges, to say that that does not apply here. In 1789 there was no communication by railway, and a few canals, and very little communication generally between Georgia and Massachusetts, and there was as much rivalry between them as there would be between two foreign countries like Russia and England. Of course, there was a strong spirit of State loyalty in such a case, but our Supreme Court Judges have no more loyalty in Victoria to Victoria than they have to Australia as a whole. There is here no such feeling. Bryce further says—

Being under the control of their own State Governments they might be forced to disregard any federal law which the State disapproved; or even if they admitted its authority, might fail in the zeal or the power to give due effect to it.

That does not apply here either. When the people of the United States framed their constitution they had before them the possibility of grave miscarriages of justice occurring from the fact that the Judges had not a strong and permanent tenure. I gave an instance the other day—the case of Trivett versus Weedon. Because in that case the Judges decided that a law of Rhode Island was void, the Rhode Island Legislature actually refused to renew their annual appointment. That case with a few others was in the minds of the framers of the constitution of the United States. The feeling then was that where you have Judges dependent upon the Legislature for their annual appointment, you cannot trust them to do justice as between a State and its Legislature on the one side and the great federal power on the other. Mr. Bryce continues—

And being authorities co-ordinate with and independent of one another, with no common court of appeal placed over them to correct their errors, or harmonize their views, they would be likely to interpret the Federal Constitution and statutes in different senses, and make the law uncertain by the variety of their decisions.

But the people of the United States, when framing their Constitution, were in a position very different from that in which we are now. They had, by their rebellion, lost the right of appeal to the Privy Council. But we still have that right, and it may be relied upon to produce uniformity in the decisions of the courts. Of course, it is possible that the Judges of one State court may take a different view from that taken by the Judges of another State court; but once a decision had been given by a State court, the Judges of every other State court would consider it carefully, and would endeavour to ascertain the reasons which weighed with the Judges who gave it. In this way one court would keep another in check. Furthermore, all the courts would be anxious to have their judgments commend themselves to the Court of Appeal. But the best corrective for wrong judgments is a strong and critical bar, and that corrective is as applicable to our Supreme Courts with their permanent tenure as it will be to the High Court. I feel that the reasons given in the United States are by no means applicable to a country like Australia, where, notwithstanding all our faults, the Bench is strong, respected, and self-respecting inasmuch as it always likes to have its judgments commend themselves to a strong Bar. The High Court will not be stronger than the State courts are under present conditions, and it will not be so strong as is the Privy Council. I will read to honorable members what Mr. Justice Richmond, of New Zealand, wrote in a letter which he sent to the convention of 1897. All his letter did not cause me to alter my mind. I felt that there was a great deal of force in what he said.

It is no disrespect to the Australasian Bar to say that the chances are against our being able to furnish a court of appeal equal in legal standing to the highest English courts. Of course we may produce great jurists here, and God, we shall. But the present area of service for the bench is a very narrow one. Judges, on the other hand, are taken from among the leaders of a numerous bar. They have their ability tested in practice at the great business centre in the world, and have succeeded in a competition with which the colonies have nothing to compare. The composition in law of the Judicial Committee may not have been entirely satisfactory—on that subject I have no word to say—but important appeals to the Privy Council are generally attended by some of the most eminent English Judges.

It would be a dead loss to both bench and bar if the legal standard to which we have to submit ourselves were removed—as it were, measure it would be were decisions here rendered final. I should be sorry to see the judges, lawyers, reared in our comparatively narrow circle, become our most important authorities. I say this, fully recognising the excellent and much judicial work amongst us. The public is more interested than it knows in maintaining the highest scientific standard in the administration of the law. The intellectual interest thus shown in the profession is one of the best guarantees for purity of administration. Thorough lawyers are supremely anxious to be true to their law. They may not always succeed in freeing themselves from class prejudice or party ties, but their interest in abstract principle makes them generally incapable of showing partiality to individuals.

I have known cases in which Judges, who had strong social and political prejudices, have been constrained by their sense of justice and of logic to decide against their sympathies. The settling of a question of law becomes with them oftentimes the discussion of a mathematical problem in regard to which it is not possible to take any party view at all. They deal with the points of law as they would with algebraic problems. I do not think the Attorney-General wants to have his Constitution interpreted as he would like, by a Bench; I am sure he wants to have it interpreted by an impartial Bench, of wide sympathies and with broad ideas. Now there will be no saving of expense to litigation by the setting up of a High Court. It will take the simple case of an appeal from a State High Court when it is sitting in the capital. Do honorable members think that counsel could be retained to go to Melbourne, to Orange, or to some other the bush, for smaller fees than have to be paid to retain English to step across from Chancery-lane courts of justice at Westminster? Second place there will be no saving or, if there is any, it will be very small. It is true that a long interval elapses now between the decisions of the Courts of the States and those of the Privy Council. But let us look into this more fully. It is to be remembered that litigants have at least three months to find the security it is necessary to obtain before a case can be sent to the Privy Council. Then a transcript must be made, and that again takes time. But very often litigants postpone sending Home of a case in order that a settlement may be come to, and pending the negotiations for a settlement nothing is done. A case was brought under the notice of the Privy Council, and the period of three and a-half years were allowed to elapse before the appeal was sent to the Privy Council. Therefore the delays are not so much the fault of the Privy Council, though there are some delays there which might be avoided; they are due rather to the litigants to whose advantage it is to delay the cases settled. I have known cases to be well settled in the inferior Courts of both parties, and I think that the cases are settled the better it will be. At present in 1897 costs were given in 50 per cent. of the Privy Council appeals, and that they were at an average sum of £210 14s. 7d. per case. I do not think appeal cases are settled more cheaply in the High Court. Then with regard to the economy which could be practised by the States if a Court were created. I do not be- lieve in spoiling the ship for a barrel of tar, and I should strongly support the proposal to create a High Court, even though it might involve a big expenditure, if I felt that it would improve our federal system more and make it more workable. But, while we are making our craft tight and workman- like, we do not want it to be useless and unworkable, and there would be very little use in having a High Court at the present time if it is proposed to pay the five Judges to be appointed £15,500 a year, including travelling allowances. As they will have to travel throughout the States, and as we are to take with them their associates and a large body of officers, the allowances will amount to a large sum. The expense of visiting Western Australia or Tasmania, for instance, will be very big, though, perhaps, as part of the scheme, the transcontinental railway should be made, in order to lessen the cost of visiting Western Australia. The Bill itself contemplates an expenditure which, I venture to predict, will be much beyond £30,000 a year. There are, first, the Judge's salaries to be provided for. Then there is to be a central registry. That office will require the renting and furnishing of rooms or the construction or purchase of a building, and the appointment of officers. Then there will be taxing officers, and in each capital a district registrar.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We think that we shall be able to get the State officials to act.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Surely, on the honorable and learned gentleman's own showing, it behoves us to be completely independent of the State authorities.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We cannot afford to be so yet.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In Victoria they have so long ceased to be liberal, that they will take good care to charge rent for any property occupied by federal officials. Is the Attorney-General going to erect special gaols for federal prisoners? In America the federal authority has special gaols, and I should like to know what right a federal Judge will have to commit a federal prisoner to a State gaol? I apprehend, too, that we must have a federal police. They have federal police in America, and why should not we have them? We shall also require federal public prosecutors and federal district attorneys. They have all these officers in America, and we must provide for similar officers here. We must have also a marshal and deputy-marshals.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The State sheriffs and their officers will act for us.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Why cannot the honorable and learned member extend that principle to the State Judges, and let them do our work, too?

Mr. McCAY.—All the State officials, with the exception of the State Judges, are good enough for our work.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes. The only State officials whom the Attorney-General will not trust are the State Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Unless they are appointed Federal Judges.

Mr. HIGGINS.—An expenditure of £30,000 a year will not cover the total cost of the Federal Judiciary, even in the beginning. All departments of State tend to increase in cost, because there are always plenty of hangers on, and plenty of billets to be filled. It is wonderful how many things are found to be wanting when you commence to keep house in this way. If £30,000 is to be the total expense, Victoria's proportion will be about £10,000. If I am not mistaken Victoria pays about one third of all new expenditure. The Attorney-General tells us that it will be economical for Victoria to pay £10,000 a year, and he points to the case of one Judge who has been dropped out of the Victorian Supreme Court. What is the saving of £3,000 thus effected compared with the 0,000 which Victoria will have to pay towards the expenditure involved in establishing a High Court?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is nearly one-third.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; but I think I shall be able to show that, even after the High Court is appointed, as many Judges will be required upon the Supreme Court Benches as are now found necessary. It was not owing to the establishment of Federation that one of the Victorian Judges was dropped out, because we have not yet had a High Court. It was due to temporary depression in business, and as the Act which requires that there shall be six Judges upon the Supreme Court Bench in Victoria has not been repealed, the vacancy now existing may be filled at any moment. The £10,000 may appear to some people to be a very small sum, but it will not be so regarded in Victoria. I know that the additional expense involved will be used as a fresh excuse for cutting down wages, or lowering the minimum of the Income Tax, and we shall find that as usual the whole burden of the £10,000, and the expenses connected with the Inter-State Commission and other federal institutions, will be thrown upon the poorer classes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That does not apply to Western Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Perhaps not, but Western Australia is not the whole of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I want the honorable and learned member to realise that neither is Victoria the whole of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—As a final argument, it has been urged that the Constitution orders us to establish a Federal Judiciary. We were directed by the Constitution to establish a uniform Tariff within two years, but it is not compulsory upon us to establish a High Court within that period. There is no limitation as to time, and no force us to take action. The section provides that the High Court shall be invested with judicial powers more than is conveyed by the words of the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The word "may" is in the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Quite so. A man has a son unmarried, and will say that his estate shall be vested in the eldest child. If his son, he does not mean that his son shall be married forthwith. He simply means that as soon as his son has a wife, his estate is to be vested in that child. That section 71 of the Constitution provides that the judicial power shall be vested in the High Court—that means when the High Court is established. I think that it is our duty at some time to establish a High Court—perhaps in a few years; but if we are able to secure an amendment to the Constitution which will improve the position of that tribunal. We know that unless we establish a High Court within a reasonable time we shall incur the risk of a breach of faith with the people of the Commonwealth; but I deny that it is a breach of faith. So far as my experience goes, I regard courts as necessary evils, not because of the provision in the Constitution for a High Court that the people are in favour of federation, but in spite of it. Moreover, the public looked at the provisions of the Constitution relating to the High Court before they were tampered with by the Imperial Government and the Parliament, when they were quit of their present shape. The provisions of the Constitution were almost all touched by the Imperial Government. Therefore, we are not committing a breach of faith with the people in giving effect to provisions which were submitted to them in their present shape. I agree with the Attorney-General in his opinions with regard to a court consisting of three Chief Justices. I think that he is in saying that the Constitution does not require us to appoint Judges of the High Court permanently, and I can scarcely see our being able to appoint a Judge until he ceases to be a Chief Justice of a State. Google

THOMSON.—What has the honorable learned member to say with regard to the proposed changes from the Inter-State Commission points of law.

HIGGINS.—From my point of view there is no difficulty in regard to that, but I should not appoint the Inter-State Commission at present. I have already expressed, in a communication which I sent to the journals, that the Constitution made the High Court essential in so far as points of law arising out of the proceedings of the Inter-State Commission are concerned. That no doubt raises a difficulty, but I think the honorable member is perfectly right in directing attention to it.

GLYNN.—Could we not provide for appeals to some other tribunal?

HIGGINS.—No; the Constitution requires that the High Court shall be the authority to deal with points of law referred by the Inter-State Commission. One of the objects of that commission is to be a check, and it is assumed that decisions will be rendered upon points of law, but I should not appoint the commission until we feel the necessity of it. I think we might wait until the necessity actually arises before we create an appellate court.

GLYNN.—Has the High Court exercised jurisdiction in matters of appeal from the Inter-State Commission? I do not know.

HIGGINS.—I am not prepared to discuss that point at present. I think the Attorney-General was quite right in regard to the Chief Justices of the High Court. We could not expect them to go to New Zealand and other States in order to do circuit work. They have enough to do at present, and they could not possibly have their engagements if they were extended in the manner indicated. If the second reading of this Bill is agreed to, and we are to discuss it in committee, I will support the appointment of a strong well-paid court. I shall, as far as I am able, prevent the fulfilment of my own wishes. Although I do not believe in the establishment of the court at present, I think it is my duty to make use of my influence by doing all I can to secure the best court possible. I think we must have five Judges if we have any.

JOHN QUICK.—That is with the jurisdiction proposed in the Bill?

HIGGINS.—Yes. I have known Judges to sit upon the Bench in Victoria and arrive at a decision, and it would be farcical to allow the unanimous decision of such a Bench to be overruled by three Judges in the High Court.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is rare to find so many Judges upon the Bench at any one time.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; it is not infrequent. There are often six Judges upon the Victorian Bench when the court is called upon to overrule a previous decision. Only two or three months ago, as I am reminded by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, there were five Judges on the Bench. If we are to have a High Court we must not be skimping or sparing, but must make it so strong that it cannot very well be ignored. Unless it were a strong court most of the big litigants would be inclined to ignore it, but I should make it so strong and so dignified that that could not very well happen. I wish, however, to wait until we see the development of the proposal for the establishment of a final court of appeal for the whole Empire. Mr. Justice Hodges went to England with a mission from the Government to induce the Home Authorities to establish one final court of appeal for the whole Empire. That is a grand idea. Nothing in the history of the world has had such civilizing influences as the system of British jurisprudence, and the idea of keeping in the current of that great stream is one not unworthy of our young nationhood. I should like to know how the Government reconcile the recommendations of Mr. Justice Hodges with their present proposal. Their idea now is to keep all they can from England, whereas the suggestion made by Mr. Justice Hodges was that as strong a court as possible should be established in England. Does the Attorney-General wish appeals to go to England? If he does, his cue should be to try to bring about the establishment of a final court of appeal for the Empire. If, however, he does not wish appeals to go to England, he must make it as difficult as possible to carry an appeal to the Privy Council. The sentiment which has found frequent expression, that we must have an Australian court for Australian subjects, is very attractive, and I confess that, irrespective of the expense which might be involved, I should support the proposal for the establishment of the High Court if I only felt that it would fulfil the expectations and wishes of those who framed the Constitution. I am afraid, however, that it will not. As I have said, it can be ignored by litigants who want to appeal from the Supreme Court, and even if litigants take their cases to the High Court there is the possibility of an appeal from that tribunal to the Privy Council. If we create a High Court under the Constitution as it stands, we shall erect a body which will be docked of power and shorn of dignity—which will be in the leading strings of some higher power elsewhere. I am looking forward to an ideal court, such as Sir Henry Parkes had in mind. His idea, when he moved his resolution at the Federal Convention in 1891, was very different from that which is embodied in the measure now before us. This resolution was accepted by the Attorney-General.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Sir Henry Parkes proposed to establish—

A judiciary, consisting of a Federal Supreme Court, which shall constitute a High Court of Appeal for Australia, under the direct authority of the Sovereign, whose decisions, as such, should be final.

In submitting his resolution, he said :—

In seeking to create this Supreme Court of Australia, it will be observed that I seek to create within it an appellate court from which there should be no appeal to the Queen in the Privy Council . . . I think we shall make a great mistake if we allow any appeal to be made outside the shores of the new Australia.

What a falling-off is there! The Attorney-General now proposes to create a court which will not have the powers indicated. There are two positions, either of which we might take up without loss of dignity. One is to keep the sap running from the root of British jurisprudence everywhere throughout the Empire. The other ideal is that of the late Sir Henry Parkes, namely, that we should be self-contained and self-sufficing, that we should take the responsibility of interpreting our laws as well as of making them. The present proposal does not comply with either of these requirements.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We do not possess the necessary power.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; but I hope that before long the present Ministry or some other will propose an amendment of the Constitution—which, I believe, would meet with the approval of the majority of the people of the Commonwealth—which would put the High Court, if it must be created, into the strong and dignified position the framers of the Constitution desired. I do not wish the High Court to be docked of its limbs, and to be in the leading strings of some power outside. If we pass the present Bill there will be no appeal back. Let us pause until we feel the pressure of events compelling us to action. Let us wait until we feel the need of the machinery before we create it. We shall then know what to provide. It is the wildest proposal in the world which contemplates the bringing into existence of a body before we realize the necessity of creating it. There has been too much pedantry in connexion with this scheme. As the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has said, we have too slavishly followed the precedents of America, and it is about time that we commenced to judge for ourselves as to what things fit us, and what things do not. We ought to apply our mind to the peculiar conditions of Australia, and to the particular character of our benches and our people. We should not assume that in the United States it was found that State Judges were weak and at the mercy of the Legislatures; we should discover similarly the Judges of the State of Australia are weak and at the mercy of the State Legislatures.

Sir JOHN QUICK (Bendigo).—In the two speeches which have just been delivered in opposition to the Bill, I may fairly be said that the case for the measure is visibly weakening. I join those honorable members in congratulating the Attorney-General upon the vigorous and brilliant manner in which he presented the case on behalf of the Bill. It is gratifying to note the calm and judicial manner in which the debate has hitherto been conducted. I hope that it will be prosecuted to the end upon the same lines. On this occasion it is my misfortune to disagree with the Attorney-General. If I could, I have seen my way to accept his resolution; it would have given me very great satisfaction to have heartily supported the Bill. The opinion which I have formed has not been arrived at hastily. It has been gradually maturing, and has been considerably rather than weakened by the debate which has taken place to-day.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member pointed it out three years ago, his work upon the Constitution.

JOHN QUICK.—I am glad that the question can be debated free from all political considerations. It is purely a legal question, and should be dealt with on its merits. In his opening observations the Attorney-General declared that the Bill should not be submitted to the microscope of microscopic considerations. He also said that the question of expense was not the question involved, but was rather a secondary consideration. I cannot acquiesce in that view. It cannot possibly be said to a reasonable man that the expenditure proposed upon this new judicial institution is one of a microscopic character. The expenditure of £30,000 or £40,000 cannot be treated as lightly and as unimportant as some honorable members are in the habit of treating millions. I believe that the search-light of public opinion throughout Australia has been thrown in a very marked manner upon the proposals of this Parliament, and especially in connexion with any matter involving expenditure. As a federalist I am of opinion that nothing shall be done by the first session of the Commonwealth to bring rival institutions into disrepute or to create a rivalry in the constituencies of Australia, as the trustees of vast revenues should earn the reputation of dealing with these revenues in a fair and economical manner. We cannot for one moment say that the annual expenditure of £30,000 or £40,000 for all time is merely a "microscopic" consideration. In the first place we should direct attention to what I consider three fundamental blots upon this Bill. Afterwards, I shall address myself to the considerations of a general character, which, I think, can be urged in opposition to it. Generally speaking, I could not justify this Bill in its present form, and the conditions which obtain throughout Australia before my constituents, and for which I cannot support the second reading in this House. In the splendid speech which he made last session, the Attorney-General almost exhausted the vocabulary in painting the ideal of the proposed High Court. He called it as the "guardian and interpreter of the Constitution," "the organ of the life," "the keystone of the Federal arch," "the essential complement and necessary corollary of our Constitution," "national as well as the Federal Court," "the centre and crown of the whole set of State judicial systems, as well as the centre and crown of the Federal system." Many of us may have used these expressions in the course of our public utterances, and probably in our public writings, during the federal campaign. At one time, indeed, I was under the impression that the High Court would be the guardian and interpreter of our Constitution, but upon closer analysis I find that since the adoption of the amendments which were effected in the measure by the Australian delegates in London in conference with the Home Authorities, it can no longer be said to be the sole guardian of our Constitution. Neither can it be said to be "the keystone of the Federal arch," because in the Privy Council we have a competitive "interpreter and guardian of the Constitution," and another "keystone of the Constitution" equally as vital, solid, and strong as is the High Court itself. As the Constitution stands, it is only in a very trifling number of matters that the High Court will be the sole guardian and interpreter of the Constitution, namely, in powers inter se between the Commonwealth and a State or States, and in powers inter se between two States. The remainder of the Constitution and the rest of the laws made under it may now come under the review of the Privy Council as the final interpreter, guardian, and arbiter of the Constitution. In only a very limited sense, therefore, can it be said that the High Court is the "keystone of the Federal arch" or the "guardian of the Federal Constitution." It certainly cannot be said to be "the centre and crown" of the whole set of State judicial courts or organizations, because I find—as has already been so amply pointed out—that the right of appeal from the decisions of the Supreme Courts of the States upon matters of State law direct to the Privy Council itself has been expressly preserved. The High Court, therefore, is not the "centre and crown" even of the State judicial system any more than it can be described as "the centre and crown" of the Federal judicial system. In using these nice expressions, we should be very careful to pay due regard to legal and constitutional accuracy. But, to address myself to the three fundamental objections which I find upon the face of this Bill. The first is that we are asked to vote in favour of a High Court. The Attorney-General has declared that under the Constitution it is absolutely mandatory upon us to create that tribunal.

But I would remind the honorable gentleman that even assuming that the words, "the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the High Court," are mandatory, they are mandatory only to the extent of creating a High Court of Appeal. That is the limited extent to which they are mandatory, even if they are capable of that signification, which I am not prepared to admit.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Surely the honorable and learned member is taking a very narrow view of the judicial power.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Under that section of the Constitution, the only thing mandatory is the establishment of a certain court of appeal with certain special powers of original jurisdiction. This Bill proposes to create something more than a High Court vested with the functions of a Federal Court of Appeal, because it goes further than the provisions of the Constitution which endow the High Court with certain appellate jurisdiction and the limited original jurisdiction disclosed in clause 75, and proceeds to clothe the new tribunal not only with the special attributes assigned to it under the Constitution—of which we cannot deprive it—but with extra powers which are purely optional. Thus it is proposed under this Bill to establish not merely a court of appeal or a High Court having only appellate jurisdiction, but to clothe it with the full measure of legislative authority and power with which it may be clothed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The idea is to make some work for it.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Apparently that is the object. But even assuming that the contention of the Attorney-General is correct, and that we are bound by a mandate of the Constitution to establish the High Court, we are not bound to establish it and to vest it with extra original jurisdiction. In other words, we are not compelled to ask it to perform the duties of a court of first instance, in addition to those of a court of appeal. There may be something in favour of the immediate establishment of a court of appeal, or of its establishment within a reasonable period, but under the Constitution there is nothing to compel us to establish a gigantic judicial organization, which will take away from the State courts a large measure of the jurisdiction which has been exercised by them, and which they could continue to exercise. I deny that there is any statutory mandate of a coercive character to establish a High Court at the time, and in the present circumstances, in Australia. In this connexion I draw attention to the fact that, though the Constitution lays it down that the powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the High Court, it is fixed when they shall be exercised. It does not say that it shall be exercised within two years, or within any time. There is one case where it is fixed in the Constitution. It is provided that within two years of the establishment of the Commonwealth a Tariff shall be passed. But even in that case, what was there to compel the Parliament to pass a uniform Tariff within two years? Could it be said that the Government would lie to compel the Parliament to agree to a uniform Tariff, although it was fixed? In the same way, there is nothing to coerce us to pass this Bill at the next session, or the session following, because I apprehend that the Government can decide without an Act, and without the Parliament, when it will decide whether the time has arrived for the establishment of a High Court, or any other court of Federal jurisdiction. I should like to see a passage from Judge Curtis's Journal of the United States Courts, where a case of the same kind is referred to. 134 he says—

It was contended, formerly, that the absolute duty incumbent upon Congress to organize the Judiciary Act gave effect, to vest of this judicial authority in some court of the United States. It is, however, perfectly well settled that whether this duty is incumbent upon Congress or not, it is a perfect application, and one which the United States cannot enforce.

So that I think that too much has been laid upon the words of the Constitution that the judicial power shall be vested in a High Court. It is merely a direction that something must happen in the course of events, and Parliament may decide when it is to happen. With reference to this original jurisdiction, I join with honorable members who have preceded me in strongly opposing against the fundamental feature of the Constitution, which is to vest the proposed additional Federal jurisdiction as supplementary or primary jurisdiction. It does not take away from the High Court of the character of a court of appeal, and it takes away much of the Attorney-General's argument ely necessary to establish a High Court if it is necessary to have a court as he says, why does he surround all this paraphernalia of original jurisdiction? Is it not quite true that he must feel convinced that of the High Court as a court would be utterly inadequate with five Judges, and that therefore it is thought advisable to hand over some new work in the shape of primary jurisdiction, so that the High Court may be kept employed? The second question which I have to the rest of the Bill which I find on its face is this: certain parts provision is apparently conferring Federal jurisdiction on the courts of the States, and in other parts jurisdiction is taken away. It seems to me that these words have been the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope.

It is absolutely a sham to say, in one part of the Bill, that the State courts are to be kept within Federal jurisdiction, whilst in another part provision is made for taking away jurisdiction without rhyme or reason, or at the caprice of any litigant. It is to be found in part 7, which is for the removal of causes. Part 6 is for Federal jurisdiction by State Court, and apparently gives them a bond and a right to enter on the jurisdiction of certain classes of Federal cases, and yet when we come to part 7 we find provision that in all cases except three is a writ issued in a State court in matters more than the defendant may lawfully take action to remove it to the Supreme Court. In clause 41 it is provided that certain matters, not enumerated in the Bill, shall be within the jurisdiction of the courts of the States, in a very broad sort of way. If honorable members will turn to clause 41 and see how they will find that it is very unique. It says that the jurisdiction of Federal Courts shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the State courts of the States in certain cases. In that class of cases the jurisdiction of the High Court is absolutely exclusive of the States courts even in matters of primary jurisdiction. Then clause 41 says—'The jurisdiction of federal courts in matters mentioned in the last preceding section shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the several courts of the States, except as provided in this

That certainly seems a very extraordinary way of legislating. First, it says that the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the State courts, and then it goes on to say, except in certain cases. What are the cases which may be to some extent considered by the States Courts. A case arising under the Constitution can be initiated in a State Court. A case arising under a Federal law such as the Customs Act, or the Post and Telegraph Act, can be initiated in a State Court. Any case arising between residents of different States may be initiated in a State Court. Any case arising under admiralty or maritime jurisdiction can be initiated in a State Court. Any case where the subject-matters claimed arise under the laws of different States may be originated in a State Court. That reads very well, but when we turn to clause 42 we find that—

Any suit involving a matter of federal jurisdiction which is at any time pending in the Supreme Court of a State may, subject to the provisions next hereinafter contained, be removed by any defendant therein to the High Court as of right in manner prescribed.

Does not that show that the provision apparently giving jurisdiction to States courts in the five classes of cases I have enumerated, is absolutely a sham? I wish to know why it is proposed in one clause, apparently, to give the States courts jurisdiction in these five classes of Federal cases, and, then in another clause to take away the jurisdiction at the caprice of any defendant, except in three small cases. What is there so special in cases arising under the Constitution, or under Federal laws, that the Supreme Court of the States should not be trusted with primary jurisdiction? What is there so peculiar in that class of work that the Supreme Court of a State should be subjected to the indignity of a case being withdrawn from its jurisdiction on the motion or application of any dissatisfied defendant? There is nothing at all to justify it.

Mr. CONROY.—And at any stage, probably just before a decision is to be given.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Probably finding from the drift of the arguments that it may go against him he steps in with a petition to remove the case to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is only to apply where the court is satisfied that there is just cause.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Under clause 42 any suit may be removed by any defendant to the High Court as a matter of right, except in three cases.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Five cases.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—There are other cases in which the High Court can remove a suit—even these three cases—if special cause be shown.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Exactly; but a defendant cannot remove a case at any stage as of right. He must come in before he has entered his defence, as the honorable and learned member will see if he looks at clause 43. Unless the litigants so desire, it need not be removed at all.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not know why a case arising under the Constitution, or under the Customs Act, or the Post and Telegraph Act, should be subject to the liability of being removed under the conditions indicated in the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the litigants do not want a case to be removed, it need not be removed.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It does not require the concurrence of both parties to remove a case. One dissatisfied party may remove a case without rhyme or reason. I should like to direct the attention of the House to a provision of the Bill to which attention has not been very forcibly directed up to the present time, and that is the provision that in the event of a dispute between the residents of different States, although it may be on a matter relating to State law or State contracts where no Federal question arises at all, the defendant has a right to have the case removed from the Supreme Court of a State to the High Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Where does the honorable and learned member find that? Have we any power over simply State jurisdiction? We have no such power.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Section 75 of the Constitution Act says that the High Court shall have original jurisdiction—

In all matters between residents of different States.

Clause 41 of this Bill says—

The jurisdiction of Federal Courts in matters not mentioned in the last preceding section shall be exclusive of the jurisdiction of the several courts of the States except as provided in this section.

That vests in the courts of the States the power to entertain disputes between residents of different States; but as it is a part of the Federal judicial power to hear any dispute between those two residents if once a case of that kind is launched in the court of a State, the non-resident defendant under this Bill, as I read it, may file a petition, and have it removed to the courts established thereunder. This is a part of the Federal judicial power, and the High Court may deal with disputes between residents of different States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Disputes between residents of different States is a matter arising under the Constitution.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No; disputes between residents of different States is not an ordinary law of the States. In the States it has been held over and over again that the words in the Constitution refer to disputes between residents of different States on matters of contract or anything within the jurisdiction of a State court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have taken notice of that kind and put them in paragraph (a) and (b) of clause 42 specially to deal with that.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Of course, if a defendant is sued in the State where he resides, he cannot remit. But suppose a defendant is sued in the State where the contract was made, but not where he resides, that case he can remit. Let us take the case of a merchant in New South Wales who holds a bill given by a resident in Victoria. It is payable in New South Wales, but the maker of the bill is a resident in Victoria. Under this measure, if a New South Wales merchant sues the maker of the bill in New South Wales, where the contract was made or where the money was payable, the non-resident defendant may apply to remit that case to the High Court. There is no doubt that this is absolutely beyond contradiction. Is there any justification is there for interfering with a class of cases like that, making them come within the jurisdiction of the judicial power? Does it mean that these points have not been thrashed out and considered, or is it a straining to make work for the Federal judicial organization? Another class of cases brought within the scope of the High Court, and which it is proposed to remove from State courts to the High Court, is admiralty and maritime cases. What rhyme or reason is there for removing those cases? As already pointed out by the honorable and learned member for Melbourne, the courts of the States have for many years past been exercising that class of jurisdiction, and have done their work very satisfactorily. I never heard of any agitation to take away from them their admiralty jurisdiction. I think that, at any rate, the power to take away that jurisdiction from the Admiralty Courts of Victoria, and of New South Wales, will be absolutely futile, because those are courts which are under Imperial legislation. This measure cannot in any way interfere with the unity or independence of these Vice-Admiralty Courts, though it may take away the jurisdiction which exists in the Admiralty of the remaining States. But, even should I, should like to know why we should interfere with that special jurisdiction. It is not necessary for the honour and dignity of the Federal Government, or for the efficiency of Federal legislation. Suppose we pass a Navigation Act, any disputes arising under it would arise under Federal jurisdiction and they would naturally come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts under the Navigation Act. Then, with reference to the matter claimed under different laws in different States, there is no urgent necessity for the provision for the removal of such cases from the State courts to the Federal Court. I believe that these provisions giving this wholesale power of removal from the State courts to the Federal Courts are undertaken from the legislation of the United States. But I would draw the attention of honorable members to the contrast between the two classes of legislation.

HIGGINS. — Drawn with differ-

JOHN QUICK. — Undoubtedly with a view apparently of loading the High Court of Australia with as much business as could be withdrawn from the other courts. This power of removal has no doubt been provided under the legislative provisions of the United States since the Judicature Act of 1875 was passed, but even under that Act there was a money limit to the power to remove. There was no Federal power unless the amount in dispute amounted to 500 dollars. But by an amendment of the judicial Act in 1888 it is enacted that no case shall be removed from the State courts except those of those matters coming within the jurisdiction of the Federal judicial power unless the money at stake or the value of the property concerned, is 2,000 dollars. I should like to know whether in utilizing this instrument of removal we intend to enhance the dignity and business of the High Court the question of the amount is taken into consideration? It appears not. It is quite clear that according to the Act of the United States of 1887-8, provision was made for the removal of civil suits at law or in equity, which may have been begun in the State Courts in the following cases:—

(a) Where the case arises under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, and more than 2,000 dollars, exclusive of interest and costs, are involved. The defendant only may remove.

I am quoting this passage from Curtis on the Jurisdiction of the United States Courts, page 189—

(b) Where the suit is between citizens of different States, and more than 2,000 dollars, as aforesaid, are involved. The defendant, if a non-resident of the State, may remove.

(c) Where the suit is between the citizens of a State and foreign States, citizens, or subjects, and more than 2,000 dollars, as aforesaid, are involved. The defendant, if a non-resident, may remove.

But in the case of disputes between residents of different States there are additional requirements and considerations besides the money limit, namely, the defendant must prove that there is local prejudice or influence which may prevent him from getting a fair trial. I will read the section—

Where a suit, involving more than 2,000 dollars, exclusive of interest and costs, is brought in a State court, by a citizen of that State, against a defendant who is neither a citizen nor a resident in that State, such defendant may remove the suit "at any time before the trial thereof," if he can make it appear to the Circuit Court that owing to local influence or prejudice he cannot obtain justice in the State court in which the cause is pending, or to which it may be removed for trial under the laws of the State, by reason of such prejudice or local interest.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Those are from inferior courts of the United States, and that is why there is a money limit.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — No; the section is this—

Removal may be had of civil suits at law or in equity, which might have been begun in the Circuit Court, in the following cases:

Mr. DEAKIN. — That is, begun in the inferior courts.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — No; they are begun in State courts.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Our removal is from the Supreme Court of a State.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — The State courts in America have Federal jurisdiction even although there is no provision in the Constitution for vesting them with it. They have jurisdiction to deal with Federal cases involving amounts under 2,000 dols. I will read the law—

The Circuit Courts of the United States shall have original cognisance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a similar nature, at common law, or in equity (1) where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and cost, the sum or value of 2,000 dols., and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States ;

and so on. That passage shows clearly that the States Courts of the United States have Federal jurisdiction by virtue of an Act of Congress in all Federal matters under 2,000 dols.; and it is only where the amount in dispute exceeds in value 2,000 dols. that the removal power may be exercised, while in disputes between residents of different States it requires not only the 2,000 dols. in excess to remove, but also proof of local influence. Therefore, this power of removal, I say, is a frightful blot on this Bill, and it has been placed there without any justification. Because if there is any justification in logic, or reason, or propriety, or policy for giving the States courts jurisdiction as proposed, if we have faith to give them jurisdiction we ought to give it fully and show our confidence that they have the ability and capacity to exercise that jurisdiction. We should not give it to them with one hand, and provide for taking it away with the other. There is another question of jurisdiction of an original character, which is proposed to be conferred upon the High Court under this Bill, to which I take the strongest objection as tending to overload the court with work of an original character. It is provided in the clauses which begin at clause 64, that all indictable offences against the laws of the Commonwealth are to be prosecuted by indictment by the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth, and that they are to be conducted before a Judge of the High Court. What does that mean? At the present time, and under the powers given by the Constitution, the criminal jurisdiction may be exercised by the courts of the States. The courts of the States have, I believe, done that work very satisfactorily. All the machinery for the control of criminal business and the trial of offences is in existence and has been utilized without any duplication of courts or of offices or of Judges. Now what is proposed to be done? It is proposed to take away that power from the courts of the

Sir John Quick.

States, and to give exclusive jurisdiction to the Judges of the High Court. I should like to know why that is necessary and why it is proposed. There has been any breakdown in the operation of the Federal law of Australia, incapacity shown, or any want of due preparedness to do this work on the part of the State courts? Nothing of that kind. Yet here we have this proposal. It illustrates what it means as regards the High Court and as regards overloading and overwork. It means this. Suppose a carrier in Western Australia is charged for trial on the charge of stealing. What is to happen? A Federal Judge has to travel from the seat of government to his associate, and all the paraphernalia of a High Court Judge, and all the expenses of travelling from the seat of government to the other end of the continent, thousands of miles, to Coolgardie, and suppose—in order to try a letter-carrier for stealing a letter.

MR. DEAKIN.—He will have his own circuit.

SIR JOHN QUICK.—That brings up the circuit business. How many are these five Judges to perambulate the course of a year? It does not seem that many visits of the kind will be made to Western Australia or to the remote parts of Queensland, at any rate without a great deal of inconvenience and ground of confusion to the business of the High Court. What is to happen to the business of the High Court while the Judges are making these pilgrimages to cases in distant States? With reference to that kind of case, especially, I say we are sinning against light if we interfere with the existing authorities exercised by the State courts in criminal jurisdiction. We shall be wasting the money of the Commonwealth. It may all be well, unless these circuit courts are held at least once in every two months, for unfortunate men who are committed to trial may have to await their trial a long length of time.

MR. DEAKIN.—Where does the hon. and learned member find all that?

SIR JOHN QUICK.—In this Bill.

MR. DEAKIN.—No, he does not. Nothing in the Bill to give the Judges of the High Court exclusive jurisdiction in such matters.

JOHN QUICK. — But the Bill able offences against the laws of the wealth shall be prosecuted by indictment and learned member would not be

JOHN QUICK. — It seems to me
e Attorney-General is unnecessarily ng the inherent difficulties of the situation by burdening the Bill with matter of the kind to which I have made critical reference. My criticism has, I hope, been given in a judicial spirit.

Mr. DEAKIN. — Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN QUICK. — If the Bill were denuded of all these proposals—of the large original jurisdiction proposed to be given to the High Court—and if the court stood as a court of appeal of Australia alone, many of my objections would be removed; but I cannot possibly support the Bill in its present shape. It necessarily involves much work on this court, and I agree with those honorable members who have said that if all this original jurisdiction is to be conferred upon the High Court, five Judges will not be sufficient to deal with its business. If it is conferred upon it, the Attorney-General may very well be considering before long whether he will not have to increase their number to ten. If there were any congestion in consequence of this overwhelming mass of business unnecessarily placed on the High Court, the public would cry out because of the delay, pressure would be brought to bear, and other Judges would be appointed. I appreciate the way in which the Attorney-General has put the matter, that if we take away original jurisdiction from the courts of the States it will remove the pressure of work from the States Courts, and lead to a reduction in the number of the Judges in those courts. I do not believe, however, that there would be a reduction of a single Judge in any court in any State of Australia as the outcome of the transfer of this original jurisdiction from the States Courts to the High Court.
We have heard much about retrenchment, and honorable members who have watched the history of the struggle in Australia during the last few years know how difficult it is to carry any retrenchment proposal.
I venture to say that the States Governments and the States Parliaments would consider they were being wronged, and that their State sovereignty was being sacrificed, if they were called upon to reduce their judicial organizations consequent upon the transfer of these matters to the High Court. Not one farthing would be saved, and the honorable and learned gentleman's assumption is scarcely justified by our knowledge of public business in Australia.
My objections would not be so strong if this were to be only a court of appeal, but even as regards the necessity of creating a court of appeal during the present session of the Parliament at all events, I am not yet convinced. I shall explain why. Under our Federal laws, which have been in operation for some time, the States Courts have been exercising jurisdiction; they have been administering Federal Acts. I have taken the trouble to examine the decisions of the various Supreme Courts of the States in every case that has been brought before them for revision or review from courts of inferior jurisdiction, such as Courts of Petty Sessions. I shall deal first with the amount of Federal work that has arisen under our Constitution. I find that since the establishment of the Commonwealth, in 1901, only twenty cases under the Federal laws have reached the Supreme Courts of all the States of Australia. In the first year of our Federal history, namely, 1901, there were only two cases; the case of Rex v. Bamford, known as the Armidale Post-office letter stealing case, which involved the question—"Does State law operate on property or territory exclusively vested in the Commonwealth?" That case was decided in November, 1901, by the Full Court of New South Wales. The next case, that of Kingston v. Gadd, occurred in the same year, and in that the point involved was the breaking of the Federal Customs seal. It was decided by the Full Court of Victoria in December, 1901.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is still on appeal.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—On appeal by the defendant, not by the Federal Government. Both these cases were eminently Federal decisions of a most important character, and I shall point out presently how satisfactorily these States Courts have been doing their work. In 1902 only ten Federal cases came before the Supreme Court Benches of the whole of Australia, while during the present year there have been, up to the present time, eight cases. That represents twenty cases during two and a half years.

Mr. CONROY.—Some of them being merely ordinary claims for negligence.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Yes. Even for the full twelve months of 1902 only ten cases arose under our Federal laws, and came before the Supreme Courts of the States. These, if the Bill had been in operation, would have come before the High Court of Australia on appeal. So that ten cases per year would be divided amongst five Judges—two each.

Mr. McCAY.—But they would have gone to the High Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Of course, but if they had, these ten cases would have been all the Federal business that would have been provided for the High Court by five Judges.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Some of our legislation has been passed only a few months, and many cases have been held back in the High Court since the early establishment of the High Court.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—We might have imagined that during the first years of our existence our legislation would be closely examined, and vigorous attacks made upon it. I do not think there will be a crop of litigation in time to come, such as which occurred in 1902. The ten cases represented a regular harvest in comparison with what is likely to follow. Most of the difficult questions are being settled; and the work that has been decided involves a serious and leaves less for the High Court. I am now to the character of the work done by the decisions given by the States Courts, and I would invite attention to this point. Judging from the work done by the decisions given, the Federal Government or those who have peculiarly sensational views, need have no apprehension of the capacity of the States Courts Judges to interpret our Federal legislation. Of the whole of these twenty cases I do not know of a single decision that has been made by any single Judge, or by any Full Court of the States of Australia, that is not sufficient to command confidence and respect. Even if some of them may be disagreed upon, I venture to say that the judgments are of some of the Judges sitting in the Supreme Courts of New South Wales and Victoria have been of a very high judicial character, and will compare favorably with the great American decisions, which are all so proud to read and quote.

I wish to indicate any particular judgment in the decision of the Full Court of Victoria in the case of Kingston v. Gadd, a masterly judgment, and although it was given in the early years of our Federal history, when one might have found a want of novelty in dealing with the questions, I was amazed and delighted to find what a thorough grasp of Federal principles the judgment in that case displayed.

responding case of ex parte Oessel—which the same question was discussed brought before the Full Court of New South Wales in 1902, nearly twelve years later. I have read the decision in it, and it is also entitled to be pronounced a masterly Federal judgment. I believe that any man can be found in Australia who could claim to exceed in impartiality, and in judicial discrimination the Judges of the States Courts, including the Judges of the Federal Courts, as well as the Federal Courts that have so far dealt with Federal matters, have done their duty as well as to inspire respect, and not to give any feeling of distrust that the Federal laws will be dealt with in a spirit. I think we can trust any of the Federal Courts of Australia to deal fairly with Federal laws, and to deal out justice as well as to the Federal Government. In the case of Stephens v. Donohoe, decided by Mr. Justices Hodges, in 1902, it was held that duties were payable on votes of the House of Representatives. That decision is absolutely unchallengeable. Even if it went to the House of Commons, or to the Privy Council, or any tribunal in the world, it would be held to be correct. In the case of Stephens v. Robert Reid & Co., raising a question of the liability of a person for making a false entry, and the question of whether it is necessary to prove guilty knowledge in a case of information was also determined by Mr. Justice Hodges, it was held that it was not necessary in certain cases to prove guilty knowledge. The same principle was subsequently affirmed by Mr. Justice Power in the Queensland court in the case of the Collector of Customs at Brisbane v. Gallagher. Those two decisions are unchallengeable. I do not see any cause for dissatisfaction or quarrelling on with the High Court to quarrel with themselves against unfair decisions of the State Tribunals. In the case of Alcock v. Mr. Justice Hodges, the decision of the inferior court, on the ground that a certain statement was untrue was not untrue. That is well known as "the billiard-table case." Who can challenge the accuracy of the decision? It was against the Federal Government, of course, but now in the calm light of after reflection and review, even the Minister for Trade and Customs must admit that that decision was perfectly correct. In the case of the Commissioner of Taxes of Victoria v. Wollaston, the liability of a Federal officer to pay State income tax was considered and discussed.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The court was wrong.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I do not know about that. At any rate, that case was very ably argued. Although there was one very strong American case in favour of the view put forward by the Federal Government that Federal officials were exempt from income tax, still the Canadian cases were very conflicting, and I do not think any reasonable ground of complaint arises in those cases. The decision, at any rate, was not against any Federal law.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Hear, hear! It only stretched a local law too far.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—In the case of Hannah v. Drake, a Sydney cabman's claim against the Postmaster-General for negligence before the passing of the Federal Postal Act, it was held that the State Court had no jurisdiction. That decision was perfectly accurate, and it led to the passing of a Bill which is now law, giving the States Courts jurisdiction to deal with claims against the Commonwealth. That is a very proper Act, and it only requires to be extended a little to make it work smoothly. Another case, Donohoe v. Sargood and Co., came before Mr. Justice Pring, of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and in that case a very important decision was given as to what constitutes an "entry." The decision was eminently in favour of the Minister for Trade and Customs, and I suppose the right honorable gentleman has no complaint to make against it. In the case of Stephens v. Gollin and Co. the defendant was charged with importing prohibited articles—exhausted tea—in October, 1902, and a question as to the standard of purity was decided by Mr. Justice Hodges, of Victoria. There was the case, ex parte Oesselmann, arising from the breaking of the Federal Customs seal, and that was decided by the Full Court of New South Wales. In the case ex parte Schuch for smuggling cigars, contrary to State law, as there was no Federal law dealing with smuggling at the time, prosecutions were instituted after the passing of the Federal Customs Act, and the conviction under the State law was confirmed by the Full Court of New South Wales. That was not challenged, and if it were carried to the High Court or the Privy Council it would probably be sustained. The case, Donohoe v. Healey, was the illicit still case to which reference was made on a former occasion. The magistrate held that proof of the possession of a still was evidence of guilty knowledge, and that decision was quashed by the Full Court of New South Wales. Then there was the case of the Collector of Customs (Rockhampton) v. Gallagher, to which I have already referred as having been decided by Mr. Justice Power. In the case of the Collector of Customs (Brisbane) v. Robert Reid and Co., penalties were inflicted for making false entries by Mr. Justice Cooper and a jury of the Supreme Court of Queensland, in April, 1903. In the case of the Attorney-General of New South Wales v. the Collector of Customs, there was involved the power of the Federal Government to tax State imports.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To make them liable to import duties.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That case was decided by the Judges on the construction of our Federal Act. Because it was said that our Federal Act did not explicitly and expressly tax State imports, therefore they were not taxable.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They went further than that.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Two Judges went further than that, but that is obiter dicta, and not necessary to the decision.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Two out of three went further.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—The opinion was expressed in this House, while the Tariff Bill was under consideration, that there was no power under the Constitution by which this Parliament could tax State imports. Personally I should be glad to hear that the decision in that case was overruled by the Privy Council, but I am afraid it will not be. In the case of Donohoe v. the Le Coisepellier the prosecution was under the Immigration Restriction Act of a ship captain for allowing one of the crew to escape from his ship, and the liability of the ship captain was decided by the Supreme Court of New South Wales. I have been able to find only one case in Adelaide, that of the Collector of Customs (Adelaide) v. Foale and Co. That was a false entry case, involving the power of the Collector of Customs to make a declaration. It was decided by the Full Court of New South Wales, and it must be reversed, and it was held that the Collector of Customs had power to make a declaration.

Mr. GLYNN.—There was another case on the same point.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—There was another case in that case for the Federal Government to complain of. The next case was Stephens v. Abrahams, which involved the validity of the Customs Act, and the joinder of taxation, with other matters. The validity of the Act was sustained by the Full Court of Victoria reversing the decision of the Chief Justice Madden, in April, 1903. In the case, Goldring v. Collector of Customs (New South Wales), decided by the Full Court of New South Wales, was one in which a writ of habeas corpus was applied for for a mandamus to compel a Customs officer to pass an entry. The Supreme Court held that it had no jurisdiction. It was surely hardly necessary to go to the Supreme Court to have the decision decided, because it is quite plain from the provisions of the Constitution that the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction of that kind. That does not mean that there is no jurisdiction for the plaintiff in that case, but in the case of Julian Salomons, counsel for the plaintiff, admitted that although the plaintiff had no right to this special extra remedy of a mandamus, an action would lie. The plaintiff made a mistake in applying for the wrong remedy, but an action would lie under the Claims against the Commonwealth Act.

Mr. THOMSON.—He could not get a writ of books.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Then he could sue for them by action. He should get the proper remedy under the Federal Act. The provision has existed in the United States Constitution for the granting of a writ of mandamus against a Federal officer. That Constitution has worked well. I have drawn attention to this because, although they may perhaps have been wearying for the express purpose of doing it—firstly, that these States have done their work very well up to this point, and secondly, that the amount of work arising under the Constitution of the Federal Parliament is very large, indeed, and is not sufficient to maintain the establishment of this huge and expensive organization in the

our history. I regret that so due anxiety has been shown by Government to push on with this Bill. No ground of urgency. I see no serious issues awaiting determination. This critical juncture of our financial affairs I fear that the pressing forward of a measure of this magnitude, involving it is a sum of £30,000 a year to begin with and other thousands to follow, will shake the minds of the people of Australia and of the constituents to whom we are responsible, a feeling that we are not managing the finances with sufficient care and ability. Take the case of Victoria. I read to-day's paper the statement that the deficiency in our railway income for the last twelve months amounts to upwards of £100,000. Will honorable members tell me what that means, and what it will do? It has meant reduced pay to our railway people, a reduction in the staff, and a reduction in the maintenance round. It has meant an increase in our income tax and a reduction in the minimum exemption, and it will lead to further taxation unless this Federal Government sets the example of trying to reduce unnecessary expenditure. If it is a matter of life and death, a matter of the safety of the State, for the defence of the Commonwealth against an invader, I understand that we should be justified in doing as much as would be absolutely necessary for our protection. As we have got on during the last two years of our Federal Government without this High Court, let us try to do so a little longer. There is no reason for rushing this through at the present time. Let the constituencies of the Commonwealth have an opportunity of consideration of the matter, and let those returned to Parliament deal with the question. Should we hasten its decision? Why should there be this rush in the last session of Parliament to get this Bill through, to create all these various lucrative positions? There is no doubt that it will excite a great deal of interest amongst the constituencies. It is well to say that it is a part of the Federal ideal. Of course we all desire the Federal ideal, but there is no reason to come during which it may be discussed and its various outlines painted out. What can we expect, or desire to contribute to the Federal fabric in the first Parliament? There is no necessity nor any demand that we should do so? I like to see our Federal Constitution developed gradually, and the fabric of our Federal institutions regarded as were some of those old cathedrals which were originated, and were gradually extended and developed with the years according to the requirements of the times and the genius, capacity, and ability of the people amongst whom they were erected. Let us not have any undue haste in this matter.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There has been a call for it all over the Commonwealth during the last twelve months.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I have not heard of it. I have not heard it called for in Victoria. Of course I cannot speak for the other States.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It has been called for in the other States.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—It has not been called for in either the city or the country districts of Victoria. Public opinion is there dead against it, and I say we should respect public opinion, and not set our faces against it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We ought to educate it.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—No. I am not prepared to educate it. I decline to do it. These Federal requirements ought not to demand that the people should be educated upon them. They should grow insensibly and gradually, and I decline to accept any responsibility for public expenditure of this magnitude unless the natural course of the development of our Constitution points with the finger of irresistible knowledge to its necessity. If that can be shown I am prepared to vote for it, but I am not prepared to take the responsibility at the present juncture, especially in the shape of voting for this Bill. I therefore do trust that the Government will not strain the views of their supporters who do not wish to be placed in any unpleasant or awkward position, by asking them to vote against their convictions. I cannot strain my convictions so far as to vote for this Bill. Therefore for the reasons I have stated and for other reasons which I shall not go into, but which have been so well elaborated by the honorable and learned members for South Australia and Northern Melbourne, I express the hope that this Bill will not be pushed forward.

Debate (on motion by Mr. McCAY) adjourned.

House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Senate.

Wednesday, 10 June, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Senator DRAKE laid upon the table the following papers:—

Papers relating to the refusal of certificates of domicile to three Chinese residents of the Northern Territory.

Further papers relating to the admission of certain boiler-makers under contract into Western Australia.

Memorandum by the Treasurer, relating to the payment of rebate of excise laid on Australian-grown sugar by white labour.

BASS' STRAIT CABLE.

Senator DOBSON asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it the intention of Ministers to submit to Parliament any proposal for purchasing the cable between Tasmania and Victoria?

2. Would it be a breach of the existing contract with the cable company for the Commonwealth Parliament to provide for the establishment and working of a system of wireless telegraphy between Tasmania and Victoria?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. It is not the intention of Ministers to submit to Parliament during the present session any proposal for purchasing the cable between Tasmania and Victoria.

2. A legal opinion is being obtained, and, pending this, a definite reply cannot be given.

Senator KEATING asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is it the intention of the Government during the present session to submit to Parliament a Bill to authorize the purchase by the Government of the Commonwealth of the Bass Strait cable?

2. If not, what steps, if any, are being taken in the direction of acquiring this cable for the people of the Commonwealth?

Senator DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable and learned senator's questions:—

1. It is not the intention of the Government during the present session to submit to Parliament a Bill to authorize the purchase by the Government of the Commonwealth of the Bass' Strait cable.

2. An offer has been obtained from the Extension Company, and an inquiry has been made as to the value of the cable and other property in connexion therewith, but a final report has not yet been received.

VOTE FOR BUILDING

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. On what basis is the money (vote for erection and maintenance of buildings transferred departments) allocated to the States of the Commonwealth?

2. In the event of any vote being voted at the close of the financial year, will unexpended be added to the share of for the ensuing year in addition to its proportionate share?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

The amounts voted were not allocated to the States. Estimates of the actual requirements of the various States were submitted to the Government, and the expenditure was charged to the States in which it was incurred. When a provision is made to the States for property transferred, the amount of this expenditure is included.

FORTIFICATIONS: ALBANY.

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

In the case of the officer in charge of the Princess Royal Battery at Albany, Australia, who without authority allowed Japanese officers from visiting warships to inspect the fortifications, what punishment has been inflicted upon the officer?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

This matter has been referred to the Commandant of the Commonwealth Forces in Australia for a full report.

STANDING ORDERS.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland, Minister for the Postmaster-General).—I beg to move

That the Senate do now resolve to refer to a committee of the whole for the purpose of considering and adopting the standing orders reported to the Senate by the Standing Orders Committee on the 9th of October, 1902, amendments recommended by the Standing Orders Committee in special report to the Senate 4th June, 1903.

It will be remembered that previous to the first meeting of the Senate, a set of standing orders was framed for the purpose of adoption, and that it was slightly amended, and laid upon the table in the amended form on the 10th of June, 1901. A motion was made for the temporary adoption on the 5th of June, 1901, soon after the appointment of the Committee. The matter was discussed then, but the Senate was not prepared to discuss the standing orders at all, and was not disposed to adopt them at discussion. It, therefore, referred the matter to a small committee, who were asked to consider the standing orders in the States Parliaments, and to bring in the following day a report recommending the adoption of one set of standing orders. It was pointed out that it would be most impossible for any committee to perform the task in that short time. But, nevertheless, on the next day, the Committee brought up a report recommending the temporary adoption of the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia, with a few exceptions, they were adopted. The Standing Orders Committee afterwards held a number of meetings extending from June to nearly the end of December, and, in October, the draft standing orders as amended and recommended by that Committee were laid upon the table of the Senate. The Senate proposed that they should be adopted as a temporary expedient. That course did not find favour with the House, and, consequently, we have been acting since June last under the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia. In respect, perhaps, that course may not have been a disadvantage, because we have been during that time thoroughly well acquainted with the standing orders under which we have been working, and can refer to them now as a point of departure in framing new standing orders. It will be seen, in considering the standing orders before the Senate, that the side-note is that they are, to a large extent, taken from the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia. But it does not follow that these particular standing orders have been adopted by the Committee with reference to the standing orders of the States. In a great many States the standing orders of the various Legislatures are most identical. But where a standing order is practically the same as that which has been working under since June, no reference is made in the draft to the standing order of the House of Assembly of South Australia, and not to the standing order of any other State, so that it may be actually identical. I trust that we shall be able, as the result of our reports now, to evolve a code of standing orders that will allow the fullest possible freedom of debate to all members of the Senate, and at the same time not leave any opening for unnecessary discussion, or for what may perhaps be called a waste of time. Up till now I think it will be agreed by all that our debates have been well conducted. We have dealt fully with every subject that has been brought forward, and at the same time we have been able to keep our debates within reasonable limits. I think that that will happen also under the new standing orders. I propose to glance, briefly only, at the new standing orders, and to point out what appear to be amendments of the standing orders under which we have been working for so long. I cannot tell the Senate the reasons which have actuated the Standing Orders Committee in their recommendations, as I was not a member of that body. But I have no doubt that the members of the Committee and you yourself, Mr. President—whom I notice as having been asked to take charge of the report in committee—

Senator CLEMENS.—Where does the Postmaster-General notice that?

Senator DRAKE.—In the report of the proceedings of the Committee on page 16. The reference there I take to mean that you, sir, as the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, will, in the course of the debate, explain to us, where necessary, the reasons that actuated the Committee in the alterations they made. I am glad, also, to see from their report that the Committee communicated with the Standing Orders Committee appointed by the House of Representatives with a view to secure uniformity, as far as possible, in the standing orders of the two Houses, and that that result has been arrived at in most cases. It would put us in a somewhat stronger position if the Committee were able to inform us that they and the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives had been able to come to an agreement in all cases. I have had occasion, in my cursory glance at this report, to refer to particular orders in which the other House is particularly interested; and I think it would have been a great advantage if the Standing Orders Committees of the two Houses could have come to an agreement upon those matters. The greater number of our standing orders have to do with the internal work of this Chamber only, and in regard to them we should, perhaps, be justified in resenting any assistance that might be offered from outside. But in regard to standing orders which, by their nature, necessarily bring us into contact with the other Chamber, it would have been an advantage if we could have had agreement. Without it we may by our standing orders practically compel ourselves to take a certain line of action which may bring us into conflict with the other Chamber. In those matters it seems to me that it would be a wiser, and, perhaps, almost a more courteous thing to delay coming to a decision until such time as the subject could be discussed thoroughly with the corresponding body appointed by the House of Representatives. I shall refer now only to the alterations which have come particularly under my notice, and make such observation as may appear to me to be pertinent to the subject as I go along. The first chapter, honorable senators will notice, deals with the proceedings at the opening of Parliament. That is merely an embodiment of the practice that has been adopted in the past, and which, probably, we shall follow, as we naturally follow a precedent wherever we can even if we have no standing orders on the subject. When we come to discuss that, I may have to refer to one or two matters which at the present time are not quite clear to me, but there appears to be nothing calling for serious objection. When we come to chapter 2, I shall ask honorable senators to direct their attention to Standing Order 25, in which, I think, there is an innovation. I am not prepared to say—and in this matter and others I am not in the counsels of the Committee—that it is not perfectly right; but it appears to me, from my knowledge of the proceedings in the particular State from which I come, that this provision is an innovation. I refer to the provision that the President, in presenting the address in reply to the Governor-General shall claim in the name of the Senate “the right of free and direct access and communication with His Excellency.” It may be merely a trifling matter of form, but under the practice to which I have been accustomed the Speaker and, I think, the President, ask that the most favorable construction shall be put upon the actions of the Chambers they represent. The proposed form is somewhat new to me, but I have no doubt that the members of the Committee will be able to tell us why it has been adopted. Standing Order 26 deals with the question whether our sitting should constitute a continuous Parliament, or whether at each election of the House of Representatives, and of half the Senate, a new Parliament commences. In the case with which I have had the most to do, the proceedings of the Parliament are divided into separate sessions. After every general election a new Parliament is held to be a new Parliament. That is the case in our case, this session is the second session of the first Parliament, and the next session will be the first session of the second Parliament. The question is whether we can take power in our standing orders to bind by an act of ours a new Parliament. That is a matter upon which I invite discussion. There is no doubt which I have to call attention to in chapter 3, Standing Order 3, the Printing Committee deal with the standing order power should be conferred with the similar committee of the House of Representatives. In the matter of printing more than anything else, it is desirable that the Committees of the two Houses should confer and act together. I will give one instance of the desirability of so doing. In the printing of papers upon the tables of the two Houses, and in getting them printed, we are in this difficulty. In the House we have made an arrangement by which papers, wherever possible, shall be printed simultaneously upon the tables of the two Houses, we may have each House a separate order that papers shall be printed in which case technically duplication of a paper will have to be issued. In the instance, to-day I have laid some papers upon the table of the Senate. Those papers have already been laid upon the table of the House of Representatives. So that the House of Representatives before we did, they probably have had that those papers shall be printed. I do not ask for any such order to-day, but I believe that a similar order had been made in the other House, but in case it had not been made, we might be obliged to print a paper and find that it had not been printed and circulated because no order had been obtained from either House. It is desirable that in these matters the Printing Committee should core should be a close understanding of them in order to insure that, for a paper was required to be printed by order of the House and circulated amongst the members of both. That would prevent the printing of papers which were not being printed at all, or the other printing of papers which were required to be printed, although they were laid on the table of both Houses simultaneously.

MR. CHARLESTON.—What power does Standing Order 35 give?

MR. DRAKE.—There is power to order that standing order, and also under Standing Order 34, but not under Standing Order 36. I presume that that is only an accidental omission. An alteration will be made in Standing Order 38 in consequence of the passage of the Electoral Bill which provides for a different method of dealing with disputed returns. Honourable members will see that an Elections and Returns Committee will still be necessary in order to deal with matters respecting qualifications of senators, or vacancies in the Senate, or the case of any senator who has been appointed but not elected. The proposed standing order will remain somewhat amended.

MR. BEST.—The necessary amendment has been made in the new standing order which the Committee has circulated.

MR. DRAKE.—I believe a suggestion of an amendment is made in a special order which is to be considered together with the one we are now discussing. Standing Order 48, chapter 8, which deals with provisions for leave of absence to senators, provides that a motion is not to be

MR. CLEMENS.—A motion of the kind was made last session on the initiative of the Minister-General.

MR. DRAKE.—That only shows how necessary it would be in making the proposed amendment. We can conceive of cases in which it would be desirable to, at all events, lay down words on a motion of the kind.

MR. WALKER.—The standing orders are suspended.

MR. DRAKE.—But in framing the standing orders we endeavour to avoid the necessity of suspending them. We intend that our proceedings shall always be governed by the standing orders, and, to that end, in such a task as that in which we are now engaged, we try to avoid leaving any ground for suspension. Chapter 9 deals with the sitting and adjournment of the Senate, and Standing Order 59 deals with motions for adjournment, in which I am inclined to think is a very fair and proper way, so as to provide for occasions when a senator desires to debate any specially urgent matter. In such case the senator has to state that the subject which he desires to debate is a definite matter of urgent public importance; and four senators have to rise in their places to support him. The senator then has the floor of the House, and by the next standing order the duration of the speeches is limited. These standing orders deal with a matter which may be considered, because it brings into operation certain regulations with regard to the right of moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing grievances. In chapter 10, which deals with the routine of business, a little alteration will have to be made in regard to Ministers fixing the order of Government business. As the standing order under this head reads, it applies only to days when the Government business takes precedence, but, of course, exactly the same reason exists on ordinary as on special days for the Government putting their own business on the notice-paper in the order they desire. For instance, on Fridays, when private business finishes at one o'clock and Government business comes on after the luncheon hour, it is just as important that the Government should be able to fix the order of their own business as it is on any other day. Chapter 16 deals with the "previous question," which, I think, could have been moved in this Chamber before under the rules of the House of Commons, though it was not specially provided for in our standing orders. It is now provided for in accordance with the practice that obtains in most Parliaments. Chapter 18, which deals with divisions, provides that the President or Chairman may vote wherever they may be sitting; and this clears up a little difficulty which arose last session.

Senator CLEMENS.—Perhaps it would be better to say that this standing order is intended to clear up a difficulty.

Senator DRAKE.—On my reading of the standing order it will prevent any difficulty arising in the future. There is an important alteration in chapter 19 with regard to public Bills. In this chapter it is provided that a public Bill may be brought in if necessary on an order of the Senate. I presume that to mean that where a resolution has been carried in favour of the introduction of a Bill, with a second resolution, practically instructing the Government to bring in the Bill, that shall be considered sufficient without further formality. It means, I take it, that such a Bill can be brought in by the Government at any time, the resolution being regarded as the order of the Senate. Standing Orders 181 and 182, which deal with first readings, contain an innovation which seems to have become necessary in consequence of the constitution of these two Houses. We have been accustomed to have the Estimates laid on the table, and an opportunity has generally been taken for discussing those Estimates on the second reading of a Supply Bill, though strictly speaking, according to the standing orders, a second reading discussion should be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. The two standing orders to which I have referred provide that on the first reading of a Money Bill there may be a debate, which need not be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. I presume that that is intended to be exactly the counterpart of the debate which takes place in the other Chamber on going into Committee of Supply, when there is a general discussion of grievances, according to an old practice handed down from time immemorial. Standing Orders 235 and 236 deal with lapsed Bills, and there again, I think, will arise the question as to whether the sessions of Senate are to be regarded as those of one continuous Parliament or of separate Parliaments—that is, when there has been no dissolution. I take it that though these standing orders will enable a Bill not passed in one session to be revived in another, they will not admit of a measure which has failed in one Parliament being revived in another Parliament without going through the necessary preliminaries. However, that is a matter which no doubt will receive attention when it arises in committee. Standing Orders 242 to 249 are amended by the special report, and to these I desire to direct particular attention. These standing orders deal with the action of the Senate in connexion with Bills which we may not amend. The whole question was debated last session, and it will be remembered that the Senate then pressed a request a second time to another place, in order that the Bill might be passed, and to avoid the possibility of a dead-lock, agreed to deal with those Bills though under some sort of protest. The question now proposed is to fix our practice. I say that we may make such request at any time, and that if they are not assented to, we may then demand a free conference. I am right in saying that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives have not agreed to that, and are probably not likely to agree to it, and I ask the Senate to consider this fully, in dealing with this matter, whether we are justified in taking the course proposed, and, if justified, whether it is to do so. If we have regard to the fact that we may be pretty well sure that if we follow the practice proposed we shall bring ourselves into conflict with the other Chamber, Honorable senators may say that what seems to be right and take the course of conflict. But is it necessary for us to do that? There may be a possibility of coming to an arrangement with the other Chamber to lay down our practice beforehand? Our standing orders in this way is to lay down a binding rule on ourselves to take a certain course of action, which we know will bring us into conflict with another place. Why cannot we wait until the time comes, and deal with it according to our best lights?

Senator PEARCE.—Then the House would have the advantage would fix the practice.

Senator DRAKE.—When the question arises?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes.

Senator DRAKE.—Surely that should be done after full consideration, probably after some kind of conference. What is proposed now, before the question actually at issue between the two Chambers, is that we shall decide the matter for ourselves without any reference to the other House. Is that likely to bring peace between the Chambers? Is it likely to place the other Chamber in the position that, unless they submit or assent to whatever rule we lay down, they must adopt some other practice which will bring them into conflict with us? Is it likely to bring the other Chamber more likely to meet with us if we take advantage of this opportunity to lay down a hard-and-fast rule on ourselves?

Senator HIGGS.—We had better adhere to the Constitution, and, if necessary, send it back twenty times.

Senator DRAKE.—That is the way in which the honorable senator reads the Constitution, and, if that be a correct reading, need is there for us, by means of the standing orders, to put ourselves under compulsion to take a certain line of action before a contingency arises?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The other House adhered to that practice last session.

Senator DRAKE.—I beg the honorable senator's pardon. On that occasion the House of Representatives passed a resolution to the effect that, while it was not content that the Senate was justified in sending a request a second time, they would, in order to get on with legislation, deal with it.

Senator BEST.—It was a sort of concession without prejudice?

Senator DRAKE.—Exactly; it was a concession "without prejudice," in order that the Bill might be passed. It seems to be desirable that, if possible, this matter should be arranged on a consultation or conference of the Standing Orders Committees of the two Houses. It does not tend to peace, exactly the reverse, to take this occasion to assert that in future, when any question arises, the Senate will take a certain step. It is shutting the door to any peaceful negotiation between the two Houses, when we put it down and declare—"We are going to do this, and the other House will have to follow us and make their standing orders to suit ours." I am sure the Committee will consider this matter very carefully. Chapter 22 deals with select committees, and Standing Order 303 provides that no proposal shall be recorded. That, I presume, does away altogether with the practice of giving riders. I do not know what is the objection to riders, because very often a select committee brings in a majority report and a minority report.

The PRESIDENT.—That is never done in a select committee.

Senator DRAKE.—I thought it was; in events in another State select committees have frequently taken that course. The last words of the standing order are—

Senator objecting to any portion of the resolution shall propose his amendment at the time the paragraph he wishes to amend shall be under consideration, but no protest or dissent shall be made to the report.

The President tells me that that is not a novelty, but it certainly is a novelty to me.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is a novelty upon the practice in South Australia.

Senator DRAKE.—I know that in connection with the proceedings of select committees in another State, members of such a committee have been in the habit of adding their protest to the general report in the form of a rider. All the sections of chapter 23 as originally drafted come out, and other sections 316 to 319 are substituted. These are alterations which have been made necessary in consequence of the passing of the Electoral Act. In chapter 26, dealing with conferences, I notice that Standing Order No. 340 provides that—

There shall be only one conference on any Bill or other matter.

I should certainly like to hear reasons against allowing, possibly, a second conference. When there is a dispute between the two Houses we shall all desire to come into accord somehow or other, and, if one conference having failed, a second might succeed, I do not know what objection can be urged against it. Chapter 34 deals with the conduct of senators and rules of debate. The standing order I desire particularly to refer to in this chapter is No. 393, and I am afraid that I have myself been offending against that standing order several times this afternoon. It is the one which provides that a senator shall not turn his back upon the Chair. I am afraid that I offend more often against that standing order than against any other. The President understands, I am sure that I do so out of no disrespect to the Chair. The offence against the standing order arises really from the formation of the chamber, and the place in it which I occupy when introducing or speaking upon a measure.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable and learned senator has abundant excuse, because there is no such standing order in any other Parliament in the world.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not rely upon that, but it is certainly exceedingly difficult, especially if interjections come from my right, to reply to them without to a great extent turning my back upon the Chair. I desire merely to draw attention to the standing order. The important amendments in this chapter appear to me to be those dealing with motions, and providing that there shall be no debates upon certain questions. They embody, I think, to a great extent the practice which we have already adopted in debate. For instance, no debate is allowed upon the motion "That the Senate do now divide." That is a standing order which we have adopted before, and most of these standing orders in this chapter appear either to accord with the practice we have been following up to the present time, or are taken from the practice of the House of Commons. This chapter also deals with infringements of order and privilege, and provides punishments which appear to me to be rather stringent, but I suppose that in certain circumstances they would be justifiable. In matters of this sort we have to rely greatly upon the officer presiding over the Senate, or over committees of the whole, and, of course, on the good sense of the Senate itself. I do not pretend that the remarks I have made are anything like exhaustive, but I think I have touched slightly upon the principal cases in which alterations have been made from the practice which we have been following up to the present time. I hope that when we have thoroughly discussed these matters, we shall turn out a code of standing orders under which we shall be able to transact the business in this Chamber satisfactorily, and keep the debates up to the high level which has so far been established.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I should like to raise a point of order as to whether it is competent for the Committee to adopt standing orders. The motion reads—

That the House shall resolve itself into a committee of the whole for the purpose of considering and adopting the standing orders—

The PRESIDENT.—That is adopting them so far as the Committee is concerned. Of course the Committee will report to the Senate, and unless the Senate adopts the report of the committee, or adopts it with amendments, the report of the Committee will of course have no effect. The Committee is only appointed to consider these matters in detail.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not intend to follow the lead of the Postmaster-General, and indulge in a detailed criticism of the standing orders we are now considering, because it seems to me that such a criticism and consideration ought properly to take place in committee. It has been the custom in the Senate to debate Bills on their second reading, because all Bills are supposed to contain some principles. The details of these standing orders we shall, I suppose, discuss in committee. But when I read the orders of the day, and note that this matter is put down as Government business, and when I am referred by the Postmaster-General to the recommendation of the Standing Orders Committee that the President be requested to take up the consideration of the proposed standing orders in committee of the Senate, I can, I think, see some reason why the Postmaster-General should have gone into a lengthy and detailed criticism. It is a novel thing to me to find a Government in the first place setting down as Government business certain business which is not Government business, and then immediately abdicating their position and allowing the President or any one else in the Senate to take charge of the proceedings when they come into committee.

Senator DRAKE.—No; we are not going to do that.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am very glad to hear it. That is just the assurance I wanted to get from the honorable and learned senator. I am glad that the Government have placed this matter amongst the business of the day as Government business, and that the President is to take charge of it in committee as before the Senate. Perhaps the chief reason for my rising to speak upon this matter is to remind honorable senators that no member of the Senate is more closely interested in the standing orders than our Chairman of Committees. He will be called upon to administer them, and, owing to the fact that he occupied the Chair as Chairman of Committees during the whole of the session, the honorable and learned senator will probably be conversant not only with the standing orders under which we are now working, but also with the standing orders now submitted to us, because he has been a member of the Standing Orders Committee. But when we get into committee, Senator Best, as our Chairman of Committees, will be debarred from discussing the standing orders now submitted to us. I think it is a very great pity that the honorable and learned senator should be thus disabled. I therefore venture to make the suggestion that Senator Best should obtain leave from the Committee to be present when he thinks fit on any standing order. I think honorable senators will all agree that it is desirable that Senator Best should have that opportunity.

under what other circumstances, but by entering now upon a detailed criticism, Senator Best will be able to honor the honorable senators the benefit of knowledge which he peculiarly must possess as to the desirability or otherwise of adopting these standing orders. I hope my suggestion I have made will be adopted. I have said that I do not intend to examine the standing orders in detail now, because, as I have indicated, I think this is not the proper time to do so. I can, however, assure the Postmaster-General that in committee I shall be prepared to give them as lengthy consideration as he has given them in the Senate, and to criticise them in detail quite minutely as the honorable and learned Senator has done. Having made that statement, it would not be fitting for me to proceed now with any criticism of the standing orders; and for that reason, and not because I have not many comments to make upon them, I refrain at present from further remarks.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I beg to move as an amendment—

That the words "and adopting," line 3, be deleted.

I should like to be allowed to say that I think it is not the province of the Committee to adopt these standing orders. If the motion states, the Committee is to consider them, and we are then to ask the Senate to adopt them over again, we shall be making double work, which is unnecessary.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I think Senator Higgs, in moving his amendment, is asking the Senate to take a premature departure. It is the rule in all legislative bodies that no motion finally leaves the legislative chamber until a motion for its adoption has been passed. Before honorable senators are asked to depart from that rule, some stronger reasons than those advanced by Senator Higgs in support of his amendment should be submitted to them.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—It appears to me that the words "and adopting" are a mistake. I entirely agree with Senator Higgs. The Committee certainly do not adopt the standing orders, they are only put before them for consideration. The adoption is by the Senate afterwards. The words in this motion are a misusage, and it will be a great deal better to omit them.

Senator BEST.—We could insert the words "and report."

Senator PLAYFORD.—Certainly, if honorable senators like. But the motion as now framed does not express the truth, under the circumstances. We ought to ask the Committee to consider and report on the standing orders.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I also think it is for the Committee to consider the standing orders and to make a report, and afterwards for the Senate to adopt that report. I am in favour of the amendment.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—Whether the word "adopting" or "agreeing" is used, it is much the same thing. The committee can only adopt standing orders so far as it is concerned. The Senate may throw the standing orders so adopted into the waste-paper basket if it likes. It seems to me nothing unusual to use the words "and reporting." All the clauses of a Bill have to be agreed to by a committee before it can report to the Senate, and therefore it really adopts them.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—The Committee will agree to the standing orders—which is equivalent to adopting them—and the Senate will adopt the report of the Committee. If a difference is made between "adopting" and "agreeing to" at the committee stage, then it will be necessary in the Senate to move first to adopt the report of the Committee, and then to adopt the standing orders, whereas, if the motion is left as it is, the Senate will adopt the report of the Committee, and the whole business will be finished. I think it will be seen upon reflection that the motion is quite correct in form.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I think it is quite obvious that it is not competent for the adoption of standing orders to finally rest with the Committee. No matter what word is made use of the intention of the motion is that the Committee shall consider the standing orders and come to a decision. The word "adopt" really means that the Committee shall come to a decision on the draft standing orders. Will any honorable senator suggest for a moment that if the standing orders were allowed to remain at that stage they would be the rules of the Senate? When the Committee makes its report it will be for the Senate to adopt the standing orders, and it is only then that they will have any validity. I have to thank Senator Clemons for mentioning a matter which is more or less of a personal character. Necessarily, I take the keenest interest in the proposed standing orders. It is quite true that I was a member of the Standing Orders Committee for a portion of the time, and that we were not unanimous in the adoption of many of the standing orders. The general understanding was that we should reserve any discussion of details until the standing orders came to be considered in committee or in the Senate, as the case might be. There are certain standing orders to which I take exception, and on which I should be glad to be allowed the privilege of saying a few words, while there are certain others which I should be glad to see included. I realize at once that the consideration of these rules does not involve a party question, otherwise it would be most improper for the Chairman to take any part in the deliberations of the Committee. If, by reason of any little experience I can make any remarks which may be of value to the Committee—and the Senate accepts the view which has been expressed by Senator Clemons—I shall occasionally, if there is no objection, exercise the privilege of speaking on the standing order that is before the Chamber.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I do not think that any harm can result from carrying the motion as it is. I apprehend that Senator Higgs thinks that perhaps by a very strained construction the use of the words “and adopting” may mean that the standing orders will become law when agreed to in committee. Every committee is delegated certain authority by the Senate to consider the details of a measure or proposal and to bring up a report. In this case each standing order must be agreed to. When the Committee shall have agreed to all the standing orders, then it will have adopted them as far as it could adopt anything. Its resolutions will be reported, and if they are agreed to the standing orders will be adopted by the Senate. I cannot see that any objection can be taken to the form of motion.

Amendment agreed to.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee:

The CHAIRMAN.—May I take this opportunity to thank honorable senators for re-electing me to the position of Chairman of Committees, and at the same time to express my deep appreciation of the honour which they have done me in that regard. I appreciate it as the highest compliment, by reason of the fact that the honorable senators were good enough to pass the motion for my appointment to this business.

Standing Order 1—

On the first day of the meeting of any of Parliament after a general election of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a general election for the House of Representatives—

(a) If there be a President he shall occupy the chair.

(b) The Clerk shall read the proclamation calling Parliament together.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I think, is the proper opportunity to draw attention to an omission—which honorable senator must recognise as being extremely unusual—of the sort that is had, practically existing in the Parliament of every community, to the practice of the House of Commons in case of a difficulty arising under chapter 1 of its standing orders, under the head of the general rule and conduct of business, the House of Representatives practice that—

In all cases not provided for hereinafter by sessional or other orders, resort shall be had to the rules, forms, and practice of the House of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland.

I propose to move that a similar resort be inserted in these standing orders.

The CHAIRMAN.—That will not be an amendment, but a new standing order. It will have to be proposed after the consideration of the printed code is complete.

Senator CLEMONS.—At the present stage, sir, I shall move the insertion of a new standing order to that effect.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I intend to propose a series of amendments to this standing order. In the first instance I move—

That the following words be inserted in paragraph (a):—“The Clerk shall cause the bell to be rung five minutes prior to the time named in the proclamation.”

I propose the amendment as a matter of convenience to senators who may be assembled in the club-room or in the precincts of the Chamber. Unless they receive a warning at some time they are the hour in which the Senate is to meet, and come straggling in after the meeting is over.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I wish to ask for the Chairman's ruling. I want to make an alteration, but I am not certain as to whether it takes precedence of the amendment moved by Senator Higgs.

I may point out that this chapter of the standing orders mixes up two things—the proceedings of a new Parliament and those of a current Parliament. From my point of view, those two things ought to be separated. I know what is at the bottom of the matter. What is in view is that ours is a continuous Parliament, and never ends. I think that that view is not entirely correct, in any case, it is inconvenient. I wish the Chapter I. deal with two separate matters—(1) the proceedings of a new Parliament, and (2) the proceedings of any session of a current Parliament.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I have no objection whatever to an amendment of Senator Higgs. It is a matter of convenience. But I strongly object to the Senate not to admit that a new Parliament is constituted solely by a dissolution of the House of Representatives. I think the Senate to consider its own rights in its own position. If we do not be careful, we shall have a great deal of difficulty with this question. If we look at the Constitution we shall see that the word "Parliament" has a certain meaning attached to it. Chapter I. provides that—

"The legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, which shall consist of the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, and which is hereafter referred to as the Parliament, or 'The Parliament of the Commonwealth.'"

It is to say, the Parliament is a continuous body. There is no question of a new Parliament. There is no suggestion that the Parliament dies when the House of Representatives is dissolved. The Parliament is treated as a continuous body, and the Senate is part of the Parliament. In South Australia we had some difficulty with this question, and a contest nearly arose between the two Houses in reference to the words "new Parliament." We had to consider what those words meant? Did Parliament cease to exist and a new Parliament come into existence whenever a dissolution of one House took place? I strongly advise the Senate to agree to any such proposal.

Senator CLEMONS.—How does Senator Baker propose to provide for a penal dissolution of the Senate?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—That takes place under the Constitution itself. The standing orders provide for it because in the case of a penal dissolution there would be an election for the House of Representatives. It is provided for, consequently, in Standing Order 1. This question was thrashed out by the Standing Orders Committee with great thoroughness. I also call attention to the additional fact that the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives thrashed it out, and adopted this standing order altered to meet their different position. So that we have the standing orders of both Houses adopting this course of procedure. It will be a great mistake if we use a word which we find in the Constitution in a different sense from that in which it is there used, and if we use it in a sense which will imply that the Senate is not so much a constituent part of the Parliament as is the House of Representatives. I hope that the standing order will stand as drafted.

The CHAIRMAN.—I have been endeavouring to devise some means whereby I can meet Senator Clemons in his desire to move an amendment in this standing order. I think that the proper course will be for Senator Higgs to withdraw his amendment for the time being, and then for Senator Clemons to move the omission of the words "or after a general election for the House of Representatives." He can test the question on those words; but to carry out what he desires means a re-drafting of Standing Order 1, or of Chapter I. altogether.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator CLEMONS) proposed—

That the words "or after a general election for the House of Representatives," be omitted.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—It appears to me that the question in dispute hinges on the use of the word "new"—whether there is a new Parliament after the House of Representatives and half the Senate have gone before the country, and a general election has taken place. In South Australia we were in exactly the same position as are the Senate and the House of Representatives. For years our Legislative Council was practically a continuous body, so many of its members retiring at a certain time and so many remaining, just as is the case here. But, for convenience, whenever there was a general election for the lower House we spoke of a new Parliament having been elected. We have numbered our Parliaments. If honorable senators turn to the records of South Australia they will see that reference is made to the first Parliament, the second Parliament, the third Parliament, and so on. I believe that the Governor in his opening speech alludes to the number of the Parliaments. The newspapers do, at any rate, in their accounts of the opening. Common usage has prescribed that a new Parliament comes into existence after a general election. In South Australia, in our standing orders, we have separate clauses describing first the opening of a new Parliament, in which there is probably a little more form and ceremony than on an ordinary occasion; and, secondly, the opening of an ordinary session. I do not know that there is much in the point. It will not make a bit of difference. Of course Parliament is a continuous body. There is no doubt of that. That is to say, it is supposed to be continuous, but it is not so in actual fact, because there are intervals in which there is only a part of Parliament in existence. The lower House is occasionally dissolved, and an election takes place, and in the meantime there is really no Parliament in existence. In our case, as the whole of the House of Representatives and half the Senate will go to the country, I think we may fairly speak of a new Parliament coming into existence after the elections. I do not know that there is any special reason why we should adopt a new style of procedure. In all the States the Parliaments are called new Parliaments after general elections. It would have been better if the Standing Orders Committee had adopted the usual practice, instead of a new one, from which no particular good can result, although I cannot see at present that it will do any particular harm.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I have thought that we sometimes too slavishly follow a body that is to some extent analogous to ours, but which is certainly not so altogether. We are not on the same footing as the British Houses of Parliament. We are a new body. We are a Federal Senate. We have a certain analogy with the British Parliament, but only to a small extent; and it is about time that we struck out and thought for ourselves and adopted a phraseology suited to our own circumstances and conditions. I do not admit that in most of the standing orders of the States the words "new Parliament" are used, because they have adopted the phraseology of the British House of Commons. But, as I have pointed out, that Parliament is different from that constituted from our own. The House of Lords is different from this Senate. It must be remembered that the Scottish representative peers are elected for the Parliament for the same period of time as the Members of the House of Commons. The Irish peers are, it is true, elected for life. But although the words "new Parliament" have been handed down in Great Britain for a long time, it has not yet arrived in our history when we should adopt a phraseology more suited to our circumstances, especially when the old phraseology implies a certain amount of discontinuity on the part of the Senate from the House of Representatives.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do not help saying that Senator Baker is the only man in this committee who wishes to the full and desires to see the powers and privileges of the Senate set out. For that reason I, to some extent, repeat the remarks which he has just made. I have risen, not because I do not understand the importance of maintaining our privileges and rights, but to point out that this is simply an instance of confusion of thought, and, if I may use the word, blundering. No distinction is drawn between this standing order between an ordinary session and a new Parliament. I shall use the term "new Parliament," with Senator Baker's permission, to indicate that a new Parliament which meets practically after the expiration of every three years first meets when we first met. That pretty well what I mean by a "new Parliament." According to Senator Baker's suggestion, that is not a new Parliament. But I would point out that between a Parliament which meets directly after an election and a Parliament sitting in session like the present one there is a considerable difference. This standing order mixes up the two hopelessly, and draws no distinction between an ordinary session and the meeting of a new Parliament. It is for that reason, and not because I am blind to the privileges of the Senate, that I want to diminish its powers, that the amendment before the committee. it in the interests of lucidity and to confusion of thought.

tor PEARCE (Western Australia).—I would like to ask Senator Baker what meaning of the words "general election of the Senate and the House of Representatives?" Are we to understand that is known as a penal dissolution ordered to, or an election such as will take place at the end of this year, when half the number of senators will retire? What meaning of the term "general election" as here used?

tor Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Perhaps it would have been better if the words "periodical election" had been used. Senator Pearce will see the meaning of the word "periodical" is used in a Bill before us, and there defined. When the standing orders were drawn up the meaning had not been seen by any of the committee. In fact, the measure has been laid on the table only this session.

tor WALKER (New South Wales).—I suggest that Senator Clemons withdraw his amendment temporarily in order to allow the word "periodical" to be inserted.

tor CLEMONS.—I have no objection. The amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The amendment (by Senator WALKER) proposed—the word "general," line 1, be omitted, and in view to insert in lieu thereof the word "periodical."

tor PLAYFORD (South Australia).—In my opinion the clause ought to be retained in order to meet the circumstances laid out by Senator Pearce. A periodical election, which under ordinary circumstances takes place every three years, is provided for in the Constitution, and it appears to me that there is no necessity for the words "after a general election for the House of Representatives." At an ordinary election about half of the members of the House go to the country at exactly the same time as the whole of the members of the House of Representatives, and therefore it may be argued that both Houses are then before the electors. Then there is a penal dissolution in which all the members of both Houses go to the country at the same time; but some provision should be made for that contingency.

tor Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—What is provided for here is the meeting of Parliament after a periodical election for the Senate, or after a general election for the House of Representatives. If there is a penal dissolution there will be a general election for both Houses, and that also is provided for. If there is some additional election that does not alter the sense of the standing order, which seems to me to be quite clear.

Senator DRAKE.—A little further on I was going to call attention to one or two matters in this chapter which are not quite clear to me. At present I only wish to say that the chapter appears to deal with every possible case of the meeting of Parliament, either after a general election, or after a periodical election of the Senate. We are now, it seems, dealing with the question as to whether Parliament is or is not a continuous body; but that question, I fancy has been evaded. It has not been settled, I take it, whether we are to divide our proceedings into different Parliaments.

Senator PEARCE.—The question does not arise.

Senator DRAKE.—To a great extent in these matters we are governed by ordinary phraseology, and are accustomed to speak of a new Parliament after each general election. That is an idea inherited in most of the States; and in Queensland, for instance, each new Parliament is given a number, although it includes the Legislative Council whose members are nominated for life.

Senator DAWSON.—That Legislative Council is different from the Senate.

Senator DRAKE.—My point is that each Parliament in Queensland is after a general election called a new Parliament, although it includes the Legislative Council, whose members are nominees for life.

Senator DAWSON.—Is it not called a new Parliament because the Upper House is a nominee House?

Senator DRAKE.—I do not know whether that is the reason, but such is the fact. I think that this standing order has been framed in such a way as to provide for a Parliament meeting under all circumstances without deciding the question of whether or not it is a new Parliament.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—It would be better to postpone the standing order and re-draft it. We ought to strike out the word "general," and conclude the paragraph with the words, "and after a general election for the Senate and House of Representatives." That would meet the case of a penal dissolution.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—Looking into the matter a little more closely, I see strong reasons why the Parliaments should be divided as suggested. There is an immense difference between the opening of a new Parliament and the opening of an ordinary session. In the former case there are no sworn members and no President, and Commissioners have to be brought in. Members have to be sworn and a President elected before the Governor-General comes to open Parliament. Although we should not follow slavishly everything done by either the mother of Parliaments or her daughters, we may see that there is a great deal of reason for this difference in the two forms of opening Parliament. At present we should confine ourselves to settling the form which the first part of the standing order should take. If we use the words "periodical election," and afterwards provide for a general election of the Senate and House of Representatives, the case of a penal dissolution will be met.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—In my opinion everything that is necessary is provided for in the standing orders, although for greater clearness the word "periodical" might be used. It is only in case of a dead-lock that the Senate has to go to the country along with the House of Representatives, and the standing order provides for such a contingency, although it is not stated in so many words.

Senator PEARCE.—There may be a general election of the House of Representatives without a general election for the Senate.

Senator CHARLESTON.—If so then certain things follow. But there must also be a general election when both Houses are dissolved, and it is provided that in such cases certain events happen.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria).—There is a certain vagueness about the standing order, and I fully realize the difficulty to which Senator Clemons has called attention. If the standing order be altered it should provide for an ordinary meeting of Parliament, and for a meeting after a penal dissolution. But the standing order is altogether silent as to the latter, and I suggest that it should provide for the meeting after a periodical election for the Senate and a general election for the House of Representatives, "or after a general election of both Houses of Parliament." That would meet the case of a penal dissolution or of an ordinary general election of the House of Representatives, without a special election for the Senate. We stand in exactly the same position as the House of Representatives, so our existence as a body is practically continuous, and, therefore, it is not so difficult to distinguish between the two cases. I suggest that which seems to meet the difficulty, and to explain the difference between the two dissolutions.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I am afraid that if we alter the standing order as now proposed it will put us into a dilemma in the future. We must assume the position that there is no dissolution of Parliament, unless we have a doubt as to the success of the President's mission, and if the President is successful he goes before the country next time. So far as he is concerned, he saved the country of electing a President. We should have a continuous President. That may be a disadvantage. I agree with all that Senator De Largie has said upon the necessity of having a definition. We should have a definition of what is a new Parliament. If not, we may find ourselves in some such fix as is indicated. I hope the matter will be brought before for further consideration.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (Victoria).—I am sorry to trouble you so often, but I must express a hope that honorable senators will not alter this standing order without due consideration. On the point raised by Senator De Largie, if the standing order is altered, senators will look at the Constitution and they will find that the President holds office so long as he is a senator, and his term as a senator ceases when he ceases to be President. Then, although at present we hope that the elections for the House of Representatives and for the Senate will take place at the same time, that may not happen always. There may be a dissolution of the House of Representatives without a penal dissolution of the Senate. At the same time also may come when the elections for the two Houses may not occur at the same time, and all that is provided for in this standing order.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is a provision for a dissolution also provided for?

Mr Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Yes, dissolution is provided for. I may honorable senators that when the order was first drawn, it contained words "after an election follow the penal dissolution of both Houses," the words were struck out as being unnecessary. They are not necessary, because there is an election for both Houses and it necessarily be an election for one. The election for the House of Representatives must take place periodically, even if there is not a general election of the Senate at the same time. I think the more honorable senators study the Standing Orders, the more they will see that the possible case is provided for. I shall not say more about it, because I have already said my views once or twice. I think it is pretty clear, and if any attempt is made to alter it without careful consideration, it shall only get into difficulties. If it is re-drafted, let the work be done by the Standing Orders Committee. I think it is possible that if any attempt is made to alter it by this committee in a hurry, it will not be made nearly so clear as it is now.

Mr DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—With all due respect to Senator Baker, I must differ with his contention. Mr Baker, had to go to the country in the month of November of this year, and if he was elected, he would still be a senator, and if he were defeated, he would remain a senator until the end of December. I ask the honorable and learned member to look at section 17 of the Constitution. The second part of the section states that the President shall cease to hold office if he ceases to be a senator. Presently, if the honorable and learned member is elected when he goes to the country, and if that is before the end of his term, he will still be a senator, and consequently under this standing order, he will be President of the Senate.

Mr PLAYFORD (South Australia).—This standing order incidentally comes upon the question as to the term for which the President of the Senate is elected — whether for three years or six years. From the first time the standing order it may be argued that the President is elected he shall sit as long as he is a member of the Senate. If he is amongst the number of senators who have polled a higher number of votes than the others, it may be argued that he is entitled to retain the office of President for six years, and if he has to go for election with the first batch because he happens to be amongst the number of senators who obtain a lower number of votes, it may be argued in the same way that he has been elected President only for three years. I do not know whether it was intended when we elected the President that he should be elected for three or six years; but this standing order pretty well fixes his election for six years.

The CHAIRMAN.—The amendment immediately before the committee is to strike out the word "general" with a view to insert the word "periodical." Although I must confess that I cannot see that the standing order as at present drafted covers the contingency of a periodical election, the amendment proposed will hardly cover what is intended or desired by honorable senators. It is quite clear that the contingency may arise of a dissolution of the other House and the continuance of the Senate. Another contingency may arise in which there may be an election of half of the members of the Senate at the same time as a general election for members of the House of Representatives. It seems to me desirable that the confusion which appears to exist in the minds of honorable senators should be cleared up by some incisive language.

Senator DRAKE.—If this standing order is to be reconsidered it had better be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee, and if it is to be postponed it would be as well, I think, to postpone the whole chapter. I should like, however, before moving the postponement, to draw the attention of Senator Baker and other honorable senators to a matter which I cannot quite understand at the present time. I understand that this chapter is designed to meet every possible case, to provide for cases where there is a President at the commencement of a session and for cases where there is no President. After the words "if there be a President," the procedure which shall take place during the opening of the session is set forth, and that procedure is the procedure which was followed at the opening of the present session, there being a President. But when we come to Standing Order 3 it states, "The Senate will then adjourn," and at that stage this session we did not adjourn. We did business after that, and probably should again desire to do business. Standing Order 3 seems to be correct in case there is no President. Honorable senators will see that reading. But the Senate does not adjourn when there is a President. This session we appointed a committee to prepare the address in reply after that, and we might possibly have gone on to consider the address in reply. That is frequently done, and it was done during this session in the other Chamber. But according to these standing orders, under circumstances exactly the same as those existing at the beginning of this session, we should have had to adjourn as soon as the senator who had been elected had taken the oath. We could not have gone on with the address in reply. The practice here in cases where there is a President does not seem to be the same as the practice hitherto adopted. If the chapter is postponed for reconsideration I hope that matter will be taken into consideration.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—Before the chapter is postponed, there is a question arising out of the first paragraph, which, I think, should also have the serious attention of the committee. Under paragraph (a) "if there be a President" it is provided that he shall take the chair, and we are told that this standing order is intended to deal with the condition of things which arises after an election following a penal dissolution, and after an ordinary periodical election. We must contemplate, as Senator De Largie pointed out, that upon a penal dissolution every member of the Senate will cease to be a senator, and then this paragraph (a) could not apply in the case of a senator elected after a penal dissolution, because there would be no President. The only case in which it would apply, if it applied at all, is in the case of a periodical election. I should like to know whether we assume here that the President is elected for the full term for which he is elected to be a senator. It would be as well for the Standing Orders Committee to take that point into consideration. According to my reading of the Constitution, his term of office as President is not there laid down. What is laid down is that if he ceases to be a senator he shall cease to hold office as President. He may cease to be a senator by resigning before the term for which he has been elected has passed. By ceasing to be a senator he would cease to be a President. By adopting paragraph (a) in its present form, it seems to me that we shall be admitting that our present President, who is one of the six-year senators under existing circumstances, is to be President when the new Parliament meets at the coming periodical election. It is the wish of the Senate, well and truly, that it should be remembered that we are laying down the principle that a senator who is to be President is to remain President for the full term of six years. The contention which Senator De Largie referred to should then be taken into consideration. If each senator holds office until the end of December, if he is elected at the next periodical election he will have ceased to be a senator at the end of the year, and if the present occupant of the chair is re-elected, the contention may well be brought forward that he is not President. We ought to consider seriously whether the Constitution contemplates that the Senate had the power to bind itself in the election of the President. It seems to me that, under these circumstances, on any occasion upon which the Senate might possibly elect a President would be a penal dissolution.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion (by Senator DRAKE) proposed.

That Chapter I. (Standing Orders) be postponed.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I do not agree with those who have said that the standing order deals with the position of the President at all. Certainly, there is no provision in the standing orders as to the President's term of office; it might be construed to be so. When we come to deal with the next chapter we can fix the term during which a senator shall hold office as President. Senator Baker has said that the Constitution provides that the senator shall hold office during his term of membership. But I do not think that is the correct reading of section 63. It says—

The Senate shall, before proceeding to the dispatch of any other business, choose a senator to be the President of the Senate; and as soon as the office of President becomes vacant, the Senate shall again choose a senator to be the President.

Inasmuch as we are now in a position to consider the term of office for the President, we ought to do so. Certainly the senators should be given an opportunity of saying whether they are in favour of a three years' term, or a six years' term, or a life term, provided that the holder of the chair is not defeated at an feeling of the committee on the point, I move—

That after the word "whenever," line 1, the following words be inserted:—"owing to a periodical or general election of the Senate, or from any other cause."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I feel sure that the amendment will not meet the object of Senator Pearce. One can conceive that it would apply only to a case where a senator had lost his seat, and he might lose his seat owing to a periodical or a general election or owing to death. It does not say that he shall cease to be President. I would suggest to my honorable friend to move the insertion of a new standing order to this effect—

The President shall be elected at the first meeting of the session following a periodical or general election of the Senate.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—It was a great pity that this question was not considered and settled in the Senate before the Standing Orders Committee brought up its report. I do not feel that I should be justified in voting to elect a President for a Senate in which I might not have a seat. Since one-half of the Senate has to go to the country every three years, it is not fair that the President should hold his office for longer than that term.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—I think it is the usual practice for the President of a Legislative Council to be elected for the term of his councillorship.
The President's term of office will expire when his term of membership expires—on the 31st December, 1906. I think it was quite understood when he was elected that we followed the usual practice in all Legislative Councils. On the 31st December, 1906, his term of office will cease, and, should he be re-elected, he will come back as a new senator.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes; but he will be re-elected before that date.

Senator CHARLESTON.—He may be a senator-elect for the next Parliament, but his term of office as President will cease at the end of the year 1906, and if he should be re-elected he will come in as a new senator. If the new Senate should choose to elect him to the Chair, well and good;
but if not he must give way to another senator. He could not possibly come back to the Senate as President on the 1st January, 1907.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I do not know of any understanding of the kind. My idea is that in common fairness, both the President and the Chairman of Committees ought to be elected for the same term, and that is for the life of a Parliament. We can imagine a case in which we may be looking round for a President under certain conditions. We may say "If we elect Senator So-and-so he will be in office for six years; but if we elect Senator Somebody Else he will be in the Chair for only three years," and the chance is that the latter may get the position simply because it will afford an opportunity to elect another President at the end of three years. Under the circumstances, as one-half of the members of the Senate will retire every three years, I think it would be far better to elect the President for a term of three years. Then let us treat our Chairman of Committees somewhat differently from what we do now. Up to the present he has only been elected for the session. He should be elected for the same term as the President.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—How would Senator Playford provide for a dissolution of the House of Representatives? He contends that a general election would mean the choice of a "new Parliament." A new Parliament may have been in existence only about a year, and we may have elected our President. Suppose there is then a dissolution of the other House. Then, of course, there would be a new Parliament, and we should be called together by the Governor-General. Would Senator Playford then contend that we should have to elect a new President, although he might have been in office only twelve months, and although the Senate might not have been dissolved at all?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We do not recognise a penal dissolution of the other House if we are not touched.

Senator DRAKE.—We are now discussing the proper interpretation to be placed upon a section of the Constitution. We cannot do that by standing orders. If we pass standing orders which conflict with the Constitution, the Constitution will negative them. The Constitution says that the President shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a senator. Can we that section by passing a standing order? Certainly we cannot.

Senator CLEMONS.—Who can decide it? I am afraid the High Court is not going to do it.

Senator DRAKE.—All questions requiring an interpretation of the Constitution ought to be decided by the High Court, and certainly the High Court would be affected by the existence of a standing order.

Senator PEARCE.—Not by the standing order of Parliament?

Senator DRAKE.—This is not a question of parliamentary procedure. The honorable senator wants to know what our procedure the interpretation of the Constitution concerning voting may be some doubt. Under one interpretation it may be held that the terms of our standing order is not accordant with the Constitution, and then our standing order would be absolutely nugatory. It is unnecessary at this stage to discuss the question.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I should like to call the attention of the Governor-General to the fact that the standing order 17 is closely intertwined with chapter 1, which is to be read together, that we may get a definition of a "new Parliament." When we get a definition, we shall be able to put the standing order what will meet the wishes of Mr. Pearce. I agree that the question is not one that can be settled by a standing order. It arises under the interpretation of the Constitution, which will be interpreted by the High Court. It would be convenient therefore to postpone the question of the standing order until we get the decision of the High Court which I have referred to.

Senator DRAKE.—Where are the committees to begin their consideration of the standing orders if we are to postpone the question now under discussion? Some of the orders can be found for postponing other orders.

Senator CLEMONS.—If these standing orders are badly drafted, I am not responsible for it.

Senator DRAKE.—I am afraid we postpone this chapter we shall have to debate over again later on.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—On consideration I can see a great force in Senator Higgs' contention that the words which I have ace will not carry out my intention. The insertion after the word "vacant" the words "which vacancy shall take by reason of a periodical or general election of the Senate," would have the effect I desire. Senator CLEMONS' proposal on the determination we come to in chapter I. If the term "new Parliament" is not defined in chapter I., his proposal will have no effect. It will be open question—What is a "new Parliament?" I leave to draw my amendment. Amendment, by leave, withdrawn. Amendment (by Senator PEARCE) proposed—

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
 Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.
 Standing Order 18—

any one senator be proposed and seconded and, if he expresses in his place his sense of his proposed to be conferred upon him, and himself to the Senate, and he is then out of his place by the senators who proposed and seconded him, and by them continue to the chair.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I do think this standing order is very badly worded. I desire to submit an amendment, which, however, I shall not move if there is opposition. I move—the words "the senator so proposed is to be put to the Senate to the chair without any question being put, and then" be inserted after "President," line 2.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—The standing order seems better than the proposed amendment. At present, a senator when proposed as President expresses his willingness or otherwise to act; but the amendment makes him at once take his place in the chair, from which he has to express his willingness to be elected.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator CLEMONS) proposed—

That the word "and," line 4, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "Being again unanimously called to the chair."

Senator DRAKE.—These amendments are not quite clear to me. What is the meaning of the words "in his place"?

Senator CLEMONS.—In his place in the chair.

Senator DRAKE.—Then we have the words now proposed "being again unanimously called to the Chair." Do these words refer to the time when the senator is in the Chair? The meaning usually attached to a standing order of this kind is that a senator so circumstanced shall speak from his ordinary place from which he is called to the Chair; but according to the amendment he is taken to the Chair, and then unanimously called to the Chair again.

The CHAIRMAN.—I understand that Senator Clemons is desirous of adopting the South Australian standing orders relating to this matter. These standing orders are—

9. If only one member be proposed and seconded as Speaker he shall be called to the chair of the House without any question being put.

10. Such member on being called to the chair shall stand up in his place and express his sense of the honour proposed to be conferred on him and submit himself to the House.

11. Being again unanimously called to the chair he shall be conducted from his seat to the chair by the members who proposed and seconded him.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The Standing Orders Committee had before them the standing orders of the South Australian and other Legislatures, and they adopted in this instance those of the Victorian Legislative Council, because the latter are short and quite as much to the point as any of the others. I am afraid that we have made a mess of the matter.

Senator DRAKE.—The amendments of Senator Clemons do not follow the wording of the South Australian standing orders, but make the chosen senator express from the Chair his sense of the honour which is to be bestowed upon him. The South Australian standing orders make the senator speak from his usual place in the House.

Senator CLEMONS.—I wish to have the South Australian standing orders.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—An attempt to make three standing orders of South Australia into one standing order has not had quite such a clear result as one might desire. I see no necessity for the second amendment which is now before the committee.

Senator CLEMONS.—I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The object of the Standing Orders Committee was to enable the Senate to ascertain that a senator proposed was willing to accept the office, and Senator Clemons' amendment, which has been carried, makes a further amendment necessary. I move—

That after the word "then," line 4, the words "if he accepts office" be inserted.

Senator DRAKE.—I am quite convinced that the standing order will have to be re-committed.

The CHAIRMAN.—I must point out to Senator Higgs that the amendment which he has suggested is not in order.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 19 to 23 agreed to.

Standing Order 24 verbally amended and agreed to.

Standing Order 25—

Before proceeding to any business, the President, with such senators as desire to accompany him, shall present himself to His Excellency the Governor-General as the choice of the Senate. He shall in the name, and on behalf of the Senate, claim the right of free and direct access and communication with His Excellency.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—Before we leave this chapter, I point out that so far I have been unable to find any standing order which provides for filling a vacancy in the Presidency, occurring either during a session or during a recess. I am not prepared to submit any standing orders for the purpose, but I think there should be some such standing order. The standing orders of South Australia, under which we have been working, have been held up to us as a model, but in this matter it is not proposed to adopt them. Standing Order 23, of the South Australian standing orders, provides for filling a vacancy in the Speakership occurring during either a session or recess.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER. —The honorable and learned senator will see that Standing Order 17 says "Whenever the office of President becomes vacant."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I

That the words "He shall, in the name of the Senate, claim the right of direct access and communication with His Excellency," be omitted, with a view to inserting in lieu thereof the words—"He shall, in the name and on behalf of the Senate, lay claim to the undoubted rights and privileges, and propose the most favourable construction may be put upon all their proceedings."

I am suggesting the form of the Queensland standing orders, and it also follows the form indicated by the Postmaster-General in his opening remarks.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The old words were dropped from because they are a survival of a procedure which has come down to us from the time of the Tudors and when the Speaker of the House of Commons claimed from the Crown certain rights and privileges. They included the right of being exempt from the common law of libel—the right of free speech—the right of being exempt from arrest, and the right of free and direct communication with the Crown, a prayer that the most favourable construction should be placed upon its proceedings. The use of the words has been continued by our legislatures down to the present time, but they now involve the ridiculous absurdity of the President or the Speaker claiming the Crown rights which the Crown cannot grant, and the Crown solemnly granting those rights. Is it not time we should ask that? What right has the Crown to arrogate the common law? Under the 49th of the Constitution we have powers, immunities and privileges of the British House of Commons, and it is that section of our Constitution that is exempt from the law of libel and from arrest while attending Parliament. It seems to me that we should amend our procedure to existing circumstances and we should not ask His Excellency to grant us that which he cannot grant, and leave him to propose that which we know he cannot do. The question received a great deal of consideration in Canada, and a pamphlet written by a clerk of one of the Dominion Houses proposed the whole absurdity. I think that we should ask the Governor-General for something which we know he cannot grant, and not for something which we cannot grant.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—It must, I think, have come as a shock to the many supporters of Senator Higgs to find him proposing such an amendment after his bold declarations of conservatism. I hope that his action is a temporary lapse on his part, and that he has set himself right by withdrawing the amendment.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I was not under the impression that I was in any way changing my views. It was with the object of obtaining the rights and privileges of the Governor-General that I moved the amendment. It is to me that if there was any choice between the two expressions, to ask "the right of free and direct access and communication with His Excellency" was placing our President in a more and undignified position than if we were to go to the Governor-General and inform him that we claimed undoubted rights and privileges."

But if we are to have any form of communication with His Excellency, I think it is better than the one now proposed.

If at any time any Governor-General were so injudicious as to refuse to receive our President there would probably be a question of the right of free and direct access, and I have no doubt we would be in a position to meet such a contingency if it should ever arise. It is in the old expression a reminder of the tradition which I think we should do well to hold; the tradition that the Parliament of the people is above all its officers, whether King or Governor-General. The suggestion is to be preferred to a resolution that the Governor-General will be obliged to receive our President any time it is necessary for him to call.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I am going back to the origin of this form, and I will see that it is a perfect farce even if it comes from the Governor-General what it is proposed to ask from him here. The amendment originated at a time when the King had no power in the House of Commons, and it was necessary that the election of a Speaker of the House of Commons should be confirmed by the King. The Speaker was then practically the King's President in the House of Commons, and the King had a right to veto his appointment. We have now come to a state of things in which we do not require the consent of the King or his Vice-Regent, and the whole thing has become a useless form from beginning to end. In my opinion there is no necessity for this or the preceding standing order. However, it seems to me that Senator Higgs is right in proposing that, if we should claim anything, it should be something that sounds well, like our "undoubted rights and privileges," rather than that we should go crawling to the Governor-General and claim the right of free and direct access and communication, which every gentleman would give us under any circumstances, without asking for it. If we must do this kind of thing, let it be done in the old style, and let it be understood that it is a relic of the past, and has only this significance, that it shows how far we have advanced. It will perhaps attract the attention of our children, and when they ask the reasons for it we shall be able to say—"Read up history and you will find how wonderfully we have advanced in democracy." The proposed form is exceedingly childish, and I should like to know the honorable senator who suggested it. I think he ought to be ashamed to argue the matter. We might very well go to the Governor-General and present our President to him, saying—"This is the gentleman whom we have elected to preside over our deliberations," but we should ask him for nothing. If Senator Higgs will withdraw his amendment, I shall move the omission of the last four lines.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the words, "He shall, in the name and on behalf of the Senate, claim the right of free and direct access and communication with His Excellency," be omitted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The phrase has been used that we are to go "crawling" to His Excellency to demand a certain thing. Is it not better to go crawling to His Excellency to demand something which he can grant, than to demand something which he cannot grant? I do not mind if all the words are omitted. I do not think that there is very much in them. I never thought that there was, but the reason for demanding the right of free access to His Excellency is that we have had Ministers of the Crown gradually usurping all power, and claiming rights and positions as against Parliament. In some instances I have known them to want to lay down the rule that communications to His Excellency from Parliament should pass through them.

Senator PLAYFORD.—So they ought.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—They ought not. Parliament ought to have direct and free communication with the representative of the Crown irrespective of the Ministry, and the Ministry ought to be placed in their proper positions—the servants of the House and not the masters. I do not think it will do any harm to strike out the words, and I do not know that it will do much good to retain them. Whether they are retained or omitted, I contend that both Houses must have direct communication with His Excellency, and not through the Ministry.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—The Parliament consists of the King, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. In this standing order the Senate is only asked to say that, as a part of the Parliament, it has the right of free and direct access to the King through his representative. We do not crawl to the Governor-General, as Senator Playford has said, when the President, in the name and on behalf of the Senate, claims the right of free and direct access to and communication with His Excellency. If there is any attempt on the part of the Ministry or any one else to deprive us of this right we can fall back on the standing order.

Standing Order 26—

At the commencement of each session the Senate may appoint a senator to be Chairman of Committees, who, unless otherwise determined, shall hold office during the session, and until the end of the second week of the next session.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I propose to ask the committee to alter this standing order so as to provide that the Chairman of Committees, like the President, shall be elected at the commencement of a new Parliament. In the first place I move—

That the word "session," line 1, be omitted with a view to insert the word "Parliament" in lieu thereof.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (Australia).—Although I am quite in favour with the object of Senator Playford, I would point out again that if the committee strike out the words "new Parliament," and substitute the phrases "new Parliament" and "Parliament," we shall be subordinating our position to the House of Representatives. I object to that. The Senate does not consist of the House of Representatives alone; it consists of the Senate, and the House of Representatives. I think it will be far better to retain the words "so long as he is a senator." I am sure that we shall get into a row about the meaning of the phrase "new Parliament." In South Australia there has been once nearly a conflict between the Houses concerning the meaning of the words "new Parliament." A great difficulty has arisen, and different opinions were expressed. I believe that the committee will make a mistake if it uses the words. I think the amendment will not be pressed, but I suggest that the standing order should be in this form—

The Senate may appoint a senator to be Chairman of Committees, who, unless otherwise determined, shall hold office so long as he is a senator.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That may be.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I trust that Senator Playford will propose an amendment to the effect that the Chairman shall be elected until the next periodical election of senators; or, in other words, for a term of three years.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—In the case of the election of a senator, we have affirmed the principle that the office shall not be held for a period longer than three years, and it will not be inconsistent with that decision if we amend the standing order in its present form.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I think that Senator Playford will agree to the suggestion made by Senator Walker.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—I am quite willing to accept an amendment which will provide that the Chairman shall be elected for three years. I do not agree with Senator Baker in his contention that the words "new Parliament" will cause trouble between the Houses, or give up any rights or privileges. I have no recollection of any trouble arising between the Houses.

ralia from the use of the words. If it existed it must have existed before I ed Parliament in 1868. The words Parliament are always used in that , and we know exactly what they . They are also used in the other s. However, if my object can be nplished by using other words, I am willing to withdraw my amendment. Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I would st to Senator Walker that the stand- order should be framed in this form—the commencement of a session, after a ical or general election of the Senate, or ver any vacancy shall occur, the Senate appoint a senator to be Chairman of Com- es until the next periodical or general elec- of the Senate whichever first occurs, pro- that he still remains a senator.

Amendments (by Senator WALKER) agreed at the word "each" be omitted with the to insert in lieu thereof the word "a;" after the word "session," line 1, the fol- g words be inserted:—"after each periodi- cal or general election of the Senate or whenever a vacancy shall occur."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I beg to

at the word "may," line 2, be omitted, with y to insert the word "shall" in lieu thereof.

ve this amendment for the reason that necessary that a Chairman of Com- es shall be appointed. At the com- mencement of the last session there was an that the President might do the whole e work, and that a Chairman of Com- es would not be necessary. I now think that idea is a mistake. But unless we itute the word "shall" for "may" the te might at some time be able to evade ntention of this standing order, which that at the commencement of a session a periodical or general election a rman shall be elected.

Senator DRAKE.—They could get rid of standing order if they wished to do so; cannot bind any future Senate.

Senator HIGGS.—I think the amend- ought to be made.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We may at some have a President who will be willing the double duty.

Senator HIGGS.—Surely honorable sena- do not anticipate such a period of calm, dering that we have started as strongly have done, and that our troubles are y to be multiplied as time goes on.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Aus- tralia).—I am sorry to find myself so often opposed to my honorable friend Senator Higgs. But I think it reasonable to suppose a state of affairs when a Chairman of Committees may not be needed. Suppose something happens to induce a Chairman to resign before the end of a session, when there is little or no business to be done. It would be unreasonable then to put the Senate in the position of having to appoint a Chair- man. The word "may" is preferable to the word "shall" until we are quite sure that we shall always require a Chairman; and if we need a Chairman, the word "may" will not prevent his election.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Honor- able senators seem to have lost sight of their main object in proposing the alteration of this standing order in the first place. They propose that the words "after a periodical or general election" shall be in- serted, in order that we may define the term of office of the Chairman of Committees. If honorable senators do not alter the word "may" to "shall," it will be quite possible for any Senate in the future to refrain from electing a fresh Chairman.

Senator PLAYFORD.—If they wish to do so, why should they not? Why dictate to persons who come after us?

Senator HIGGS.—But if we do not alter the word "may," we shall have to put in something indicating the term of office of the Chairman of Committees. If that is proposed to be done well and good; but it can be done in a simpler way by using fewer words.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I would point out that it is absolutely necessary that we should have a Chairman of Commit- tees, because later on a certain procedure is provided with regard to the Deputy Presi- dent, who must be the Chairman of Commit- tees for the time being. Therefore the word "shall" ought to be inserted.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (by Senator WALKER) agreed to—

That the words "during the session, and until the end of the second week of the next session" be omitted, and that the following words be in- serted in lieu thereof:—"Until the next periodical or general election of the Senate, whichever first occurs, provided he so long remains a senator."

Standing Order 31 (President relieved by Deputy President).

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—At the end of this standing order we have the words—"when requested to do so by the Chairman of Committees." The standing order only provides that one of the deputy-chairmen may take the Chair at the request of the Chairman of Committees. But he may be ill, or absent from any other cause, so that he cannot request any one else to take the Chair for him. To meet such a case, I move—

That the following words be added—"or when the Chairman of Committees is absent."

Standing Order 33—

A Standing Orders Committee, to consist of the President and Chairman of Committees and seven senators, shall be appointed at the commencement of each session, with power to act during recess, and to confer with a similar committee of the House of Representatives.

Senator DRAKE.—With regard to this and the following standing orders, I wish to know whether the Standing Orders Committee have taken into consideration the number of the senators constituting the various committees? I suppose that the numbers will be similar to those on corresponding committees of the House of Representatives. It is here provided that the Standing Orders Committee shall consist of nine senators, the Library Committee of seven, the House Committee of seven, and the Printing Committee of six. I do not know whether there is any reason for fixing various numbers for the various committees, or whether it has been provided that there shall be equality of numbers between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The principle that has guided the Standing Orders Committee in fixing these numbers is this: We have followed the practice of the Senate. The Senate appointed a Standing Order Committee consisting of the number of members mentioned in this standing order, and we have followed that practice. There is no particular charm in any particular number, but we consider that we ought to follow the practice laid down by the Senate itself.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I am glad to have heard that expression of opinion. The whole value of this word "practice" lies in the one fact that in the first session of the first Parliament the Ministry made certain appointments to committees. That is all the point, and it is easy to deduce the value of the number. The Postmaster-General has asked a very pertinent question, which should be answered by the senator in charge of the business of the committee; and I understand that these are Government proposals. In reply to that question, I have heard that there is no reason why the number of senators on these committees should not be different, except that they have been so appointed in the first session of this Parliament. I hope the Postmaster-General will take steps to have the matter made uniform.

Senator DRAKE.—There is no reason why there should not be a difference.

Senator CLEMONS.—We may as well say that there is good reason for having a different number. In relation to one committee, not one of the committees before the Senate, the Postmaster-General took very decided ground, and the great argument then used was that each State should have one representative. But the Postmaster-General is withdrawing the argument now, when it is clearly applicable, if applicable at all.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I trust that the Postmaster-General will see that the number of senators on each committee, which, in my opinion, should consist of the President and one representative from each State, is that idea I move—

That the word "seven," line 2, be omitted, and in lieu thereof the word "one" be inserted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I trust that the committee will not be made too small, because as it is much trouble in getting a quorum, another reason is that if the number be too small it will not correspond with the number of members of the similar committee of the House of Representatives, with which it is given to confer.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—I hope the amendment will be pressed. This is a very important committee, the members of which should be sufficiently numerous to insure even a bare quorum. No doubt the Standing Orders Committee had good reason for suggesting the number as it appeared in the draft before us. If the number of members be made smaller, the President man of Committees, in spite of doing best, might not be able to get a quorum her.

Senator WALKER.—I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Order 34 (Library Committee).

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—As to uniformity of numbers, we were told special circumstances attached to the Printing Orders Committee. I do not object to that argument, but in regard to the Library Committee, the House Committee, the Printing Committee no claim can be made for differentiation. On the Library and House committees we have the President and six senators, but the Printing Committee for some reason is bereft of the services of the President. I should like to make all the committees alike, and I fully confess I do not care whether that be done by eliminating the President from the House Committee and the Library Committee, or by adding him to the Printing Committee. If the honorable senator in charge of the proposals before the Senate will give some indication of his views, it might cause me to move or refrain from moving an amendment.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not attach any importance whatever to uniformity in the number of the number of senators on the committees. What is of importance is that the corresponding committees in both Houses shall have the same number; and that is the reason I asked the question to which Senator Clemons has referred. To me it appears a matter of indifference whether there are six or seven senators on any one of these committees, but I am rather inclined to the former number, owing to the difficulty of getting a quorum. I do not know whether at his own desire that the President is on the Printing Committee, but if it is not, I think he should be asked to serve. It is a very important committee, to which I shall draw attention at the proper Printing Committee, to consist of six members, shall be appointed . . .

Senator DRAKE.—I think it highly desirable that the President, if he can afford the time, should be a member of this committee, and, further, I suggest that the committee should have power to sit as a joint committee, in order that there may be uniform action in regard to the printing of papers.

The CHAIRMAN.—I desire to draw attention to the fact that there are at present seven members on the Printing Committee without the President.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I hope that the President will not be placed on the Printing Committee, because I have a great deal of work in connexion with the other committees of which I am a member. I may point out that the Speaker is not on the Printing Committee of the House of Representatives, and I have never known a Speaker or President occupy such a position in any of the other States.

Amendment by (Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That the word "six" be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) proposed—

That the following words be added:—"The committee shall have power to confer or sit as a joint committee with a similar committee of the House of Representatives."

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—Is this committee not to be at liberty, in the same way as other committees, to act during recess?

Senator DRAKE.—The Printing Committee hardly requires to act during recess.

Senator WALKER.—That may be doubted, because there are useful public documents which honorable senators might like to have occasionally.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—It is not the practice, nor is it necessary, for the Printing Committee to meet during recess. I was a member of the Printing Committee of the South Australian Parliament for years, and the rule was to meet before the close of the session, and decide on what papers we would recommend to have printed. I support the amendment, because a provision to that effect has been found extremely useful in the past.

Senator DRAKE.—Originally this standing order gave power to the committee to inquire into and report upon questions of disputed elections, but that power has been withdrawn, that being a matter for the new court under the Electoral Act. The committee will report as to the qualifications of senators chosen or appointed, a matter which does not appear to come within the Electoral Act.

Standing Order 47 (Leave of absence may be given).

Senator DRAKE.—There may be some good reason for providing that a motion asking leave of absence for an honorable senator should not be debated, but it seems to me that occasions may arise when it will be desirable to ask for some explanation. When an application is made for leave of absence on behalf of a senator some reason must be given, and it seems to me that honorable senators should be allowed, if they choose, to challenge that reason.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—I move—

That the words "and shall not be debated" be omitted.

Leave of absence on behalf of a senator may be asked so frequently that it may be thought desirable that he should be informed that, in the opinion of the Senate, he is not attending to his duties. Under the standing order as proposed, honorable senators are debarred from making a statement in which they could give reasons for voting against a motion asking for leave of absence.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—I think it would be as well to provide for ringing the bells a second time after the Chair is taken, before permitting a senator to move the adjournment of the Senate for want of a quorum. If honorable senators are ordered to stand and hear the bells rung a second time, they will understand that there is not a quorum present and that there is a danger of the Senate being adjourned. Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—Honorable senators will refer to the minutes and notes they will see that there is an omission of novelty about Standing Order 55, and on investigation they will find that the novelty is in the omission of words providing for the ringing of the bells for two minutes.

that the standing order should be read so as to read—

any senator shall take notice, or if the Chairman of Committees on notice being taken any senator shall report to the President that a quorum as aforesaid is not present, the bells shall be rung for two minutes, the President shall then count the Senate, and if a quorum is present shall forthwith adjourn the Senate for the next sitting day.

Senator DRAKE.—Before the honorable member who has proposed any amendment in the form he has suggested, I should like to say that I think what we desire to do is that the bells shall be rung, that the count shall be made before the President is brought in. If that is done the President will very easily be brought into the Chamber quite unnecessarily, and before he takes the Chair our work will have been formed.

CHAIRMAN.—I think honorable members can better carry out what is intended by Senator Drake by an amendment of Standing Order 267, dealing with the taking of the absence of a quorum of the Committee. I fully agree with Senator Drake that it is a waste of time as well as trouble, to bring the President in when we can get a quorum by simply ringing the bells.

Senator DRAKE.—Perhaps it would be the views of honorable senators if the standing order were to read in this way—any senator shall take notice that a quorum as aforesaid is not present, the bells shall be rung for two minutes, and if a quorum is not then the Chairman of Committees shall report the absence of a quorum to the President.

Senator CLEMENS.—I prefer the standing order as I have suggested it.

Senator DRAKE.—But that I think will not carry out the intention of honorable members. It will not prevent the President from being brought in when honorable senators are within reach, and a quorum may be present before the President has time to get into the Chamber.

CHAIRMAN.—The adjournment of the House has given an opportunity to the Postmaster-General and myself to state what we conceive to be the desire of the Committee. I believe that this will carry out the general wish of honorable senators—any senator shall take notice, or if the Chairman of Committees shall report to the President that a quorum as aforesaid is not present, the bells shall be rung for two minutes. The President shall then count the Senate, and if a quorum shall not be present, he shall forthwith adjourn the Senate till the next sitting day.

If that draft of the standing order is accepted, it will involve a corresponding alteration in No. 267, which, it is suggested, shall be made to read as follows—

If notice be taken of the absence of a quorum in the Committee, the Chairman shall count the Committee, and if after the bells have been rung for two minutes, a quorum is not formed, or if it appears on a division (by which division no decision shall be considered to have been arrived at) that a quorum is not present, he shall leave the Chair of the Committee, and the President shall resume the Chair.

Standing Order 91 (Questions on presentation of petition).

Senator DRAKE.—In its special report the Standing Orders Committee has recommended that this standing order should be amended so as to provide that in the case of a petition being presented against a return it shall be referred at once to the Committee of Disputed Returns and Qualifications. It is necessary to make a further amendment. Any petition against the return of a senator is now to be referred to the new tribunal. Consequently the words referring to the matter in this standing order will have to come out.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—No petition against an election can be presented to the Senate. The only petition that can be presented is as to the appointment or choice of a senator or as to his qualifications; and in the draft standing orders laid on the table on the 4th June it is provided that such petitions are to be referred to the Committee on Disputed Returns.

Senator DRAKE.—If the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee assures me that in the document laid on the table the standing order appears as it should be, there is nothing more to be said. But I should have thought that, seeing that petitions against returns are now to be referred to the new tribunal under the Act, it would be necessary to make an alteration.

The CHAIRMAN.—Under the Act a petition against a return goes straight to the High Court, and does not come here at all. We can only deal with cases where there has been an appointment by the Governor in Council, or a choice by a State Parliament.

Senator DRAKE.—This standing order deals with petitions against disputed returns, and we say that they shall be referred at once to the Committee on Disputed Returns.

The CHAIRMAN.—Those returns that do not come under the Electoral Act are dealt with by the Senate. Standing Order 316 says as regards disputed returns that—

Any question against the choice or appointment of a senator which cannot, under the provisions of the Commonwealth Electoral Act, be brought before the Court of Disputed Returns, may be brought before the Senate by petition.

Those words "choice or appointment" have a technical meaning, that is to say, the choice of a State Parliament or an appointment by the Governor in Council as contemplated by the Constitution. They are the only kinds of petitions that can come to us at all, and we have a committee to deal with them. As regards all other petitions against returns, the Electoral Act provides that they shall go to and be decided by the court.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—I must confess that this is somewhat new to me. I certainly understood that petitions were dealt with the question of disputes under the Electoral Act that all petitions of that nature, whether involving a choice or choice on the part of a State Legislature or appointment by a Governor in Council, in the event of the Legislature not meeting in session, were to be referred direct to the court. I think that above all other bodies in the world a committee of Parliament is the least fitting to decide an election. I think concerning which a considerable amount of heat may have been engendered. I think very much that all petitions of that nature are not to be dealt with by the court.

The CHAIRMAN.—It may be a question of session, but we had to provide for the standing orders, in order that they might be received here.

Senator DRAKE.—I quite understand that the new tribunal will not deal with matters concerning returns, but disputes regarding the election of a senator. But if this standing order remains as it is, have it now, a petition may be presented against a return. It may be a petition which ought to be brought before the new tribunal, but we shall have a standing order saying that such a petition shall be brought here and referred at once to the Court of Disputed Returns and Qualifications, whereas only certain petitions are receivable by the Senate. No doubt the President will decide which petitions are not properly receivable.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The Postmaster-General is quite right. If a petition is presented here which ought to be presented to the court, we can have nothing to do with it. We do not refer it on. This standing order must be read in connexion with Standing Order 316, which refers to the Court of Disputed Returns and Qualifications, which can properly be received by the Senate.

Senator DRAKE.—Why can we not deal with this standing order?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I think it is clear enough. This standing order relates to a petition which comes here.

Senator DRAKE.—Why does it not go to the court?

or Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I does say so. The standing orders say what petitions shall be received and they shall be dealt with. Standing Order 91 must be read in connexion with the standing orders. Thus, Standing Order 16 says—

“A question against the choice or appointment of a senator which cannot, under the provisions of the Commonwealth Electoral Act, be referred to the Court of Disputed Returns, shall be brought before the Senate by petition.”

“The standing orders classify the petitions, and if the two standing orders are read together the implication is that only those petitions which are referred to be sent here can be referred. Petitions have no right to be sent here at all.”

or DRAKE.—Why not state that? I have to begin with an implication?

or WALKER (New South Wales).—Frequently petitions are sent to us and we are asked to get them printed for the information of the public. Does this standing order mean that we are not to get petitions printed unless we intend to take subsequent action?

or PLAYFORD.—You ask for the petition to be printed, and say that you are not to take action.

or WALKER.—A petition may be of a public nature, and people may desire to have something about it.

or DRAKE.—The standing order says that a petition is not to be printed unless a senator intends to take action upon it. If a senator who wants to get a petition printed will probably state that he is not to take action. I do not say that he is to deliberately neglect to take action, but I am rather inclined to think that to save his conscience, he may table a petition and even talk upon it; and that presently the time of the Senate will be wasted.

or Sir RICHARD BAKER.—The object of the standing order is to save unnecessary printing.

or Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—There is a question as to whether we ought not to put at the end of this standing order the words “unless by leave of the Senate.” A practice has grown up of leave being given to senators to give notice after business has been called on. I cannot say that it is a good practice, and I am not at all sure that the standing orders ought not to be suspended to enable it to be done. But considering that the standing orders under which we have been acting are merely temporary and provisional, I have not raised an objection to the practice. Unless the words I have mentioned are added, however, I shall in future feel it to be my duty not to allow any one to give notice after business has been called on unless the standing orders are suspended.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I move—

That the following words be added:—“unless by leave of the Senate.”

Cases may arise when it will be necessary for a senator to give notice of motion at the close of a sitting, and some provision should be made to meet such an event. Every senator will, of course, endeavour to give notice at the proper time, but it would be a pity to prevent that step being taken at any other time.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It ought to be said how the leave of the Senate is to be obtained.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—“Leave” means unanimous leave.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—There are cases in which an urgent notice of motion can be explained in a few words, and in my opinion leave ought not to be given without suspension of the standing orders unless under very exceptional circumstances.

Standing Order 120—

If all motions shall not have been disposed of within two hours after the time fixed for the meeting of the Senate, the debate thereon shall be interrupted.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Does this standing order not conflict with Standing Order 59, which provides that the whole discussion on motions for the adjournment of the Senate shall not exceed three hours.

The CHAIRMAN.—Standing Order 120 refers to motions on the notice-paper.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I think that Senator Higgs is right, and that the difference between the two classes of motion ought to be shown.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to.

That the words "except motions for adjournment under Standing Order 39" be inserted after the word "motions," line 1.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 121 to 127 agreed to.

Standing Order 128—

Leave of Senate must be granted without any dissentient voice.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Is this not giving too much power to one senator, who, because he happens to be in a bad temper or has an impaired digestion may feel disposed to refuse leave? I have myself suffered from a similar standing order, and I should like to submit an amendment to the effect that the majority of the senators present, or at least two-thirds of those present, have power to give leave.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Senator Higgs has overlooked the fact, that when leave is asked for, it is for something which as a rule is contrary to the standing orders. We make standing orders in order that the public business may be properly regulated, and leave to do something which is not in accordance with the standing orders ought to be unanimously given, or otherwise we shall get into difficulties. How should we find out whether one-third of those present objected without taking a division every time? The granting of leave in the manner proposed in the standing orders is the rule in the British House of Parliament, and in every legislative body with which I have acquaintance.

The CHAIRMAN.—I urge Senator Higgs not to persist with an amendment in the direction he indicates, because it will be a very dangerous course to adopt. The word "leave" has almost a traditional meaning in Parliament, and is recognised by authority to mean unanimous leave. Moreover, Senator Higgs will only create greater difficulty for himself if he insists on this two-thirds majority. By Standing Order 438 it is provided that the standing or sessional orders may be suspended on motion without notice, provided that the motion is carried by an absolute majority of the whole number of senators. As Senator Baker has properly pointed out, leave is generally asked for something which is contrary to the standing orders, is desired to bring forward a matter of importance, and one or two or half objections are raised, the standing order may be suspended by nineteen senators.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 129 to 132 agreed to.

Standing Order 133—

An amendment proposed but not carried. It will not be entertained by the Senate nor entered in the journals.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I like to have a definition of the word "journals." If the word means Votes and Proceedings of the Senate, I have no objection to the standing order.

The CHAIRMAN.—The senator will find, on reference to Standing Order 39, that all proceedings are noted by the Clerk, "and shall be entered in the Journals of the Senate."

Senator HIGGS.—I was thinking of the Hansard. That publication has been described as a book, and if it were included under the word "journals," I thought it might be possible that on some occasion I might move an amendment which I could not get a seconder, and there would be no record of it in the Hansard.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 134 to 145 agreed to.

Standing Order 146—

If the Senate resolves the previous question in the affirmative, thereby resolving the original question be not now put, the question and any amendment thereon to the Senate are thereby disposed of, and the Senate shall proceed with the next business on the paper.

The CHAIRMAN.—I think the previous standing order is somewhat inconsistent with Standing Order 148, which provides that—

The previous question cannot be moved on an amendment, nor can an amendment be moved thereto.

I believe it is recognised by all that the previous question cannot be moved as against an amendment, and Standing Order 146 appears to me to be inconsistent in providing that if the Senate resolves the previous question in the affirmative, the original question "and any amendment thereon" are thereby disposed of as a matter of fact, whilst there is an amendment before the Senate, I do not think it competent for the previous question to be moved at all. I shall be glad to hear the views of the President upon the matter.

ing what I have said to be, as I see it is, the undoubted parliamentary practice, we should amend Standing Order 146 in order to make it conform to the general parliamentary practice set forth in Standing Order 148.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It does not appear to me that we necessarily conform to the general parliamentary practice. What we should do is make our standing orders conform to the practice of the Senate; but I do not think the Chairman is right in his contention. I see no inconsistency between Standing Order 146 and Standing Order 148. Standing Order 146 simply affirms that the usual question may be moved whether there is an amendment before the Chair or not. For instance, some honorable senator moves a motion, and another moves an amendment upon it; the previous question is then moved to dispose of both, and decided, it sweeps away the whole question. Whatever the procedure may be in other places, that seems to me to be consistent. Standing Order 148 deals with the matter altogether—the previous question cannot be moved to an amendment. That is not the point. We cannot move the previous question to an amendment, but we can move it to the original motion, if carried, it sweeps away both the original motion and the amendment. There are three propositions in Standing Order 148: the previous question cannot be moved to an amendment, that it cannot be moved to the committee, and that an amendment cannot be moved thereto, and while they are consistent with each other, I think none of them are inconsistent with Standing Order 146.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I point out that if an honorable senator wishes to move the previous question regarding an amendment thereon, he can do it by moving the previous question on the original question. I remember that the chapter dealing with the previous question occupied a good deal of time before the Standing Orders Committee, and a great deal of care was taken by the President in drawing up these standing orders.

The CHAIRMAN.—I have just drawn attention of honorable senators to the fact that if they desire to make what I claim is an innovation I am perfectly satisfied. Standing Order 147 to 159 agreed to.

Standing Order 160—

The President or the Chairman of Committees may vote by stating to the Senate or to the Committee whether they vote with the "Ayes" or with the "Noes."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—Although this practice was laid down by the Senate a little time ago, I still think it is a practice to which many take exception. I move—

That the words "when in the Chair" be inserted after the word "may," line 1.

That will set at rest the question whether the occupant of the Chair should be allowed to evade the responsibility of sitting on one side or the other. The practice which has been allowed to grow up in the Senate is an innovation. I know that in the Queensland Parliament, when the Speaker is not in the Chair, and wishes to vote, he takes his place on the side either of the "Ayes" or the "Noes." I think that the President of the Senate, whoever he may be, might as well conform to the general usage, especially as the practice adopted here during the last 12 months is taken exception to.

Senator DRAKE.—I should like to hear the opinion of honorable senators on the subject. It is not an important one, but I cannot see that any disadvantage results from the practice of allowing the President to remain in the Chair, and signify that he desires to vote upon one side or the other. The instance quoted by Senator Higgs does not seem to me to be quite conclusive. That might be the practice in some Chambers which are differently constructed, and where it might be more convenient.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I am inclined to agree with Senator Higgs. I myself had an experience of rather an unpleasant nature in connexion with this practice. On one occasion during a division I was not satisfied as to how the President was voting, and I said to the teller—"Have you asked the President how he is voting?" The teller was simply angry with me. That is the only time I have ever had any unpleasantness in this Chamber. I think that the President should be asked to sit either on one side or the other of the Chamber during a division, if he is not in the Chair.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The matter is one which can be decided without any reference to what has happened in the past. It is undoubtedly an inconvenience to a teller when an honorable senator sits with the "Ayes" and votes with the "Noes." The teller may or may not hear the "aye" or the "no" of the President when the question is put, and when the seats on either side are of equal comfort I do not see why the President, when voting, should not sit upon one side or the other.

Senator GLASSEY (Queensland).—It seems to me that honorable senators are far too straight-laced in keeping up old customs and old forms. The standing order provides merely for a courtesy, which might very well be extended to the President and the Chairman of Committees. If the President is sitting in the seat which he finds most convenient, it is surely no hardship upon a teller to require him to say—"Well, Mr. President, on which side do you propose to vote." We ought not to be bound by an old custom which I dare say has operated very well in the past. Occasionally we must depart from old customs. I am rather surprised to see Senator Walker, who is generally in favour of preserving old forms, agreeing with Senator Higgs in this matter. I thought last session that this courtesy should be extended to the President and to the Chairman of Committees, and if a division is called for I shall vote in that direction.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—We ought to be consistent in framing our standing orders. When we are devising a system of voting, I do not see why a particular senator should be given a privilege which is denied to others. In a committee of the whole it is no more undignified for the President to cross the floor than for any other senator to do so. If it is not thought worth while to adopt a general rule, let every senator have the right to remain in his seat and vote as he chooses. Of course it will give additional work to the tellers, and, if any confusion should result, it can only be ascribed to our desire to uphold the dignity of senators.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—It amused me to hear Senator Glassey suggest that Senator Walker, as a good old conservative, should follow the good old plan when he is actually following it. In the only other Parliament of which I have had any knowledge, the rule was for the Speaker or the President when the House was in committee to pass to the side of the "Ayes" or the side of the "Noes," and thus indicate on which side he was voting. Another practice has sprung up in the Senate—we know how. It caused a considerable amount of trouble last session. From that time in which the President was sitting I did not know which way he was voting, and now it is proposed to extend the privilege to the Chairman of Committees. If the President and the Chairman are allowed to sit on the side of the "Noes" and to vote on the side of the "Ayes," we shall not know where we are. It is no trouble or annoyance to the President exactly in the same way as other honorable senators do. Of course when either is sitting in the Chair it is only fair that he should be allowed to indicate in what way he desires to vote.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 161 and 162 agreed to.

Standing Order 163—

No senator shall be entitled to vote in a division unless he was present within the Chamber when the question was put, with the doors closed, and the vote of any senator not so present shall be disallowed.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland) move—

That the words "he was," line 2, be deleted, and the word "is" be substituted for "was," line 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 164 and 165 agreed to.

Standing Order 166—

The doors shall be closed and locked after the lapse of two minutes as the President shall think proper to direct; and then no senator shall enter or leave the Chamber until division.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—We propose to amend this standing order, because it gives too much power to the President. It will allow him to say—"We shall have a division for some time." We propose to provide definitely that the doors shall be locked after the lapse of two minutes. In Queensland the bells are rung for five minutes, the doors are then locked, and the option is given to the presiding officer to delay the taking of the division.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In South Australia a similar rule has never caused any trouble. The doors have always been locked at the expiration of the two minutes.

Senator HIGGS.—In the Senate the doors have always been locked at the expiration of the two minutes, and therefore necessary to retain the words which option to the President. I move—the words “as soon,” line 1, be omitted. Mr. PEARCE (Western Australia). On this occasion I have to disagree with Mr. Higgs. Some person must give the attendants to lock the doors. They must not be allowed to be the judges when the two minutes have elapsed. The order simply means that the speaker shall direct the attendants to lock the doors. Mr. PLAYFORD.—It is a great deal better to leave the standing order as it is, than to say that just as the time is up a senator is entering the Chamber. The amendment is negatived. The Standing Order agreed to. The Standing Orders 167 to 169 agreed to. The Standing Order 170 verbally amended, and the Standing Orders 171 to 176 agreed to. The session reported. The Senate adjourned at 8.58 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 10 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read the prayers.

GOVERNORS: IMPERIAL NAVAL SUBSIDY.

Mr. ROUGH.—I desire to know from the Minister if his attention has been drawn to the fact that Sir George Clarke, of Victoria, is delivering an address on the Imperial Naval Subsidy. I noticed that several of the State Governors, particularly those of Victoria, New South Wales, Western Australia, and South Australia, have been prominently advocating the Imperial policy in this direction. Will he cause a communication to be sent to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the principal of these Imperial agents, that the State Governors shall be allowed to intermeddle with Federal matters?

Mr. EDMUND BARTON.—I have the title of Sir George Clarke's lecture, and I know from what I read that some of the Governors of the States who are naval and military experts are in favour of the policy proposed; but as at present advised I do not intend to make any such communication as the honorable and learned member suggests.

ELECTORAL ACT ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. McCOLL.—I wish to know from the Minister for Home Affairs if he has received any complaints from the country districts about the inefficient manner in which the rolls have been compiled. Such complaints have come under my notice, and I would like to read the following letter which I have received on the subject:—

Dear Sir,—I see by the papers that the list of names of voters for the Federal Parliament has been completed. If that is so, then the list is not correct, because there was never any one round this district to collect the females names, consequently they will all be omitted. I think the females up this way have as much right to have a vote as those in the towns. Perhaps you could make inquiries as to the reason that the names were never collected here.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No complaints have been received, but inquiry will be made into the matter. The rolls were collected under an arrangement with the State Government of Victoria, by which the police were employed to do the work, and were paid a certain sum per diem by the Commonwealth, the detailed arrangements being left to them.

BONUS ON COFFEE.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I wish to know from the Minister for Trade and Customs if it is his intention to take steps to give effect to the petition of the Cairns Coffee Growers' Association in reference to the granting of a bonus for coffee grown in Australia?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The honorable member had better give notice of his question. I do not think that it will be the policy of the Government, in the present session, at any rate, to propose a bonus upon coffee.

INTER-STATE FREE-TRADE.

Sir JOHN QUICK asked the Minister for Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Has Inter-State free-trade, as required by law, been thoroughly established?
2. Is there any truth in the statement contained in a letter published in the Bendigo newspapers on the 8th inst., that “owing to impossible regulations and tyrannical abuse of necessary statutory powers by the Minister for Customs, free intercourse between the States has been rendered impossible?”

3. Have any complaints to the foregoing effect been received by the Minister since the adoption of simplified forms of Inter-State certificates?

4. What particulars must be filled in as regards an Inter-State certificate to enable a merchant or storekeeper to transfer goods from one State to another?

5. Is it difficult or impossible for an ordinary merchant or country storekeeper to obtain and fill in those particulars?

Mr. KINGSTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes, so far as permitted by the Constitution. Inter-State trade with Western Australia will not be free till 8th October, 1906; the provisions of section 92 requiring, for two years from 8th October, 1901, the payment on goods imported before that date subsequent to Inter-State transfer of the federal duty, less any duty previously paid, and the requirements of the bookkeeping clauses impose some difficulties on freedom of transfer, which it would be desirable to remove if possible. As to collections under section 92, they are so very small that the Government are endeavouring to arrange for their cesser at the end of the present financial year, instead of the 8th October, 1903; but this will necessitate the consent of all the States, which is now being sought.

2. I have not seen the letter referred to, but the statement quoted is without foundation.

3. Not that I am aware of since the simplified forms were adopted.

4. The following particulars for dutiable goods are required:—

Whether bond or duty paid. Marks and numbers. Description of goods. Country or State of origin. Estimated value or quantity at time of transfer. Estimated value or quantity of dutiable goods at time of transfer. As to whether goods were imported before or after the 8th October, 1901.

The particulars are even simpler for free goods.

5. No; the particulars are simple, and the forms, when not otherwise procurable, are supplied gratis by the Department.

PROPOSED NAVAL AGREEMENT.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. In the event of the passage of the Imperial Naval Subsidy proposals, has he made any, and, if so what, arrangement with the British Government as to its taking over the officers and men engaged in the State vessels?

2. If no such arrangement has been made, what provision does he propose to make for these officers and men?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Imperial Government has undertaken to provide for existing officers in the new arrangement as far as it is practicable.

2. The position of officers will not, in any case, be injuriously affected during the financial year beginning 1st July next.

TELEGRAPHIC DELAYS.

Mr. KIRWAN asked the Minister presenting the Postmaster-General's notice—

1. Whether the attention of the Postmaster-General has been drawn to the frequent interruptions of business on the overland telegraph between Port Augusta and Perth?

2. Whether the interruptions invariably occur in South Australian territory?

3. Whether the interruptions are due to climatic influences by reason of the proximity of the line to the sea in various places in Australia?

4. Whether, as the Western Australian Government before federation erected a telegraph line to remove the cause of the interruptions, the Federal Government propose similar action to obviate the interruptions in South Australia?

5. Whether, pending the completion of necessary work to prevent the interruptions, there is any means under consideration for temporarily overcoming the delays and inconveniences to telegraphic business in Western Australia and the other States of the Commonwealth?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The attention of the Postmaster-General has been drawn to interruptions and delays in business between Port Augusta and Perth.

2. The Postmaster-General is not aware of the interruptions or delays invariably occurring in South Australian territory.

3. There is no information as to the cause of all interruptions and delays, but a return has been asked for for the last twelve months, showing the number of delays or interruptions, the time thereof, and also the locality, when it is possible to ascertain it.

4. The Western Australian Government before federation erected a line inland via Eucla and Coolgardie, and the Federal Government has since then and have for some time been, taking steps to obviate interruptions in South Australia by providing an additional copper wire via Yancha. This line the Deputy Postmaster-General for South Australia, reports that it will be distant from the coast till it reaches the west end of Strathgordon and thence to Eucla it will keep, for the most part, well inland. When this additional line is completed, the Department will be well equipped with the additional business due to reduced telegraph rates. The coast wire between Lincoln will also assist when not occupied by local traffic. Action has been taken to strengthen the operating staff at Eucla.

5. The practicability of making some special arrangement is receiving consideration.

TELEPHONE OPERATORS' OVERTIME.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Minister presenting the Postmaster-General's notice—

1. Is it proposed to pay overtime for extra work to telephone switch operators?

such overtime to count in the case of re operators from 1st January last, and case of Geelong operators from 1st June
 hat is the reason for this distinction ?

EDMUND BARTON.—The answers
 e honorable and learned member's

CONROY (Werriwa).—I would out to honorable members that the ne second reading of which we are eing asked to allow to-morrow, is not ng for leave to read Bills upon certain to the old position of affairs, when we

 House is at present discussing the Judiciary Bill—a measure whose provisions are fraught with great importance to the whole Commonwealth, and are to be criticised without party bias. That being so, I submit that we should not suddenly be asked to deal with other matters. It will be soon enough to deal with the abolition of the rebate of the excise duty upon sugar next week.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—All I intend to do is to make my second reading speech tomorrow and then adjourn the debate, so that honorable members may have an opportunity of studying the figures which I shall put before them.

Mr. CONROY.—I submit that we should not be asked to consider the Bill at all at the present time. When a second reading explanation is made by a Minister, and the debate adjourned, his speech is often quite forgotten by honorable members upon the resumption of the discussion. I raise my voice against the consideration of other matters while we are engaged upon an important Bill. Of course, if it is the wish of the House that the Bill to provide for the rebate of the excise duty upon sugar be taken to-morrow, there is no more to be said, because one man cannot oppose the will of the whole Chamber ; but I am of opinion that we should not be asked to read this Bill to-morrow.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—The course which has been taken in the past, and which it is intended to pursue on the present occasion, is one which is followed to meet the convenience of honorable members, and will conduce to the proper conduct of business.
 If it were a rule that no Bill should be introduced or read a second time until some other measure upon which the House was engaged was finally disposed of, as a cry is invariably raised for the postponement of the discussion after the second reading speech of the Minister in charge, there would be no other course open to the House, whenever such a postponement was agreed to, but to adjourn for some days. It is a far better practice, when it is intended that the main debate upon a Bill shall not take place for some days, for an explanation of its provisions to be given by the Minister in charge of it on the motion for the second reading, and its further consideration deferred, so that honorable members may have an opportunity of studying it in the light of the Minister's remarks. That is what is intended in this case, and I am sure that the proposal will meet with the concurrence of the House.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—Are we to understand that the Treasurer having moved the second reading of the Bill, the debate will be adjourned?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Certainly.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

JUDICIARY BILL.

In Committee :

Resolved (on motion by Mr. DEAKIN)—

That it is expedient that an appropriation of revenue be made for the purposes of a Bill for an Act to make provision for the exercise of the judicial power of the Commonwealth.

SUGAR BONUS BILL.

In Committee :

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) proposed—

That it is expedient that an appropriation of revenue be made for the purposes of a Bill for an Act to provide a bonus to growers of sugar cane and beet.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—It seems a very back-handed way of going about their business for the Government to ask for an appropriation for the purposes of a Bill which has not yet been placed before us. It may be that after the consideration of the Bill we shall be prepared to appropriate a certain sum of money, but I think the House out of regard for itself ought to insist upon an alteration of the present method of procedure. I am aware that we are following a precedent that has been set for some time past, and therefore I do not intend to raise any further objection at the present stage ; but I ask the Government to avoid following any further the present loose method of procedure, which is not in accordance with the best political practice, and to refrain from asking honorable members to make an appropriation before we know the full extent of the expenditure involved.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution reported ; report adopted.

Bill presented (by Sir GEORGE TURNER), and read a first time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—In moving—

That the second reading be made an order of the day for to-morrow,

I may mention that it is intended to follow the same course in regard to this Bill as was indicated in connexion with the Bill to provide for the abolition of the rebate on excise duty on sugar.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

JUDICIARY BILL.

Debate resumed from 9th June (page 653), on motion by Mr. DEAKIN.

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—Although in connexion with this Bill it may not be possible for one to say anything that is very new, or to submit any argument in a more convincing manner than has been adopted by previous speakers, the importance and the far-reaching effects of the measure are such that no honorable member need make any apology for addressing the House on this occasion. I must confess that when I listened yesterday, as I did last session, to the lofty description of the Attorney-General of the Court that he hopes to call into existence, I was to a certain extent carried away. He described a court whose decisions would always be right and just, which would give the complete confidence and secure the complete happiness of the people of Australia, and which would do everything for our benefit—a court which, although it would be subject to having its decisions referred to the Privy Council in all but a limited number of cases, would nevertheless deal with all matters coming under its consideration so faithfully that all we should know of the Privy Council would be conveyed to us by the faint clapping of distant hands and the faint cheering of distant voices, accompanying the communication of the Judicial Council from the seas—"Well done thou good and faithful servant." The description given by the Attorney-General made me think of "Light that never was on sea or land" and it also carried my mind back to Mark Twain's description of Fenimore Cooper's celebrated Leather Stocking Indians as "an extinct tribe of Indians who had never existed." Notwithstanding the explanation of the Attorney-General of the high character of the British tribunal, it can hardly be supposed that if the Court is to be as good even as the best of it will attain to that state of perfection suggested by him as not only possible but probable. He told us that if the Bill were altered to provide for any other kind that proposed, the responsibility at with us, and that he would then hands of the evil and pernicious consequences that would inevitably follow. I wish to suggest that we cannot in Australia a High Court regard to the intellectual calibre character for integrity and im- of the men who would com- would not be capable of ful- many of our aspirations, and command the respect of British- communities in general, and of ns in particular. Granting that the Judges are obtainable, such a court constituted only if the conditions rich these desirable results might ed were in existence, and I regret at, so long as the provisions of the ion with regard to the Judiciary they are, we can never hope to High Court, whether as a final or al court of appeal for Australia, ld occupy the dignified position in o had hoped to place it. My own throughout the federal fight was in tion of securing, as a final court of an Australian High Court, but use I believed it would be necessary te that High Court forthwith. I to say that "forthwith" is the word to use in connexion with s such as those made by the -General to the necessity for the establishment of our Judiciary. n Act passed during the first nt to all intents and purposes— of what we hope will be the life of monwealth—constitutes an imme- npliance with any commands or re- n the Constitution. I never ex- hat we should find it necessary to a High Court immediately, and as t on, and the character of the High as altered more and more in the of making it less independent and than was anticipated and hoped any supporters of the federal move- d by its opponents as well, it ap- o be more and more clear that the of the court was a question of pure cy. I propose to point out why the has not arisen, and why we are not pon to establish a High Court at In view of the warning of the -General with regard to chang- character of the Bill, those who osed to the system, in essence, embodied in the Bill, as well as those who think that this is no time to establish such a court, must fearlessly and without favour vote against the second reading, and not merely rest content with making alterations in committee. I think that the court as proposed is unnecessarily complete, and that the results will be unduly cumbrous, and I am also of opinion that the present is not the time for the establishment of a High Court because the necessity for it has not arisen. I would remind honorable members that there is power of direct appeal from the State Courts to the Privy Council. Although I do not profess to have the same experience as some other honorable and learned members, I venture to predict that appeals to the Privy Council will continue on the whole to be the choice of litigants. One among the several reasons which induce me to take this view is the fact that under the Constitution as it stands, even if the High Court has finally dealt with any dispute, there is still power for the Privy Council to grant special leave to appeal from the High Court to itself upon all but inter se questions. The result will be that the litigant who has failed before the Supreme Court, and who desires to carry an appeal to a higher tribunal, will be face to face with the fact that if he goes to the High Court and wins there, he may still have to fight the matter through another stage, and eventually appeal to the Privy Council. Consequently, the inclination will be to go straight to that court from which there can be no further appeal. I heartily agree with the statement which was made by some honorable members, and especially emphasized by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, that litigants desire finality. They are not imbued with that abstract and highly desirable love of settling nice questions of law which is more marked, perhaps, amongst the members of the legal profession than it is amongst those who have to pay for their legal determination. Moreover, in cases of appeal from the decisions of the Supreme Courts of the States, it often happens that both parties are dissatisfied, and that cross appeals are lodged. If, then, we establish the High Court, we may have the unhappy object lesson presented to us of a defendant appealing from the Supreme Court of a State direct to the Privy Council, and of the plaintiff appealing to the High Court. In such a contingency it may be suggested that one of the courts would stay the appeal pending the decision of the other tribunal. But if that course had to be adopted which of the two courts would stay the hearing of the appeal? If the High Court of Australia stayed its hand pending the result of an appeal to the Privy Council, its action would be tantamount to a public announcement that it is not to be regarded as a court of appeal possessing equal authority with the Privy Council. However, I do not wish to labour that particular point, beyond repeating my previous statement that the appeals will usually go to the Privy Council. We cannot hope to materially lessen the cost to litigants by providing for appeals to the High Court instead of to the Privy Council, especially if the High Court be established in the federal capital at a very early date, for the reason that that tribunal will not be called upon to do sufficient work to warrant the creation of a federal bar. Consequently, special briefs will have to be given to the leading barristers in the various States, who will be required to make special journeys to the federal capital in order to appear before the High Court, unless that Court is to sit in the different State capitals and deal with appeals as they arise. That would scarcely be a feasible mode of procedure.

Mr. GLYNN.—There is no resident bar at Ottawa.

Mr. McCAY.—That is so, and that fact I think accounts for so many appeals in Canada going direct to the Privy Council. In addressing himself to this question yesterday the Attorney-General used one argument which struck me as being a two-edged weapon—one the use of which was just as likely to injure himself as it was to damage his opponents. He expressed the opinion that there are certain matters mentioned in the Constitution which it would be improper to refer to the States Courts. The use of such an argument is a direct implication either that the States Supreme Courts would not be qualified or willing—or perhaps both—to deal impartially with such questions. Of course honorable members can speak only for those courts with which they are familiar, and in this connexion I do not profess to have accurate knowledge of the status of the Supreme Court benches in other States as judged by the best opinion available, namely, that of the bar practising before them. But in Victoria we have had a long and happy experience of a court whose impartiality is beyond question.

Mr. WILKS.—The same remarks are applicable to New South Wales.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not profess to have personal knowledge of the conditions existing there, but I have no reason to suppose that in them a different state of affairs exists. If the ground referred to by the Attorney-General be really true, which the proposal to vest the High Court with original jurisdiction would not alter, we ought to be told so explicitly, the honorable gentleman reflecting that the reference or implication upon the part of the Court benches of the other States in connexion with the Attorney-General's proposal is of the federal spirit which would be shown by the High Court, and subsequent to the federal knowledge which it would have. I quite agree with him that a court which was continually dealing with matters conferred by the Constitution, and which, instead of practice, become much more familiar with them than would a tribunal which dealt with them occasionally. No one would propose to controvert that statement. Earlier in his speech, when the Attorney-General spoke of the federal spirit which would actuate the High Court, he gave me to my mind a somewhat different and more pleasant impression. His remarks would imply that in matters arising under the Constitution in which the limit of power as between the States and the Commonwealth were under consideration, there would be an unconscious bias on the part of the Supreme Court benches in favour of the Federal power, and that in the future there would be a similar development of that which actually occurred in the States in the early years of the nineteenth century. In other words, it would be inferred, the High Court would give a wide interpretation to the Federal Constitution, thereby rendering it more elastic than it otherwise would be. I think that we all agree that in the States that development has worked for the general good of the Commonwealth. It is an abstract question it is open to doubt whether it is wise to place the judiciary to place an exact interpretation upon the Constitution to produce elasticity. If the Attorney-General's argument means anything, it certainly means that if the States

McCAY.—If this Bill be defeated annot all resign, so that we must leave that parliamentary contingency altogether out of consideration. I am glad that this matter is being discussed free from all party influences. It seems to me to be one which is far superior to party considerations. The High Court, when it is established, and the Constitution under which it is created, will be in existence and flourishing when parties as they now exist in Australia are remembered only in the pages of the historian, and are very infrequently read there. When we recollect how utterly the character of parties—although the names have lasted pretty well—have changed in the United States, we must realize that, similarly in this continent, the platforms of rival political sections will completely alter.

I propose to vote upon this Bill irrespective of all considerations of who introduced it, who is supporting it, and who is opposing it. My endeavours will rather be directed towards ascertaining whether it is wise to pass it at the present time. The one point which the Attorney-General in his speech emphasised more than any other was that the Constitution practically commands us to establish a High Court. I quite agree with other speakers that if this tribunal is to be established it must be made strong, and that nothing in the character of a make-shift will be sufficient. It would be a very inauspicious commencement if the High Court were not put upon a satisfactory basis from its very inception.
The Attorney-General quoted those sections of the Constitution which deal with the judicial power of the Commonwealth. He declared that it is there clearly laid down that that power shall be vested in a Federal High Court—that the Justices shall be appointed by the Governor-General, and that the High Court shall have jurisdiction, &c. By the time he had finished his exposition of these mandatory sections, the “shall” which appears in them sounded almost like an omen of doom in the ears of those who dared to withstand the irresistible command and authority of the Constitution.
If I believed that either under the law as it is laid down in the Constitution, or under any honorable obligation which was understood as between the people of the various States, or as between our constituents and ourselves, we are bound to institute a High Court, I should be prepared to carry out that obligation, even though I felt that it would be an unwise step to take. But I say just as emphatically in intention—if not in language—as that used by the Attorney-General that no such mandate is contained in the Constitution. I think that the omissions from the judiciary chapter of the Constitution are quite as significant as are the words included in it. Let us take an illustration which was used last night by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo. There is a direction contained in the Constitution that the Federal Tariff shall come into force within two years from the establishment of the Commonwealth. That is plainly an instruction that as soon as possible a uniform Tariff is to come into operation. Similarly, let us take the section which declares that the Parliament shall meet within six months of the inauguration of the Commonwealth. That is a direction that as soon as possible the Commonwealth Parliament shall be elected. Time is the essence of the contract. But in the sections of the Constitution dealing with the establishment of the Judiciary no such time limit is imposed. They merely provide that a High Court shall be ultimately established to complete the various powers which are contemplated under that instrument of government. No specific time is mentioned for the establishment of that tribunal, and obviously the sections referred to, if read fairly, show that Parliament is to decide when, in its opinion, it is desirable to create it. The people of Australia in accepting the Constitution have implicitly trusted us to establish the High Court at a time when it shall be deemed desirable so to do. Nor do I place any stress upon the suggestion that if we do not obey any of these mandates—if they are mandates—contained in the Constitution, there is no practical power that can compel us to do so, because I think there is one power left to compel us to carry out these orders. I refer to the power of the electors, who choose the Parliament which has to carry out these mandates. In my opinion the public of Australia, and wisely too, are not directing us at the present time to establish a High Court. The Attorney-General pointed out that, in addition to what appeared to be mandates, there were also options given in the Constitution. He enumerated every option except that of time, which is the essential one in this particular case. In framing the Bill he has exercised, with one exception, every option that the Constitution gives with regard to the Judiciary. Every optional power that we can confer. High Court he proposes to confer, and he has exercised every option of that of waiting until the time of the establishment of the court. There are matters of more importance for which the people of Australia are asking more insistently than asking—if asking at all—for the establishment of a High Court. It is essential to remember that fact when we realize that we have but comparatively few months for disposal before this Parliament will be dissolved. We have no sympathy with the suggestion which has been made that if this Bill makes sufficient progress with its second session, there should then be a general election for the House of Representatives at the end of the present year. In the circumstances, I think it would be unwise for the Parliament not to hold a general election for the House of Representatives at the same time as the Senate is currently with the Senatorial election. The election should be held at the close of the year.

Mr. CONROY.—If we did not do so, the expense would be involved.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes. I do not think it should even be suggested that the establishment depends upon the progress of business in the House of Representatives. It is an even a desirable suggestion, and it is calculated to assist the due expediting of business. There are certain things which we must attend during this session, and we have very little time to do so, and we must set to work to do that which is essential instead of dealing with matters which, or about the urgency of which, there is a great diversity of opinion. In regard to the establishment of a High Court, we have also had quoted to us the example of the United States—not with any great insistence—the example of the United States. It has been pointed out that the United States established a Supreme Court practically immediately after the federation had taken place; but the circumstances are entirely different from those in which it is proposed to establish a High Court for Australia. It is not so desirable that there shall be some court of appeal, which shall cause the judicial opinion to flow along definite uniform channels, so that, whether the result is good or bad, litigants shall be under a certainty in that respect, whatever the result may not be certain about. We have a Privy Council to discharge that function, but the United States had no such less that, apart from pressing questions of immediate necessity, I would much prefer an Australian final court of appeal to the Privy Council. I think we ought to have a best tribunal, and I do not think the Privy Council is the best available, even in the British Empire. I believe that an Imperial final court of appeal could be made much stronger court than is the Privy Council at the present time, good as the Privy Council may be, and sound as its judgments usually are.

WATSON.—It did not come off too far from the New Zealand case.

MCCAY.—It did not. I have not read the New Zealand statutes sufficiently well to be able to say whether the Privy Council was wrong in its law in that case, but I have read the newspaper reports of the decision of the local court, and the reports of the judgment given by the Privy Council, and I say undoubtedly that I should have been one of the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I should not have thought it necessary to say what was practically a reflection on the independence of the New Zealand Court. Apart from all questions of law, however, I think the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council did not do well in colloquial language, we should call it that; although they certainly said that about the New Zealand court which had no right to say. I should prefer an Australian court to the Privy Council; and considering the United States precedents, it must be remembered that we have a Privy Council available to us, while the United States had not. We have Supreme Court Benches in Australia, from whom we have the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and upon whose impartiality, at least, I have heard no justifiable imputation. We have Supreme Court Benches in Australia which are independent of their Governments, because the members of those benches have practically permanent tenures of office. But, in the United States at the time referred to, all the Judges were elected; and I venture to say there was one case which did more to cause the establishment of the Federal Supreme Court of the United States than did any abstract consideration.

I refer to the case with which the Attorney-General is familiar—the paper money case in Rhode Island. We all know that the Legislature of Rhode Island did not approve of the decision in that case, which declared their law making the paper money legal tender to be unconstitutional. The Judges were elected annually by the State Legislature, and while that Legislature did not impeach or remove them, it did not re-elect them at the end of their year of office. If we had anything of that kind in connexion with our State benches, no circumstances should prevent us from immediately establishing a court which would not be open to the very grave objections to which every elective system of Judges is exposed. In many of the States of America all the Judges are elected, while in most of the States some of them are; consequently there is still a reason which we do not find in Australia for a court like that of the Supreme Court of the United States. It seems to me, therefore, that none of the conditions which existed at the time of the establishment of the Supreme Court in the United States, and which made its establishment essential, are at present existent in Australia, and that when the Attorney-General speaks of the establishment of the High Court, and draws such a glowing picture of all the beneficent results which are to flow from its creation, he is dealing rather with ideals than with actual facts; he is getting away from the practical facts which confront him, and which offer objections to the course which he proposes to pursue. Then the honorable and learned gentleman said, in reference to some criticisms that have been made upon his proposals during the debate on the address in reply, that we were “scarcely federal,” and “scarcely taking a federal view.” There is a certain degree of truth in that charge. We sometimes fail to fully recognise that we are dealing with the whole of Australia, rather than with the individual States with which most of us have been familiar during our lives. But I would retort upon the honorable and learned gentleman that if in this Parliament we are scarcely federal yet, notwithstanding the opportunities we have had to enlarge our views, the people of Australia are still more open to that allegation, and that there is a primary duty, greater than the establishment of the Federal Judiciary, cast upon this Parliament—the duty of making the people of Australia federal in their feelings and thoughts. In order to achieve that result it is essentially necessary that this Parliament, even at the sacrifice of matters which it would otherwise think desirable, shall not pass legislation which does not appeal to the growing federal instinct of the people of Australia. It is just such a measure as this, the advantages of which are not immediately obvious, although its supporters may ultimately be convinced that the advantages exist, that does not appeal to the federal instinct of the people. It is just such a measure as this, whose advantages are not immediately obvious, while the expense which it involves is palpable, that causes the people of Australia to feel dissatisfied.

Mr. FOWLER.—That may be only the Victorian view.

Mr. McCAY.—So far as I am able to judge, from conversation with honorable members, the opposition to this Bill is not confined to Victoria. An honorable member, when he is speaking, must refer to that which he knows, and I repeat that, in my opinion, the advantages of this Bill are not obvious, and in no respect equal to the disadvantages which it now offers. Those disadvantages are obvious, and I venture to think that the great majority of the people of Australia have no desire at the present time for the establishment of the High Court, with the inevitable expense which it must involve.

Mr. FOWLER.—The desire for it seems to exist to some extent.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes. I suppose the honorable member is referring to public opinion in Western Australia. He knows that State thoroughly, and, if I may say so, much better than he knows the other States. But he will not find any excessive enthusiasm, even in Western Australia, in favour of the establishment of the High Court. It is not one of those questions with which a Government could sweep the polls, for example, or in favour of which there is an overwhelming mass of public opinion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is nothing to enthuse about.

Mr. McCAY.—Exactly. One reason why a proposal of this kind should not be pressed at the present moment is that in most of the States—with the exception of Western Australia, which, perhaps owing to her special Tariff, is more fortunate in this respect—the Governments, as Governments, are hard up. In Victoria they have been pursuing a policy of retrenchment of the most drastic kind. I do not express any opinion as to whether it is right or wrong, but as a matter of fact there have been economies of the most drastic kind practised in this State. As I am aware that policy has not yet been taken up in New South Wales; I fear the day is coming when that State will find it just as necessary to adopt the same. This State can indulge in an unlimited expenditure with loan moneys, or any other kind of moneys on which it can lay its hands, without having to pay for it in the long run. I must say that in the past the eastern Governments and Parliaments, that have certainly not displayed, through a wise desire to be careful in the expenditure of money—that desire for the avoidance of any unnecessary expenditure tends in the long run to satisfactory domestic conditions.

Mr. FOWLER.—All the blame is to be put on federation.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not care to be blamed for this state of affairs. Although at times one has seen tendencies to extravagance, and although one may find isolated cases in which sums of money might have been saved, this Parliament as a whole has not been extravagant. Economical in its spirit, more economical than was, at the outset, the Government which leads it. Indeed some people say that the Parliament as a whole exhibits a more economical spirit than do the members of the Government at the present time. My experience has been that the parsimonious man who prospers is more than the extravagant man.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If we do not save late we cannot accumulate.

Mr. McCAY.—Accumulate what? Most of the States at the present time are in a condition in which even comparatively small sums of money are of moment to them. Every penny we spend is a penny from them, and it is our duty to spend expenditure wherever it is possible to do so. The Attorney-General suggests that the establishment of the High Court would ultimately save money in the direction of the States Judiciaries, and that I have the very gravest doubts as to that. The inevitable result of the establishment of federation must be, for a time at least, not to decrease the crop of litigation. There are all kinds of new questions coming up for decision—new in the sense that there are no precedents to guide us, as we go to America, where the circum-

ently so different that we cannot ourselves of their decisions. I do not think that the flow of current litigation will diminish to any material extent. Only a few matters will there be such a diminution of laws as will diminish the volume of litigation, I do not see how I can hope that the total volume of litigation in the Commonwealth will be any appreciably increased by the confederation of federal union. The fact that there is one customs law for the whole of Australia will not diminish litigation in any way. There was one customs law for the whole of Australia before federation, and there is one now. As a matter of fact there has been more customs litigation in Victoria during the last twelve years than in the preceding ten years. I do not say that the administration of the law has been improper. I do not wish to express any opinion upon the subject at the present time, but the fact is irrelevant. But, in this case the facts show that litigation has increased rather than diminished by legislation. The only way in which the work of the States courts can be lessened is by taking from them and giving to the High Court almost exclusively a large part of the business which they now transact. I do not think that a change of course. In my opinion we cannot expect for any appreciable saving in the expenditure upon the States courts from the establishment of a High Court. When the Attorney-General tells us that his proposal is economical one, and contrasts the expenditure under the Bill with the expenditure upon the Supreme Court of the States, he is, in my opinion, making his comparison upon a false basis. He gets that there are two kinds of litigation, the first of which consists of litigation nothing unnecessarily upon existing institutions. I believe that if the High Court were in existence that kind of litigation would be practised under the Bill. The second kind of economy is by avoiding the establishment of institutions which require the expenditure of money until they are absolutely necessary. The honorable and learned Attorney-General is not proposing to practice that kind of economy. Of course, in his opinion the establishment of the High Court is necessary, but I did not hear a word from last night, which carried to my mind that conviction, or even a reasonable justification for the opinion. Consequently it seems to me that he is proposing to indulge in the extravagance of establishing an institution which will cause an expenditure of money when its establishment is not immediately necessary. I have already said that I do not think that litigants will save anything in expense by appealing to the High Court; neither do I think that they will save very much in time by doing so. Furthermore, the number of appeals is likely to be so small that the establishment of a High Court to save a short delay in dealing with a few cases a year is like using a steam hammer to crack a nut. I wish now to draw attention to the jurisdiction which it is proposed to give to the High Court. The Attorney-General in speaking of the desirability of establishing a High Court spoke chiefly upon the need for a duly qualified, duly respected Australian Court of Appeal. But the Bill proposes to do more than establish an appellate court, and I am forced to the conclusion that, consciously or not, the Attorney-General proposes to give the High Court so much original jurisdiction because he feels that there would not be enough work to justify the creation of a purely appellate court. If all the work which it is proposed to give to the High Court goes before the five Judges, who are to be appointed, they will certainly have plenty to do. It seems to me that the Government is endeavouring to do with a single court what it takes in the United States two sets of Judges to do; because there they have a Supreme Appellate Court and Circuit Courts. The Attorney-General, however, intends that the Judges of the High Court shall act as an Appellate Court, and also go on circuit. But they will not be able to carry on both functions satisfactorily if the High Court, in its original jurisdiction, gets all the work which it is possible under the Bill for it to receive. In my opinion the bulk of that work will not go to the High Court, but will, in the vast majority of cases, continue to go to the States courts. If that be so, it obviates the necessity for the creation of a High Court, with original jurisdiction, at the present time. But if the work does not continue to go to the States courts, litigants will have to suffer great delay in getting their cases heard by the High Court. The Attorney-General drew attention to the fact that the Judges would frequently visit the capitals of the various States, and to secure business for the High Court he provides for the removal of causes by defendants to that Court as of right. That is tantamount to inviting defendants to go to the High Court, so that they may be able to postpone trials for longer periods than could elapse if the cases were heard before the States courts. The Government propose to set up an unnecessary rival to the six Supreme Courts of the States by giving to the Judges of the High Court a jurisdiction which they will be quite able to satisfactorily carry out.

Mr. FISHER.—Will the High Court do better work than the Supreme Courts of the States?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think so. I do not think we could expect better work from a Judge of the High Court than from a Judge of the standing of the members of the Supreme Courts of the States. The Judges of a High Court will be chosen from the same class of men as are the Judges of the Supreme Courts of the States, and, on the whole, appeals from the decisions of Justices of the Supreme Courts of the States are not frequently successful. The original jurisdiction of the High Court will, to a large extent, be ordinary nisi prius work, and I do not see why State Judges should not do it as well as Federal Judges. I am not enamoured of the proposal that Federal Judges shall wander from capital to capital to do work which there are already State Judges able and willing to perform. During the recess the Government expressed a willingness to become a peripatetic Administration, and they still seem to have the ambulatory disposition, since they are now proposing to set up a peripatetic High Court. A stationary court would be very much better. I see no reason for giving the proposed original jurisdiction to the High Court.

Mr. WATSON.—What has the honorable and learned member to say on the subject of appeals upon constitutional questions?

Mr. McCAY.—There is nothing to prevent appeals upon constitutional questions being taken direct from the Supreme Courts of the States to the Privy Council.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable and learned member object to that, or does he think it a good thing?

Mr. McCAY.—If we had a final court of appeal in Australia, and circumstances were not as they are at present, reference would be for an Australian court of appeal. Such a court would be in accordance with Australian aspirations and sentiments; we have something else to satisfy justice, and that is the Australian pocket. The question itself was a sufficient satisfaction to our sentiment; but it will not content us unless our pockets are satisfied too. I have no sympathy with the course as that cabled from England the other day about bonds of mutual interest being a wayward and squalid. I think that mutual interest is a matter of very great importance in a community, and that its consideration is very desirable for the well-being of the State. But at the present time, seeing that few constitutional questions are likely to arise, and that all matters of appeal will come direct from the Supreme Courts of the States to the Privy Council, and that there is no appeal even from the High Court except in two or three cases, it is not probable that we cannot obtain that Australian court of appeal which was contemplated by many people when the Convention was sitting. We cannot now get the court we want, even if it were desirable to establish a High Court of Appeal immediately. I have very grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the provision made to by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne last night, in referring appeals to the High Court, and judgments by the States Courts within the limits of their federal jurisdiction. I do not bind myself to a definite expression of opinion on the subject, but my impression is that that is ultra vires of the Constitution, because it exceeds the power conferred by section 77. I do not think it comes within the words authorizing the definition of jurisdiction, but I admit the point is open to considerable consideration. In my opinion the provision is a vain endeavour to secure appeals to the High Court instead of allowing them to go at choice to the Privy Council. I have related briefly some of the reasons which compel me to vote against the Bill, and that course with no pleasure, because I would rather support a measure introduced by the Government of which the Attorney-General is a member than oppose it. I think one has a duty in these matters to vote higher and more important than the ation of that kind. But while I shall ainst the Government with relucshall have no reluctance in voting the Bill, because I feel that it is essary, and that our duty is to see thing is done in the way of spending unnecessarily.

HUGHES (West Sydney).—I should

h will bear further argument. I e may take it for granted that, as gral part of all federal Constituere must be a court to adjust the s between the various component of the Federation. We have been the Attorney-General that it is ory that the High Court should be ed, but we need not discuss that or the very simple reason that this e has no element of time in it. It is e a matter of indifference so far as ent is concerned. The provision in stitution amounts to very much the if we were told—"You can do it if se, or you need not do it at all." But we might consider for a moment the inted references that have been y the Attorney-General to the Con-a of the United States, and to the portant part played by the Judiciary development. We need not hesitate pt the statement, that had it not r the Judiciary, or more correctly g, perhaps, for Chief Justice Mar-doubtedly the American Constituuld have tottered headlong to ruin in y part of its existence. Undoubtedly rica the Judiciary has played a very nt part, as it must do under a Federal or any other Constitution in which the law is a settled and stable institution. It has done so even in England. The Minister has sought to draw an analogy, and certainly there is one—although how far it holds is another matter—between the American Constitution and the importance of the Judiciary in all such Constitutions, and our own. At the same time he pointed out that there are very great distinctions between our Constitution and any other.

He has reminded us that we have something of the American, something of the Canadian, and something of the Swiss Constitution, and also elements which are not to be found in any of them, and that we should judge our own Constitution as a whole, and not confuse it with any of those from which we draw it. At the same time it is undeniable that the Attorney-General has sought to show us that the Judiciary to be established here is to take for its pattern that of the United States. It is necessary to consider for a moment the powers of the Judiciary where there is a written Constitution with fundamental constitutional laws, capable of being amended only in a certain way, and differing altogether from the ordinary laws, and of the Judiciary in any one of our States or in Great Britain. The function of the Judiciary in Australia and in Great Britain is to declare what the law is. It interprets the law, and having declared it in the lower courts, power of appeal exists to the higher courts or to the highest court of the Empire —in England to the House of Lords, and outside of Great Britain to the Privy Council. Even when the law has been declared by the highest of these tribunals we are by no means shut out from further redress, because we may appeal to Parliament and have the law altered. Where there is a written Constitution, which is not susceptible of amendment in the same way as the ordinary laws under which the citizens live, then the Judiciary is a supreme power. You cannot get behind the Judiciary. It is at once the interpreter and the guardian of the Constitution. You may appeal to Parliament, and you may, if you have plenty of time and energy and hope, appeal to the people, but the Judiciary is the beginning and end of all things, and behind that you cannot go. You may, if you like, submit everything to the arbitrament of arms, and then you may, perhaps, secure an amendment. But as the Attorney-General was careful to point out, there has not been an amendment of the American Constitution, except during the earlier months of its existence, beyond that achieved by the civil war. Now, we have never experienced anything of this kind in these States or in Great Britain. When a judgment has been given, even by the House of Lords or the Privy Council, we have never sat down tamely and said—"That is the beginning and end of things," but we have agitated and appealed to Parliament to get the law altered. The Judiciary, whilst we have honoured it and looked up to it, has never held the same position as in the United States. The Attorney-General seeks to establish such a Judiciary here. He is not satisfied with the mere declaration of the law. That could be effected by a State Court, or by the appointment of any Judge who can interpret the Constitution and understand the law. Even by what my honorable and learned friend calls a scratch court, as well as by the carefully erected Federal Judiciary that he proposes. The Attorney-General, in short, asks honorable members to erect a Federal Judiciary which is to have great powers in the interpretation of the Constitution. He said in the speech with which he introduced the Bill in the first instance, that the Constitution was written at large—that the details were not filled in, and that it was necessary to have men well trained and with able minds to interpret it. We were told, in effect, that whilst the Constitution was up to date in 1900, the requirements of the people and the exigencies of the situation as time progressed would demand that it should be drawn out at one point and filled in at others. Now this means that we are to intrust to the Judiciary the task of filling in the Constitution. Here is an empty building, the appointments of which are evidently to be left to the tastes of the tenants from time to time, and the Judiciary is to be intrusted with the task of finishing and completing the structure. But those who are far more familiar with the traditions of parliamentary methods would rather see it performed by the means hitherto adopted.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We must have a judicial interpretation of doubtful points before we can know whether it is necessary to amend or not.

Mr. HUGHES.—But it is not so much the judicial interpretation of doubtful points at which we are aiming. What the honorable member has in his mind is very clear. It is not the doubtful points in the Constitution, but those which admit of no doubt, those which the public will not face—stone walls. The people say, "You must either make your way through this stone wall, under the Constitution, or we shall knock the wall down," and the Attorney-General prefers the Judiciary and its ingenious methods of going round or over or under stone walls instead of that straightforward way of knocking the walls down and have done with it, by which we have achieved every liberty we possess. He says that if it had not been for the Judiciary in America the Constitution in that country would not be the revered instrument it now is. That is very true. There would have been no Constitution and may be no United States if it had not been for the Judiciary. But we are not to argue from that that our position is analogous. In America there was no other method of getting over their difficulties. They had to rely on the Judiciary, or appeal to arms, or to disband and thereby abandon all hopes of national life. These alternatives are not presented to us. We can get an interpretation of our laws from the Privy Council or from the States Courts, and we are not likely to be involved in any very serious difficulties under this head, because we are only six States as against thirteen at the outset of the federation of the United States. More than that, the American Constitution is very much more difficult of amendment than ours; and the fact that ours is so difficult is not due to our fault but to that of the Attorney-General and those who acted with him. Those very honorable members who are now crying out for means to get round the awkward places were those who went through the land pointing out how easy it was to amend the Constitution. Now the Attorney-General says that whilst our Constitution is not nearly so difficult of amendment as is that of the United States, still it remains difficult of alteration. He says—

As honorable members are aware, scarcely any amendments have been made in the Constitution of the United States without a violent national convulsion. Of amendments of the Constitution in the ordinary constitutional fashion, there are practically none. At this very moment there are before the Congress sitting at Washington no less than 44 Bills for amending the Federal Constitution, and it is the confident opinion of those who have watched the course of American legislation, one of them is likely to become law to the complicated assents they have to. Under these circumstances the Americans found themselves with a Constitution might have been a dead letter, and must have been a heavy burden, but for the fact that they created a Supreme Court capable of interpreting a court which had the courage to take that sentiment, drawn in the eighteenth century, and in the light of the nineteenth century, so relieve the intolerable pressure that was put upon it by the changed circumstances of time. It is not too much to say that, but the work done in this direction by the Supreme Court of the United States, we might not see it as it is still, the revered bond of 70,000,000 or 80,000,000 free people. In the same situation must arise in Australia although it be much easier to amend the Constitution, it is yet a comparatively costly and difficult task, and one which will be attended only in grave circumstances.

It is a difficult and costly task is only owing to the fact that certain men would insist upon our having this Constitution or none whatever. It is a difficult and costly task to secure amendment of the Constitution under present conditions, but it is no more so than it would be if we had a Federal Judiciary. An appeal to the people would involve an outlay nearly equal to the expenses of conducting a general election, and we may estimate that would reach the sum of £50,000. It is proposed to erect the High Court at a sum cost of £30,000 per annum, and might therefore appeal to the people once in two years at a smaller cost than that incurred in maintaining the Federal Judiciary in the same period. However, that is only a way of looking at this measure, and perhaps not altogether a fair way. So far as the amendment of the Constitution is concerned, we can see that we could effect our purpose easily, at any rate quite as cheaply, through a Federal Judiciary. The Federal Judiciary in America has read into the United States Constitution clauses and provisions that its framers could never have contemplated. I defy any human being to read that Constitution to find any grounds for such elastic decisions as have been given by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Judges have been only men, and they have been aware that they must be decisions such as they have made, or the conditions would be so intolerable that it would be impossible for the Constitution to cohere. As Bryce puts anywhere else in the world, and Judges are only men. To yield a little may be prudent, for the tree that cannot bend to the blast may be broken. There is, moreover, this ground at least for presuming public opinion to be right, that through it the progressive judgment of the world is expressed.

Public opinion thus finds its only method of permanently impressing itself upon the Constitution of America through the Federal Judiciary; that is to say, through public meetings and the press, and other means which the public have of making their opinions known. We have always distinctly set our faces against any recognition of public opinion which did not find its expression in one of two ways, either through a plebiscite or through Parliamentary representation. It has been said by the Honorable B. R. Wise, a gentleman very closely allied with the Attorney-General and with the Prime Minister, that the referendum is opposed not only to the principles of representative government, but to the very spirit of the British Constitution, and undoubtedly we now have presented to us a method of governing through the press and public meetings, for in no other way could the Judiciary feel the impress of public opinion. Thus we are not to have public opinion rightly, sanely, and constitutionally expressed at the ballot-box, but we are to have it expressed by the Judiciary when the latter can no longer withstand it. When, in short, it is necessary to avert a dire calamity, such as an appeal to arms, we are to have some sort of a make-shift amendment. The Attorney-General knows perfectly well that under one set of circumstances only can an amendment of the Constitution be effected. There must be such widespread dissatisfaction with it or with some part of it, that the whole of the States, or a majority of them, together with a majority of the people of those States, are simultaneously seized of some disability, and resolve to tolerate it no longer. If we have a Federal Judiciary when such a contingency arises, it will introduce some sort of patchwork amendment by a convenient interpretation of the Constitution, and so, by relieving the pressure here or there, prevent the people from ever securing any beneficial reform of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. — I do not agree with that statement.

Mr. HUGHES. — The honorable gentleman knows that with the erection of this

Supreme Court feels the touch of public opinion. Opinion is stronger in America than

Judiciary all hope of securing an amendment of the Constitution disappears.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I think that the honorable member put the position correctly a few minutes ago, when he said that the people had power to break down the "stone wall." The Judiciary has to deal only with other parts of the Constitution.

Mr. HUGHES.—The Attorney-General knows perfectly well that it is only by fighting against "stone walls" that the British nation has advanced. Was it not necessary to go against a "stone wall" in order to obtain Magna Charta? Was it by judicial decree that that charter was secured? Was habeas corpus so obtained?

Mr. DEAKIN.—They were obtained very largely by parliamentary agitation.

Mr. HUGHES.—Undoubtedly, but how was parliamentary agitation aroused except by the demands of the people outside? In England, no reform has ever been achieved without popular agitation. A notable instance of that is afforded by the great Reform Bill. Did not the people assemble in thousands and demand the passage of that measure? Is it not a fact that the Duke of Wellington had presented to him the alternative either of giving way or of having the House of Lords flooded? In short, the people have obtained every liberty which they at present enjoy by direct rather than by indirect effort. If the Attorney-General desires a Federal Judiciary merely to interpret the law, I say that the State Judiciaries can perform that duty equally well. But if he desires to erect a Court which will be at once superior to Parliament and the people, he will seek to establish such a tribunal as he advocates to-day.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. HUGHES.—Undoubtedly. Let honorable members consider his arguments in favour of the appointment of this Judiciary. It is to be an impartial Judiciary. What does that mean? It means that the existing Judiciaries are not impartial. From the ill-concealed sneer and contempt with which the honorable gentleman speaks of State Benches and the Privy Council, one would imagine that they were composed of men who are tottering upon the verge of senile decay, who sleep whilst evidence is being submitted—a practice not unknown amongst other gentlemen who have occupied judicial positions and who have slept calmly through days and days of weary iteration of testimony—but have at length woke up and given an admirable judgment upon questions involving thousands of pounds. The right honorable member who leads the Opposition with such distinction sleeps calmly through a great deal of thunderous eloquence from the other side of the Chamber, but manages to give a very effective reply to it when his turn comes. The Privy Council is held up by the Attorney-General as an institution which is good enough to decide small "tiddlywinking" matters, such as the determination of whether a man's life has been rightly taken away by the courts of our country, or whether another man's liberties are imperilled or his property is at stake. But strange to say this body of gentlemen, who have been trained in the Imperial Courts of the Empire, who have attained to the highest position within the gift of the Imperial Government, who are above ambition, for they have attained the highest of legal rewards—above the possibilities of bribery—who have achieved all in the way of reputation and career that this life has to offer, are adjudged incapable of settling constitutional questions, such as how the riparian rights of South Australia and New South Wales are to be equitably adjusted. In the minds of some honorable members these grave constitutional questions call for the exercise of abilities that no other men in Australia, and certainly none of those upon the States Judicial benches, possess. Apparently the members of the Privy Council are quite unfitted even to attempt to grapple with them, though there are some gentlemen in Australia with whose names we are not acquainted who are qualified to undertake the task. Their abilities we can only suppose to be supernaturally acute, otherwise the Attorney-General would not speak of them with such confidence. These gentlemen know exactly the position. They are acquainted with the intentions of the framers of the Constitution. They propose to violate the very first principles of law, in that they purpose interpreting the Constitution, not as it is expressed in the bond, but according to the intention of its framers—a proceeding which no court would tolerate. We are told that the High Court is to be constituted of men whose sympathies are with the Federal Government. What does that mean? It can only mean one thing, because the chief objection urged against the Judges of the States Supreme Courts is that they biased against the Commonwealth Government. In plain language, it means that the Federal Judiciary will be biased against the States. If it does not mean that, it means that somewhere in our midst we have a body of men unaffected with the ordinary bias of mankind, for, whereas the States Supreme Court Judges are to be biased in favour of the States, these men will be biased in favour of nobody. Are we to entertain the suggestion that the States Supreme Court Judges would not dispense justice? Are we to suppose that the rights of our fellow citizens are of less importance than are those of the States in constitutional questions? If a man is standing his trial before a court, his liberty, his property, or even his life may be at stake. Is it not of importance that the man in which tries him shall be without fear and shall dispense justice without fear or favour? I admit that we have men of ability upon the Judiciary, but I should be very sorry to think that our States Judges did not enjoy a well-deserved reputation in that respect. I say that either the States Supreme Court and the Privy Council, above all other courts, are not capable of determining any constitutional questions that may arise, is to take an extraordinary position to take. The Attorney-General declares that if we establish the High Court, time will be saved in securing decisions in cases of appeal. He pointed out that the decision of appeals to the Privy Council occupies on an average a year and nine months. I am likely it does. But, even admitting that how long, I ask, is occupied in obtaining decisions in appeal cases in the United States? There, appeals have been known to be hung up for years. The question of whether a man had committed an offence upon Federal or State territory affords a remarkable instance of this. Its decision has been left in abeyance for years, during which the unhappy litigant has been at large, for aught I know, remains so to the present day. In the United States, I understand, one can hang up anything or anybody. All the glowing panegyrics which have been uttered upon the American Judiciary and all its decisions given approval? What which gives this Federal Judiciary such pre-eminence? Its ability and incorruptibility are undeniable, but in that country incorruptibility means something, whilst in Australia it means nothing. I do not believe any court in the British Empire has ever been guilty of corruption, and therefore to argue that in America the Federal Court is incorruptible, is to say nothing. It merely affords a refreshing contrast to the States Courts there, which obviously are not incorruptible. If we accept the statement of one eminent American, some of the courts of the United States are not incorruptible. The State Judges there hold office during the pleasure of parties, but the members of the Federal Judiciary do not. Their position therefore is entirely different. The State Judges hold office during pleasure, but the Federal Judges cannot be removed except after impeachment upon certain well defined methods. Here we have courts that are at least impartial, that are possessed of ability and are incorruptible, and I do not see what advantage we are to obtain from the creation of the High Court. We are to expend a sum of money which in the maximum will amount to £30,000 a year. We have recently passed through a distressing period. We were told during the federal campaign that the Federal Judiciary would cost a certain sum.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have said that the cost has been estimated to be £23,715.

Mr. HUGHES.—I remember that Mr. Wise was before the country, and acted a very useful part in that campaign. He was a sort of John the Baptist, going before the right honorable gentleman at the head of this Government to prepare the way, and to leave him to qualify many things which he said. Mr. Wise said that the whole cost of Federation would be something less than a dog tax, and he held up to ridicule and contempt those parsimonious wretches who would not even face the cost of an extra dog tax a year. But this Bill involves something more than the payment of a dog tax. It is a regular pack of hounds which the Attorney-General proposes to let loose upon us. £30,000 a year is to be the maximum cost.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—The minimum.

Mr. HUGHES.—In these circumstances they are convertible terms. The Government propose to involve us in this expenditure, and they tell us that there is a sheaf of cases awaiting determination. They also remind us that this is the third year of the Federation; but whose fault is it that this measure was not introduced last session at a stage that would have permitted it then to become law. The fault rests with the Attorney-General or his colleagues. The honorable and learned gentlemen brought in the Bill last session at a stage when it was physically impossible to pass it into law. He brings it before the House now, and he reminds us that he is doing so in the third year of the Federation. But for three years we have managed to pull along without this Judiciary; there is no rumour of war outside, and those learned gentlemen, who are teeming with ideas as to how this Constitution ought to be developed, are lying low. Thanks to fairly substantial showers of rain, the country is pulling through, and it appears to me that in the circumstances there is no real reason for any hurry. If a Federal Judiciary is wanted—and I admit that some court is required—there is no reason why a tentative arrangement should not be made that would enable us to go on for another three years. If that scheme proved unworkable we might then come down and accept the Attorney-General's proposal for the creation of a permanent tribunal. If the temporary tribunal proved incapable of carrying out its work, if the litigants would have none of it, if its judgments excited contempt and were continually overruled by the Privy Council—if in short, the members of that temporary court proved themselves incompetent—what would be easier than to erect such a tribunal as is indicated in the Bill? We are told, however, that we must at once have that tribunal. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo very properly pointed out last night that we are now within measurable distance of an election. We are going to ask the people some questions. Doubtless they will put some to us, but whether we or they shall be able to answer them the more readily I do not know. I propose, however, to ask my constituents whether they think this Federal Judiciary necessary. If they say they do, it is extremely probable that I shall vote for it. I remember a colleague of mine in the New South Wales Parliament—a representative of that canny and indomitable race that is found all over the world except in Scotland—who said on one occasion in the House that he had been down to his constituents; that he had just laid the matter before them; and that his constituents told him in so many words that they were not in favour of it. In these circumstances he said that he could not see his way to vote for the Bill in question.

Mr. Hughes.

I am not in that position. I have no the advantage of laying this matter my constituents, but I do say that they look twice at their share of the £30,000 year which this proposal will involve, they consent to its expenditure. So I know my constituents have been very content with the very small benefit they have received from Federation. They are paying very handsomely for what they have secured from it. They have one and one destiny. They may wrap themselves around them, and their destiny is undeniable. But I think a demand for payment of £30,000 per annum is more than they are at present inclined to stand.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member should double that sum.

Mr. HUGHES.—I think so. I think the Attorney-General will find it difficult to show why we should not adopt a tentative scheme. Confer Federal jurisdiction on a Court composed, if you like, of the Justices of the various States, and impartiality must be the result. The honorable member for Gippsland has very properly pointed out the position. He said that in a matter concerning a State might be brought before a Federal Bench composed of a Chief Justice of each of the States. A case might concern two States, but we must not imagine that it would affect more than one. The honorable member pointed out that, if it affected three States, there would be three members of the Bench who were interested. In 99 cases out of 100 it would be only one or two States interested, and the Judges from all the other States would be quite impartial. It would be possible to obtain a more impartial court so far as Inter-State questions are concerned. If we have the High Court proposed in this Bill, the members of that court will come either from one or two States, and they will presumably be impartial in one direction or another. If not, they will be persons so far removed from ordinary frailties of mankind, that we do not know them now. Public have not seen them; the Bar has never heard of them, and probably will never know them, believe, indeed, that the Federal Judges will not know them. Such people are interesting characters to read about, but we do not know them. The honorable member for Bendigo says that we should have some control over the Federal Judiciary. Of course that is possible. We can have no control over a Federal court.

Both will be equally independent. No kind of control could be exercised in either case. Therefore, that point is worthy of consideration. It is held by honorable members that a Federal Judiciary would be of great service in connection with a State which was inclined to pass a measure similar to that introduced a few years ago by the Irvine Government. I am sure that it is imagined that the Federal Judiciary could declare such measures ultra vires. Such a belief is, however, absurd. The Federal Court could do so only if such a measure were an infringement of the Federal Constitution. Whatever may have been the reasons for such a measure, they would not be touched in the slightest degree, as we can see, by the Federal Constitution. If such a measure would have been valid at the laws of England or not is a matter for which we need not consider. In any rate, the existence of the Federal Court would not have affected it in the least. It will thus be admitted that that measure need not be considered. I shall oppose such a measure, because I consider that the establishment of a Federal Judiciary, with the purpose of rendering it superior to the State Courts and the people, would be most unwise.

Of course the Attorney-General may say in so many words that that was the intended intention of the Government, to establish a Federal Judiciary clothed with such powers and animated with such a spirit as to have that effect. This Federal Judiciary is to be animated with the spirit intended according to the Government cannot be separated from any other Judiciary that is similarly constituted. It is to be established for the express purpose of filling in the gaps in our Constitution, to develop the Constitution here and there in a manner and by methods of which the people had no knowledge when they accepted the instrument of which the Imperial Parliament was not seized when it confirmed it. The powers of the High Court are to be impregnated with the spirit of the framers of the Constitution. They are to build up the Constitution according to some well-defined lines not expressed in the letter of the Constitution, and they are, so to speak, to infuse the spirit of the Convention into the Constitution like every other citizen of Australia, prepared to accept the Constitution as it stands; to leave to a Judiciary the task of interpreting it. I have indicated the task of interpretation, and to the people the business of amending it. I believe that the Constitution can be amended, although not without difficulty, and that it ought to be amended. I understand that the Adelaide Chamber of Commerce recently preferred a request that it should be amended in the direction of making either Melbourne or Sydney the Federal capital. There will be a demand for the amendment of the Constitution in various directions as time goes on, and amendment will come the more readily if we have not a Federal Judiciary that is ostensibly and avowedly placed above the Parliament and the people. Undeniably it is the intention of the Government to erect such a Judiciary. This is what the Attorney-General says—

If the members of the High Court, as we have every reason to suppose they will be, are the best men that Australia can produce, it is inevitable that the court will draw to itself, naturally and without coercion, a considerable share of the litigation which has hitherto flowed to the Supreme Courts of the States. There may remain a sufficiency of business for the State Courts for some time to come, owing to the growth of population and the increase of prosperity; but it cannot be denied that the business which will be done by the High Court will assist to relieve, not only the State Courts, but the Privy Council.

That is to say, in so many words, that this is to be a dominant court throughout the Commonwealth, and that it will usurp the functions hitherto exercised by the Parliament—that is by the people. The fingers of the American citizen are not so directly on the lever of government as they are here. Here the machinery is direct and simple. The people may at intervals of every three years elect to Parliament whom they choose, and their representatives may make what laws they please. They have hitherto not been bound by any written Constitution. They are now bound in some measure, but they are bound only within the limits of the Constitution. I am quite at one with the honorable and learned member for Bendigo and others in the proposal that the people be given an opportunity at the next election of saying whether they wish for an amendment of the Constitution, and that they should be allowed to determine whether the Court shall be established, or whether we shall remain quiescent, and accept a tentative scheme for the next five years, or, at any rate, until the dissolution of the next triennial Parliament. Let Australia get on her feet. We are now enmeshed in one of the most fearful periods of depression which the country has ever known. Is this the time, now that we are struggling in the octopus-like grip of depression, to introduce a proposal which, by involving the country in additional expense, will bring the Federal Government into disrepute, and the whole machinery of the Constitution into contempt? There is absolutely no need for the High Court at the present time. If there were an outcry for its establishment, the position would be different. We are told that there are hundreds of cases awaiting settlement. What cases are they? I venture to assert that no litigant will wait for the establishment of the High Court if he can obtain justice in the courts of his State. If the judgment of the State Court did not suit him, he might then wait until the establishment of the High Court; but to say that there are hundreds of such cases is to assert what does not seem to be the fact. If I had an urgent case, I should take it into the Court of my own State, and, if the decision of that Court did not satisfy me, I should appeal to the Privy Council. But to suppose that hundreds of people are waiting for the establishment of the High Court in order to have their grievances remedied, is to suppose that litigants are changing their usual methods of procedure. Why should a man be content to sit still, and do nothing, before he has tried to obtain a remedy from the Supreme Court of his State? I shall oppose the establishment of the High Court at this juncture, because it would be very costly, and is unnecessary. I have not gone into details, because other speakers have done that, and if the Bill passes the second reading they will come under our consideration in committee. Undoubtedly the measure is an important one. A Federal Judiciary is an integral part of our written Constitution. But the people can obtain every safeguard they require by the adoption of such a tribunal as I have referred to. As a whole, they will be better satisfied to obtain justice from the Courts which they now know, with an ultimate appeal to the Privy Council, than to rear at this juncture a costly and unnecessary High Court, and thus burden themselves with expenditure which they were led to believe when they were asked to accept the Constitution, was unnecessary, or, at all events, would not have to be incurred for a considerable time to come. I shall oppose the Bill, and I trust that the motion for the second reading will not be carried. If the second reading is agreed we shall have to do the best we can for the measure in committee.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON (South Australia).—After the very able speeches to which we have listened from the Attorney-General, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and others who have addressed themselves to the subject, I feel somewhat in touching upon a question of such importance as this and one which involves deep legal issues. But it seems a pity that most of these honorable and learned gentlemen have taken a great dislike to the provisions of the measure. It is something to find that the proposal for the creation of a High Court, which was so lauded when the people were being asked to accept federation is now regarded as something to be condemned. According to some of these honorable and learned gentlemen, the measure which we should create is a mere shadow court, which would sit in one place another as time and the work of the Justices of the Supreme Courts of the States might permit. We have heard a good deal about the High Court of the Dominion of Canada, and of the High Court of the United States, but the conditions of both countries are in no way comparable with those under which the six States of Australia have united. We have one vast continent six States, with different climatic conditions, and different industries whose people hold different ideas, and different aims and conflicting policies. But after some years of consultation and discussion, a Constitution was framed by a Convention appointed by the electors of the States, which was afterwards submitted to them for approval and adopted. Prominent among the advantages to be secured by the adoption of the Constitution, and for which its adoption was recommended by the leading federalists, went throughout the country with that were the removal of the fiscal barriers existing between the States, and the institution of absolute free-trade and free interchange of products between the States; and the establishment of a Court to which the people of Australia could appeal with confidence in the intelligence of its Judges, and with the certainty of obtaining speedy and reason-decisions upon their disputes. A advantage that was to be gained the establishment of an Inter-State Commission, a judicial body which would be linked in some degree with the Federal Court, and which would prevent the interference with Inter-State free-trade which is caused by the war of railway rates and the imposition of preferential duties. Without the establishment of a High Court there can be no Inter-State Commission. The two are closely interwoven, and a High Court is made the final arbiter of the points of law in regard to matters coming before the Inter-State Commission. Being so, the question arises, in my mind, how is it that those who are much opposed to the establishment of a High Court, some of whom were members of the Convention, did not there raise an objection to the idea on the score of the probable increase in cost of the institution, or because it would be unnecessary. Why did they raise those objections when they were dealing with all eloquence and fervour of the adoption of the Constitution to the people of Australia? The creation of a High Court was put before the people as one of the best things next to Inter-State free-trade and the creation of an Inter-State Commission to be gained from Federal aid. The people of Australia—I speak from personal knowledge of my own State and from what I have read of the feeling in the other States—evidently approved of the establishment of Inter-State free-trade and the creation of a High Court and an Inter-State Commission. If they had not done so, they would not have voted by an overwhelming majority for the Constitution. MR. WILKS.—How often was the establishment of a High Court advocated on the various platforms?

MR. V. L. SOLOMON.—The question was referred to by every person who submitted himself for election to this Parliament.

The creation of the High Court and the Inter-State Commission were both advocated. I believe that the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. G. H. R. G. G. G., suggested in the Convention that a High Court should be constituted of the Justices of the Supreme Courts of the Colonies. That idea was not accepted by the Convention; but the honorable and learned member did not then oppose the creation of a High Court. Far from it; he even went the length of desiring to make the High Court the final court of appeal, and abolishing the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

MR. GLYNN.—But the Convention finally retained the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

MR. V. L. SOLOMON.—Yes, but to my mind that was a grave mistake, and one which should be remedied if possible. The importance of establishing a High Court and an Inter-State Commission is such that an expenditure of £30,000 or £40,000 per annum, which would be distributed amongst nearly 4,000,000 people, sinks into absolute insignificance compared with it. The Attorney-General gave it as his opinion that section 71 of the Constitution is mandatory, and I am inclined to agree with him, though other speakers have combated that view.

MR. WILKS.—While mandatory, it is permissive as to time.

MR. V. L. SOLOMON.—Yes; but I think that I shall be able to show that it has ceased to be permissive as to time, because of the action of this Parliament in passing certain measures. Section 71 reads as follows:—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction. The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and so many other Judges, not less than two, as the Parliament prescribes.

The Attorney-General argues that the judicial power of the Commonwealth must be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, and I agree with him. I am inclined to think that the Minister has missed the full meaning of one little word that puts a strong complexion upon his argument, and which seems to force us into the position of establishing the High Court. The word to which I refer is "and," and it occurs in this way—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, . . . and in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with Federal jurisdiction.

This does not provide that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, "or" any such other courts as the Parliament may create, "or" in such other courts as it invests with Federal jurisdiction, but it is provided that the three classes of Court specially mentioned shall be the repositories of the judicial power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN.—But the other Federal Courts have not yet been created.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—They have been, to some extent.

Mr. GLYNN.—No, they have not, and there will be no reason for creating them for another generation or two.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Certain Courts have been vested with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN.—Yes, but no "other Federal Courts" have been created by Parliament.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I am not so sure about that. I am inclined to think that Act No. 21, 1902, which makes temporary provision for enforcing claims against the Commonwealth, creates "other Federal Courts."

Mr. GLYNN.—No. That invests the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The Act to which I have referred contains the following provision:—

The Supreme Court of each State is hereby invested with Federal jurisdiction for the purpose of hearing and determining actions and suits brought under this Act, and shall have that jurisdiction as a court invested with Federal jurisdiction, and not otherwise.

Then we have Act No. 14, 1901, providing for the punishment of offences, which in section 3 provides—

The several courts and magistrates of each State exercising jurisdiction with respect to the summary conviction, or examination and commitment for trial, or trial upon indictment or information, of offenders against the laws of the State, shall have the like jurisdiction with respect to persons who are charged with offences against the laws of the Commonwealth committed within that State, or who may lawfully be tried within that State for offences committed elsewhere.

Provided that such jurisdiction shall not be judicially exercised with respect to the summary conviction or examination and commitment for trial of any person except by a Stipendiary, Police, or Special Magistrate, or some Magistrate of the State who is specially authorized by the Governor-General to exercise such jurisdiction.

In these two cases we have invested other courts with Federal jurisdiction, and we shall not completely carry out the provisions of section 71 of the Constitution if we ignore the opening words relating to the judicial power of the Commonwealth being vested in the High Court. This judicial power must be vested first and foremost in the High Court, and afterwards in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in other courts as it invests with jurisdiction. The section does not say "or" in other Federal Courts, &c. This appeals to my lay mind to afford the very strong reason why we should regard the Constitution as mandatory. It further occurs to me that we had no right to invest the State Court with Federal jurisdiction if we had established the judicial power of the Commonwealth by creating a High Court. That should have been the first step, and the others would have followed in natural order. I should not like to go to the length of saying that the action which has been taken in this respect is unconstitutional or ultra vires, but I hope that point will receive the attention of honorable and learned members. In connexion with the provision made for investing the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, I think, perhaps it will be advisable to limit the extent to which this may be done. I have not time to study the Bill as closely as I should have liked, but I fancy that some provision is made in that direction. The suggestion of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, that the Federal High Court should be constituted by the appointment of the Chief Justice of the States, does not commend itself to me. In the first place; most of our Chief Justices complain of being very much overworked, and the States Supreme Courts have frequently to hold over business from one sitting to another because of the lack of time and opportunity for dealing with it. Then again, the Chief Justices of the States are often called upon to act as Lieutenant-Governors, and in spite of all these demands upon their time and attention, it is suggested that we should throw upon the work of the Federal Supreme Court. That would mean that if Chief Justices of South Australia were called upon to take part in the deliberations of the High Court, he would be simultaneously filling the positions of Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Justice of the State Supreme Court, and Justice of the High Court. The same condition must obtain in any of the other States. I should like to ask honorable members what sort of work would be performed by a perambulating Court composed of the Chief Justices of the various States who would have to finish their ordinary work to meet together and decide a host of appeal cases?

JOSEPH COOK.—Why there would be such cases in a year?

V. L. SOLOMON.—More than ten cases would have arisen since this Government was first sworn in, had there been a High Court to which appeals could have been taken. Without exaggeration, I think that there would have been dozens of cases connected with the Customs administration. Only last week the spectacle was presented of a citizen of the Commonwealth desiring to appeal to a tribunal for damages on account of his documents, books, and papers having been seized by the Customs Department. The Supreme Court of New South Wales declared in that instance that it had no jurisdiction.

GLYNN.—That is because Parliament had last year to endow the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction.

V. L. SOLOMON.—I am satisfied that if the High Court had been established at the early history of the Commonwealth, such a difficulty would not have arisen.

WILKS.—The honorable member is alluding to Goldring's case.

V. L. SOLOMON.—I do not know the particulars of the case beyond those which I read in the newspapers.

Any individual in question can appeal to a tribunal for redress, because the provisions of the Constitution, for which the people have probably voted, have not been set aside. It is all very well for the honorable member to say that the position of that individual is due to the fact that Parliament refused to give extended powers to the existing Supreme Courts. But I ask was it contemplated that we should vest such powers in those Courts? If so the wording of the Constitution is very strange indeed, and the able legal talent which was consulted in the Federal Convention. The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the High Court, and yet we find that no tribunal exists which can determine the rights of our citizens. In the case to which I have drawn attention, the citizen cannot appeal to the Privy Council, because it is one in which his goods have been seized by a Commonwealth Department.

JOSEPH COOK.—The whole question is as to the expenditure that would be involved in establishing the High Court.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—This is not a question of what will be the cost of conferring a right upon one citizen, but of the cost of bestowing it upon every citizen. Let us come to a little more important matter—that of the establishment of the Inter-State Commission. Such a tribunal will probably be created by this Parliament, but it will be utterly valueless unless we erect the High Court, because the latter must decide all questions of law. If we refuse to establish the High Court, we shall absolutely prevent the Constitution from being carried out in two most important respects. Honorable members demur at the expenditure of £30,000 or £40,000 involved in the establishment of the High Court. But I would ask, did the people of Australia rise in arms over the question of the expenditure of a couple of hundred thousand pounds upon our legislation in connexion with the production of sugar? Did they offer any protest against a large increased expenditure in connexion with our mail contracts owing to the provision inserted in the Postal Act?

Mr. GLYNN.—They are talking about it enough just now.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—If this Parliament desired to spend only 1½d., there would still be newspapers and growlers at every street corner, condemning our doings in loud tones. Many of these growlers are entirely ignorant of the advantages being gained for them by their representatives in this Parliament, who are fighting to erect a Constitution of which future generations may be proud. Certain individuals will growl whatever the expense may be. Personally, I take very little notice of their criticisms. Even upon the eve of a general election, when it has been whispered in my ears that honorable members require to be unusually cautious before sanctioning any expenditure, I am prepared to justify the establishment of the High Court. I am not afraid that when the common sense portion of my constituents realize the necessities of the case, they will think any less of me for exercising my vote in the direction in which I intend to record it.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—The honorable member has not an Age or an Argus in South Australia.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Both daily newspapers in Adelaide are opposed to the creation of the High Court. I do not think that a court constituted of the Chief Justices could give proper time and thought to the consideration of the host of questions which are bound to come before a Federal High Court. We are very proud of our Constitution, but even in the brief period which has elapsed since the election of this Parliament we have discovered many blemishes in it. It contains numerous provisions upon which we have absolutely declined to permit the Privy Council to adjudicate. In the absence of a High Court, questions concerning its interpretation as between the Commonwealth and some of the States, or as between a State and State must absolutely be hung up. They cannot be dealt with by any other tribunal. Would it be fair to trust a mixed court sitting occasionally when time permitted—a court constituted of the Justices of the various Supreme Courts—to deal with all these cases? What sort of confidence would the people of South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales have in relegating to such a Court the big questions which will probably arise in the near future regarding the division and utilization of the Murray waters, and the interpretation to be placed upon that provision in our Constitution which contains the words “reasonable use.”

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARY

Mr. A. McLEAN.—Does the honorable member propose to go outside the Commonwealth for its Judges?

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—No, but I certainly wish to go outside the States Supreme Courts. Surely the honorable member does not imagine that the gentlemen who have been elevated to our States Judiciaries have been so raised because they were head and shoulders above all others practising at the Bar in their respective States? I have known of instances where the accident of who happened to be the Attorney-General of the day has had a great deal more to do with appointments to the Judicial Bench than has the particular ability of the gentlemen who were elevated to that position. I have seen the Attorney-General of the day quietly hoist himself into the office.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—Yes, in South Australia.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—It has occurred in more States than that of South Australia. Without questioning the integrity or ability of the States Judicial Benches, I do not think that all the highest legal intelligence of Australia is to be found on those Benches. We know that the contrary is the case. I do not think that the legal education and the career of our Chief Justices—who are pretty well aged—has been such as to lead them to evince a very strong interest in questions of constitutional law, whereas there are men in the different States, outside of the Supreme Courts Benches, whose special study for many years has been that of constitutional history and constitutional law. A great deal too much has been said upon the question of economy when we come to consider how very carefully the expenditure of the Federation has been guarded. It has been guarded to such an extent that except for the extraordinary charge upon our revenue involved in the payment of the sugar bonus, it would be well within the estimate framed at the time the Federal Convention sat for the purpose of framing the Constitution. That bonus is an extraordinary charge which was not reckoned upon at the time. Of course, the members of that Convention knew that there must be a loss in revenue if Australia prohibited the employment of black labour. The voice of this Parliament, and of a majority of the people, has insisted upon the abolition of black labour, and consequently we are faced with an expenditure which was never anticipated at the time of the Convention. A good deal has been said about the satisfactory nature of the appeals to the Privy Council. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne declared his belief that the cost of an appeal to the Privy Council would be no greater than that of an appeal to the High Court if it were established. I differ from him. I believe that when the High Court is created we shall find many able lawyers in Australia who will make themselves thoroughly competent to deal with cases of the class likely to come before it upon appeal, and that the cost of transferring those cases from the Supreme Courts of the States will not be nearly so great as that involved in an appeal to the Privy Council. It is all very well to estimate that cost upon the basis of the extremely high fees which are sometimes paid to the leaders of the Bar in the various States. Half-a-dozen leading men probably receive extremely high fees for conducting specially important cases. But the ordinary sort of appeal will be conducted for about one-fourth of what these lawyers would charge by equally clever and younger men. The Attorney-General has stated that the shortest time occupied by the Privy Council during the five years, in deciding an appeal from South Wales, was something under a year, that the longest period was three and ten months, whilst the average was one year and nine months. I venture to think that the longest period that could be occupied in the settlement of such cases by a properly constituted High Court would be less than six months.

A. McLEAN.—Then appeals would afterwards taken to the Privy Council.

V. L. SOLOMON.—Even if an appeal were subsequently made to the Privy Council, there would still be less likelihood of funds being made such as those provided by the Attorney-General. The very existence of the High Court would be of advantage to the Privy Council if any case of sufficient importance to justify its being taken to that body. But I venture to think that with a fairly strong High Court—a Court, the decisions of which would, as the years passed, gain the respect of the people of Australia, who are already predisposed to have their cases tried by a tribunal—litigants would be satisfied. The question of cost was raised—whether a popular spirit or not I do not know—the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the view taken by him has been echoed by certain other honorable members, who say that in addition to the expenditure involved in providing for the salaries of the Judges and their associates, as well as for travelling expenses, there will be the cost of providing courthouses, offices, and police officers necessary to deliver processes. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne says we should even require special gaols for prisoners of the Commonwealth. That conclusion is all very well, but it occurs to me that when the States know, as they must know, that the whole of the cost of the High Court has to be paid per capita by the individual States, very little desire will be shown by them to get anything done for the Commonwealth. They will recognise that the money will have to be repaid by them in another form, and they will not be pleased to render assistance to the Federal High Court, and to facilitate the process of its processes. They will be delighted to see the High Court established in reasonable reach of their own people. The Attorney-General estimates the maximum cost of this court at £30,000 per annum. I am inclined to think that he is cutting the figure rather low. Having regard to the expense involved in providing registrars, and Judges' associates, and in meeting travelling expenses and various other details which will have to be considered later on, I shall not be surprised to see the expenditure go a little higher. I believe that an expenditure of £30,000 per annum will be somewhere near the mark, although it will not be the maximum, and I do not think there will be much opposition on the part of the people to such an expenditure. I have read the Bill two or three times, but I have not yet studied it sufficiently to enable me to go closely into the provisions contained in the various clauses. In conclusion, I would point out that a Federal High Court was promised to the people of Australia. The High Court together with the Inter-State Commission were promised to protect the rights of the smaller States. It was specially referred to when they were asked to vote for the Constitution as put before them. The provision for it appeared in cold print in that Constitution, and whether the Court is constituted in the way suggested by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, or in any other way, it is our duty to see that it is established at the earliest possible moment. In that way alone shall we carry out our pledges. It would indeed be a pity if the second reading of the Bill were defeated. Whatever we may choose to do in regard to the details, I contend that the second reading should undoubtedly be carried. Let the clauses be amended in such a direction as may seem to be wise and just to the majority of honorable members. Control, if you choose, the amount of the original jurisdiction to which so much reference has been made, but above all things—for the credit of this Parliament, for the credit of those who induced the people of Australia to come into the Federation under this printed Constitution—let us pass the second reading of this Bill. I shall support it.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Tasmania).—I am quite satisfied that an extraordinary transformation has taken place within the last six or seven months. We now hear honorable members, who a few months ago were the greatest supporters of the court, standing up in this House and battling against the establishment of a High Court with all the determination of profound thinkers and mighty investigators. What has happened? It is difficult for me to understand this extraordinary change. But I always read a certain great journal very carefully, and I take it as being the thermometer of the Victorian temperature for political morality. After reading it I invariably know the way in which the crow will jump. I do not know why it is so, but it is remarkable that one is able to obtain such information in the way I have described. I intend this afternoon to be fair. My whole nature is permeated with the desire to be fair to every one. When I see the poor down I help to lift them up, and when I see the rich down I go to their rescue. I well remember the statements that were made not only in South Australia, but in Victoria and New South Wales, by every man who stood on the platform prior to the Federation, in regard to the glorious Constitution. I remember hearing them speak of the fairyland into which we were about to enter, and declaring that the dome of the Constitution was the High Court. Alas, that after the lapse of a few short years, I should now stand here absolutely saddened by the change in the brethren. I do not propose to discuss this matter as a lawyer. Indeed, I am sorry that I am not a lawyer, for I should like to secure some of the fees which are flying around this country. I shall endeavour to discuss this Bill according to my understanding. I have heard honorable members who belong to the legal profession assert that certain powers cannot be exercised—that the Federal Court would have no power to deal with any State law which in its very essence was a violation of the Constitution. The Constitution guarantees life and liberty in the pursuit of happiness. That being so, if a State passes a law which cripples that liberty, does it not stand to reason that the High Court, on appeal, would declare that law to be unconstitutional. Would it not be in violation of the Constitution? The fact is that most of the lawyers out here know no more about this Constitution than do the lay members of the community. They have not lived and developed under a Federal Constitution; they have not yet had the experience which is necessary to enable them to understand really what the Constitution means. I do not claim to know everything, but I contend that I know a little. I have lived in Canada, in the

Mr. O'Malley.

United States, and in Mexico, and I know that whenever a State passes a law that the people of the United States believe to be an infringement of their liberties, a sum of money is at once raised, lawyers are engaged, and the whole matter is swept into the Federal Court. That Court examines it carefully, and if satisfied that the law is a violation of the Constitution it declares it to be unconstitutional. In nearly every case in which action has been taken that result has followed. I remember the time when, in the State of Missouri, a number of men were slipped into gaol under some kind of suppression law similar to the measure introduced the other day in the Victorian State Parliament. They were sent to gaol without a hearing; a trial was refused them. I speak with some experience of these matters, and experience is the unerring test of all human undertakings. It is useless to tell me that occasions do not occur when people are excited, and when even the Judge on the Bench is carried away by popular clamour. Such things do occur. I believe that the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, will remember very well a case in which I figured before the Supreme Court of South Australia, and the popular clamour which existed at that time. The people were excited, and because of my Barnaid's Bill I was looked upon as a scoundrel by the licensed victuallers. You, too, Mr. Speaker, will remember that occasion. I went to a Judge, and what did I obtain? Some of my honorable friends, who belong to the aristocracy, will say that I got far too much for my character. But that is a question. Every man should stand equal in the eyes of the law, and unless you can bring some charge against a man's character, he should not be condemned by public clamour. Unfortunately, however, such a thing sometimes occurs. Returning to the men who were thrown into gaol in the State of Missouri, I should say that I well remember that as the result of an appeal to the Federal Court, these men were liberated, and that the State was ashamed of having brought a charge against them. Similar cases have occurred within my knowledge in the State of Texas. The men appealed from the State Court to the United States Circuit Court, with the result that they, too, were liberated. Notwithstanding the good feeling which I entertain towards the Judges on the various State Benches, I maintain until we secure a High Court there can be no certainty of liberty in the Commonwealth. I may be mistaken, but that is my impression. Experience, travel, observation, investigation may be of no use to some estimable members, but the belief is entertained in the United States and Canada that the Federal Supreme Courts of those countries stand out nobly and grandly above all the other tribunals, and deal with justice fairly and impartially. Let me make an illustration showing what will be the position upon the establishment of a High Court. I do not say for the moment that the Judges of the States are prejudiced, but they are human. They may live in communities where popular prejudice prevails. I saw something of the kind here only the other day. In such circumstances, what would a resident of an island do if he desired to sue a man living in Hobart? He would serve a writ on the defendant requiring him to attend before the High Court. A Judge of the High Court would then go over to the island, and preside on the Bench there. He would give the various Supreme Courts of the Federal circuit jurisdiction, and if they were done the Judge of the High Court would go to Hobart and sit on the Bench with the local Judge. The case would be dealt with there, and if either party were dissatisfied he would be able to appeal from Hobart to the High Court, which is constituted, at Melbourne. In that case he would obtain satisfaction. It has been said that the right of appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council will still remain. I hold that such a right will not be necessary. The Constitution gives the right, and we are at liberty to decide which class of cases should be allowed to go on appeal to the Privy Council. Every estimable member who has spoken has done so in favour of the creation of some kind of a High Court. What is it to be? The States Governments have appointed Judges, and if certain members of the States Courts are selected for the High Court they must be appointed for life. As they have been selected, however, the States would be relieved of them, and the protective Governments will replace them with other Judges. Is not that what would be the result? I would ask the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, whether he is in favour of some kind of a High Court? I am sure the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, in favour of the establishment of a High Court, whose members shall be the Chief Justices of the Supreme Courts of the States? But let me point out to him that the Constitution provides that the Judges of the High Court shall be appointed for life, and that, once appointed, Parliament shall have no control over them. How any member of the labour party can vote against the establishment of a High Court is beyond my comprehension. There is shortly to come before this House a Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. Do the people whom we represent, those men imbued with the spirit of God, consider that a Federal Court of Conciliation and Arbitration should be presided over by a Judge of one of the States Courts, and that the Act by which it is created should be interpreted by the Privy Council? Do they want a Judge of one of the Supreme Courts to preside over the Conciliation and Arbitration Court, and perhaps administer the law in accordance with the savage bigotry and sectarianism of the State from which he has come? Do they want to break down the law, so that employers' associations in other parts of the world will point to it as a failure? Do they want to make the law a failure by allowing it to be falsely interpreted by a prejudiced Judge? Or do they wish to see the Conciliation and Arbitration Court presided over by a Judge of the High Court, with an appeal to that court? I was sorry to hear the only legal light in our party—the stevedore party—oppose the Bill. But even the twelve apostles were not all of the same spirit, and the honorable and learned member's action is another proof that some are always liable to stray. Last year there was a great battle in this Chamber over a proposal to pay away over £250,000 in bonuses for the establishment of the iron industry. If I am not mistaken, nearly every one of the Christians who fought heroically for that proposal are opposed to the establishment of a High Court, although a High Court could be run for nearly fifteen years without costing as much as it was then proposed to pay away in a lump sum. I do not forget that thousands of pounds were voted without a word of protest in order that men might be sent to South Africa. But now that it is proposed to spend £23,000 a year in interpreting the Constitution, so that its provisions may be made clear, and the people may understand the laws under which they live, great opposition is being shown to the proposal. Honorable members who were against any reduction of the military Estimates providing for gold braid and horse chestnuts are heroically opposing the proposed expenditure of £23,000 a year upon the establishment of a court which is absolutely necessary. The decisions of the Inter-State Commission must be interpreted by a High Court or by some other court. Are honorable members willing to hand over the work of interpretation to State Judges? The Judges of the High Court will be selected from the greatest men in the Commonwealth. No man can be a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States until he has had 25 years of successful practice. I do not know of an instance in which a Judge of one of the States Courts has been appointed to the Supreme Court Bench. Why is that? It is because the Judges of the States Courts become prejudiced by their environment. Human beings are only human beings, and in moments of excitement are often not to be trusted. During the late railway strike in Melbourne, the best friends I have almost insulted me in the streets because I was unable to see as they saw on the matter. Could I, under such extraordinary circumstances, have hoped for justice from such men? What would have been the verdict if they had composed a jury to try me for some alleged offence? I should have had to go to gaol for ten years. Take an instance of what actually occurred. Three men were arrested and brought down from the North Melbourne Police Court to Russell-street, and next Monday morning twelve or fifteen antiquarians, who had been preserved since the dark ages and transmitted to posterity by the art of the embalmer, were waiting to condemn them. The Victorian Government withdrew the information, because no charge could be brought against the men; but if the case had been allowed to go on, they would each have got three months. Why? Because the men appointed to try them were men who had no control of themselves in times of excitement. We want a High Court whose members will be selected from amongst the ablest lawyers in Australia. Whether they happen to be politicians or not, I care little; but I want them to be men who are not prejudiced in favour of the Commonwealth, but are in sympathy with its aims, and full of the love of justice. If there is one thing is peculiarly characteristic of lians, before they become prejudiced foreign ideas, it is their love of and of justice. We want the Judge High Court to be above the prejudice bigotry of the States, so that people feel that they are suffering injustice, appeal to them, and be certain of justice, or, at least, of getting very it. But while I intend to vote establishment of a High Court, I have been better pleased if the Attorney-General had proposed a court which consist of three Judges—a Chief Justice to receive £3,000 a year, and two Judges, to receive £2,500 each. But not going to storm about the salaries proposed. If an amount such as £100,000 were at stake in a dispute between the States and the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth lost its case through incompetency of the Judge appointed to try it, it would lose much more than the cost of the court. I always go for the bill, because, in the end, it is cheapest. If you have a bad case, you must obtain the services of the best attorney you can get. It is the best thing to have a cheap attorney, I believe in the establishment of the High Court, because without it the Constitution will be incomplete. It will be like a building without a roof, well enough on fine days, but on wet days every one has to leave it. I shall have great pleasure in voting for the Bill.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—Feel I do, that the High Court is a necessary corollary to the establishment of the Federal Executive and Legislature, and essential to complete the Federal arch, I support the motion for the second reading of the Bill. No measure has received such a scarifying at the hands of its opponents as this measure has received. As the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, were present at the convention in 1891, and at similar gatherings held subsequently when this matter was discussed, their opinions are entitled to the highest respect. At the 1891 Convention a series of resolutions regarding the Judiciary were submitted by Sir John Parkes, and the Prime Minister and Attorney-General supported them. The res-ing particularly to the establishment of a High Court for Australia proposed—

Judiciary, consisting of a Federal Supreme Court which shall constitute a High Court of Australia, under the direct authority of the Sovereign, whose decisions, as such, shall be final.

DEAKIN.—Yes, but that was a Court of appeal only.

FULLER.—Yes. Sir Henry Parkes said—speaking to create this Supreme Court of Australia it will be observed that I seek to create it an Appellate Court from which there shall be no appeal to the Queen in the Privy Council.

is the whole of the difference. He think we shall make a great mistake if we allow any appeal to be made outside the shores of New Australia.

ould remind the Attorney-General, who reported the resolution, that he is not bringing out that resolution by means of this Bill.

DEAKIN.—Hear, hear; because it is possible.

FULLER.—I know that it is impossible under the Constitution to go to the length of that resolution. Whilst I am supporting the Bill on the second reading I reserve to myself the right to submit amendments, or to support others which may be proposed. It is absurd for honorable members to contend that the subject of establishing the High Court was not introduced before the public of Australia during the federal campaign. I do not suppose there was one platform from which references were not made to the High Court.

G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, it was "the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill."

FULLER.—The honorable member is quite right. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said that the Constitution Bill was not agreed to by the people because provision was made for appeal to the High Court, but in spite of that fact. I should like to know what warrant the honorable and learned member has for making that statement. In the smaller States, particularly, the advocates of federation in the High Court a very prominent place, and pointed out that it would afford the guarantee of their freedom and liberties, and also give them assurance that, in the event of any difficulty arising, it would not be necessary to go through the long and expensive process provided for in the Constitution in order to secure some trifling amendment, but that the High Court, acting on the up-to-date lines adopted in the United States, would make the Constitution a workable instrument for the whole of Australia. For this reason alone it seems to me that the establishment of the High Court is absolutely necessary. Some honorable members have urged that there will be no business for the High Court to transact. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, said that the court would have to sit in solemn silence, and wait for business to turn up. Upon this point I should like to quote some remarks made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne at the Federal Convention held in Melbourne in 1898. He pointed out that some members of the Convention had been contending, just as has happened to-day, that there would be no business for the Court, and this was his reply—

It has been said that there will not be enough business for the court. I do not think that what happened in the United States affords any clue to the business that will be done here. In the early years of the Constitution of the United States there was very little federal business. There were then no Inter-State railways, and very few Inter-State canals, and the relations of State with State were much less intimate than they have been since the introduction of railways.

Mr. SYMON.—What was their commerce then?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Owing to the conditions of travel, it was impossible that there could be such Inter-State relations and Inter-State difficulties as there will be under the complexity of modern commerce, and we in Australia will share in the complexity of modern commerce, although we cannot suppose that, with our small population, we shall have as much legislation, and as much litigation, as America had in the Federal Parliament and in the Federal Court.

Thus we find that the honorable and learned member in the year mentioned entertained a strong opinion that there would be ample business to engage the attention of the High Court.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Were not appeals much more restricted under the draft Constitution at that time than they were subsequently?

Mr. FULLER.—Not so far as I can remember.

Mr. GLYNN.—The right of appeal to the Privy Council was abolished at Adelaide, and, perhaps, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was speaking in view of that fact.

Mr. FULLER.—Perhaps that would to some extent affect the business to be transacted by the High Court, but I am simply showing honorable members what was the opinion held by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne in 1898. A great deal has been made of the value of appeals to the Privy Council. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, speaking upon this subject, is reported at page 338 of the records of the Convention of 1898 as follows:—

Not one man in 100,000 cares a snuff about a Privy Council appeal. Very few people go there—only a few wealthy corporations, and a few working against them particularly. Who cares about the Privy Council, or the Privy Council appeals? It is not a matter of popular rights. It is simply a question of whether we here, in framing a Constitution are too timid to take upon ourselves the responsibility of carrying out rights between party and party. Of course I admit there is no popular demand for it. But I ask is there a popular demand that the appeal to the Privy Council should be given.

It appears to me that a popular demand has been made for the High Court. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo said that the public opinion of Victoria was against the establishment of such a Court, but I should like to know how he arrives at that conclusion. So far as I am aware, there have been no public meetings held to protest against the establishment of the Court. It is true that both the Age and the Argus have been publishing very strong articles in opposition to the Government proposal, but I should like to know whether we are to be guided in our legislative actions by the opinions of the newspapers in the State capital in which Parliament happens to be holding its meetings. If so, the sooner we get away to the Federal capital the better.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—When we get to the Federal capital we shall probably have the Bombala Snorter seeking to direct our actions in Parliament.

Mr. FULLER.—I do not know how we shall fare in that regard, but I hope that there will be no further unnecessary delay in establishing Parliament at the permanent seat of Government. The great daily papers of Sydney are just as strong in their advocacy of the High Court as are the daily papers of Melbourne in their opposition to it.

Mr. CONROY.—They may be in favour of the High Court, but at the same time may not support the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That cannot be. Those who are against a High Court of any kind would vote against the Bill.

Mr. FULLER.—I cannot speak with confidence with regard to press opinion in other States, but, as I have pointed out, honours are easy so far as the Argus and the Age of Sydney and Melbourne are concerned. There can be no question of the value of the Bill in providing for the establishment of a Court, we shall be simply carrying out what was promised to the people at the time the Constitution was submitted. I was told at that time that we should have the "whole Bill and nothing but the Bill." I was opposed to the Constitution Bill at that time, now that it has become law I am as much in favour of it as any other honorable member in the Convention. I determined to see that effect is given to it in every respect. We have heard a great deal about the necessity for economy and the figures which the Attorney-General has submitted relating to the cost of maintaining the High Court have met with much objection. Upon this point the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne spoke very strongly at the Convention of 1898. He said that it would not be deterred by any consideration of expense from making the High Court a weighty and influential tribunal. Now he is using his best efforts to prevent its establishment. So much has been said with regard to Privy Council appeals that I would think that the Privy Council is a kind of heaven-sent institution with which we could not get along in Australia. I have the greatest admiration for the British Empire and for its courts of justice, and recognise that in years gone by the Privy Council has given decisions of importance to the people of Australia. I would like to direct attention to what the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said regarding the Privy Council at the Convention which met in Adelaide in 1897. At page 986 of the records of the Convention he is reported to have made the following expressions:—

There are certain phrases becoming current about this subject which are scarcely appropriate to the position. It is said that we are one of the links which binds Australia to the United Kingdom. I rather like the expression "link" if you consider it one of the irritating "links" one of the fetters round the feet of the people of Australia—then, of course, it is by no means conducive to amity between the old count and ourselves. If there is an appeal to the Privy Council when one of the parties to the ac-does not like that body. As a rule both like the Council because of the expense. In, it is to be regarded as conducive to between England and Australia I do not how many are effected by this appeal to the Council? I undertake to say there is an in 100,000 who has an appeal to go to the Privy Council; and I am sorry to think William Zeal, and others who agree with me, that this appeal to the Privy Council is the means by which the Empire is held

WILLIAM ZEAL.—I have not expressed an opinion on it. You have talked me out.

W. GIGINS.—We have a stronger link with the country than this—a silken tie in the form of language, history, and sentiment—this miserable right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Strong language for the honorable member to use in connexion with the right of appeal.

W. CROUCH.—He still takes up that argument and would consent to the creation of an Australian court if the appeal to the Privy Council were abolished.

W. FULLER.—Quite so. I quote the honorable member's opinion of the learned member's opinion of the Privy Council at the time. I do not labour this matter, because after the advances of the Attorney-General, and who have declared in favour of the Bill, there is very little left to add. The opposite side of the case has been well and strongly put. I believe under the Constitution it is necessary to abolish this court immediately. It was the principal matters which were submitted to the people of Australia at the time of the federal referendum, and we shall be true to our trust if we do not create the court at the earliest possible moment. Now, I do not agree with every proposition contained in this Bill. I think that, to a large extent, it fails in the provision made for the Court of Appeal which is proposed to establish. With all the jurisdiction which it is proposed to give it, it appears to me that five Judges are inadequate to perform the duties required of them. All these points will require serious consideration in committee. I give them that consideration which the urgency of the occasion demands, and that honorable members, generally, pursue the same course in the interests of Australia.

W. SALMON (Launceston).—As a layman very loath to obtrude my opinion concerning this measure, which may be regarded as one of a strictly legal character. Though it will have very far-reaching effects, it is of immediate interest only to the legal profession. At the same time I feel that the statements made and the arguments advanced by the supporters of the Bill need to be dealt with by honorable members outside of that profession. As one who assisted to insure the acceptance by the people of the Federal Constitution, who believes in that Constitution, and is prepared to sacrifice everything to maintain it in its integrity, I say that there is no breach of its provisions involved in further deferring the consideration of this Bill. I agree with the appointment of a High Court, and I thoroughly indorse the action of those who were responsible for the very important position assigned to it under the Constitution; but I entirely fail to see that there is any obligation imposed upon this Parliament to immediately institute a Federal Judiciary.

Mr. EWING.—Why leave the responsibility and odium to others?

Mr. SALMON.—I do not think there is any odium attaching to the matter at all. My attitude is very largely dictated by expediency. I desire to see the Constitution—which has not been working with as much smoothness as we could desire—fitted to the needs of the people in such a way that they will not feel that they have been betrayed. At the inauguration of the Commonwealth, the greatest danger against which we have to guard is that of extravagance. Throughout the length and breadth of Australia charges have been levelled against this Parliament. It has been asserted that we have disregarded the wants of the people; that we have not practised due economy; and have set a bad example to the State Parliaments. I do not admit the truth of these allegations. But if this measure is carried, and we thereby impose an additional burden of £30,000 annually upon the taxpayers, we shall merit their displeasure, and some of the odium which undoubtedly will be cast upon us. In the absence of a time limit, which was most carefully inserted where it was thought necessary by the framers of the Constitution, I hold that we are not bound to at once constitute the High Court. I object to its immediate establishment primarily upon the ground of the expense that it would involve; and, secondly, because I fail to see any immediate necessity for its creation. If it were clear that a very large number of people actually suffered from the lack of a Federal Judiciary, even in face of the expenditure involved, I should not be willing to further postpone its creation. But the evidence is all in the other direction. Indeed, one of the strongest arguments against its establishment was that advanced by the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. V. L. Solomon, when he declared that its erection would mean the beginning of an enormous amount of litigation. If we can avoid the increase of litigation we shall render a double service to the Commonwealth, by saving the expenditure that would be incurred in carrying out the Government proposal, and by depriving people of the opportunity of indulging in what is always an expensive luxury. In his endeavour to show that the creation of the High Court was necessary, the honorable member for South Australia affirmed that quite a number of appeals would have come before that tribunal had it been in existence. But he also admitted that these would be litigants, with the exception of one who is labouring under a peculiar disability, were satisfied with the decisions given by the States Supreme Courts, which have been invested with federal jurisdiction. The honorable and learned member for Illawarra hinted that the Victorian representatives in this House who are opposed to the Bill were following the dictation of the daily press rather than the desires of their constituents. But I would point out to him that in this State the press follows public opinion rather than attempts to lead it. He alluded to the absence of public meetings to protest against the passage of this measure. But in Victoria I might inform him that if the daily press evinces any intention of forcing public opinion along an improper channel, it is the practice to hold public meetings in all parts of the State to protest against it. That has happened within the last few weeks, and it would occur again very readily if the people imagined that they were being misrepresented by the metropolitan press. During the past fortnight I have travelled over a very considerable part of this State, and I have never heard a desire expressed by any single individual for the establishment of the High Court.

Mr. CROUCH.—What has that to do with the matter?

Mr. Salmon.

Mr. SALMON.—I am merely replying to the argument of the honorable learned member for Illawarra. More than the Victorian press has had a good deal to do with placing the finances of this State upon a proper basis, whereas the South Wales press, which differs from the Victorian press upon this particular measure, has never in the past shown any great desire to exercise economy. The present condition of that State is ample justification for my statement. In Victoria we are paying a heavy penalty for previous extravagance, and the people of this State, having been severely scorched, are not anxious to place themselves too near the fire in future.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What evidence has the honorable member as to the condition of New South Wales?

Mr. SALMON.—My statement is confirmed by the reception which was accorded to the last loan placed upon the London market by that State.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would remind the honorable member that he is departing from the subject under discussion.

Mr. SALMON.—I think we have seen the sight of one very important factor which the Attorney-General drew attention to with great point when dealing with the finances of the Commonwealth. He emphasized the fact that the State and Commonwealth taxpayer are identical. The same argument is applicable to the work to be performed by the Federal Judiciary. I believe that we can do so by some means whereby the present courts can undertake all the urgent work which would otherwise devolve upon the Federal High Court. It must be remembered that we have not deprived the people of Australia of the opportunity of appeal to the Privy Council. That right remains to every citizen in the Commonwealth. Under these circumstances it should not be justified in incurring additional expenditure—expenditure which cannot calculate with any degree of accuracy but which has been variously estimated from £30,000 to £60,000 per annum. It is not merely the amount involved in the salaries of the High Court Judges that we have to consider. We have to consider the expenditure necessary to provide for every one whose services are required as an adjunct to the court—from the Chief Justice down to the crier. It means also imposing upon the Commonwealth the payment of a cerber of pensions. All these points ought to be considered by honorable members. I think that there is no immediate necessity for the establishment of the High Court, I did not vote against the second reading of the Bill. My regard for the Attorney-General, who—as the two Bills which have been submitted to us show—has undertaken a enormous amount of patriotic and self-sacrificing labour in connexion with this Bill, makes it extremely difficult for me to adopt the attitude which I have taken. But I owe a duty to the citizens of the Commonwealth, and I cannot allow myself to be swayed by personal feelings.

MR. WILKS.—There is no personal friendship in politics.

MR. SALMON.—There ought not to be any question so vitally affecting the interests of the Federation. I understand the Government regard this question as an important one, and I think that they are wise in bringing it forward. They were bound to bring this question forward at some time or the other, and I do not think they have incurred any blame by introducing it at the present time, although they would have displayed better judgment had they postponed its consideration for a year or two, until there was clearly an urgent necessity for it. When that time arrives I am sure that honorable members upon both sides of the House will support them to carry out what is the evident intention of the framers of the Constitution. At the same time, I hold that the Constitution contains no mandatory order for the immediate institution of this particular measure.

Upon these grounds I regret that I cannot support the second reading of the

MR. CROUCH (Corio).—I did not intend to speak during the second reading of this Bill, but I have arranged to do so with another honorable member, and my name will not appear in the division list. If it comes on to-night, I feel that I could very clearly express the reasons which actuate me in supporting the Government. I sincerely trust that they will carry the second reading of the Bill. I shall support this measure for the reason that I believe that the sooner the High Court is established, the better it will be for the Commonwealth. I very much regret that during the negotiations, prior to the acceptance of the Constitution by the British Parliament with Mr. Chamberlain, amendments were made in the Constitution which, while perhaps assisting the passage of the measure through the Imperial Parliament, were certainly contrary to the wishes of those who brought the Bill through the Convention, and of those who sent the delegates to England to facilitate its passage into law.

SIR EDMUND BARTON.—We had a very hard fight to obtain what we did.

MR. CROUCH.—I am certain that the Prime Minister and those associated with him fought very hard, and I very much regret that their efforts in the direction of making the Australian Court the final court of appeal were not entirely successful. Any one who studies the recent history of the Privy Council will see that there is need for the creation of a High Court. Residents of the United Kingdom have a right of appeal to the House of Lords; but only those who reside outside the United Kingdom, except in regard to ecclesiastical matters, have to appeal to the King in Council. As a consequence, the Privy Council is inferior in authority to the House of Lords, and its decisions are quoted and regarded in that light in our own courts. This also largely arises from the inferior status of Privy Council Judges.

MR. CONROY.—But the Bill does not take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

MR. CROUCH.—I object to the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and to that right of appeal remaining in full force, as it undoubtedly will, unless we create the Australian High Court.

MR. CONROY.—But we cannot take away that right of appeal.

MR. CROUCH.—I am aware that to a very limited extent we are compelled to allow an appeal to the Crown; but our Parliament can regulate and almost entirely abolish that right, and if we have a half-way house, and particularly if that half-way house comprises the best legal ability obtainable in the States, it is far more likely that the decisions obtained in that Court will satisfy litigants, and that they will have no desire to go to the Privy Council.

MR. CONROY.—Why should they go to a half-way Court when they can go direct to the ultimate Court of Appeal?

Mr. CROUCH.—I believe that most of those who go to the Privy Council are dissatisfied with the Supreme Courts of the States, but that they would accept the decision of a Supreme Court consisting of Judges coming from States other than those in which their cases were originally determined. I think that the creation of an Australian court would largely help to do away with the necessity for the Privy Council, just as in consequence of the creation of the Federal Court in Canada the number of appeals from that State was largely reduced. I think it is to be regretted that when the Privy Council made an attack, and a very insulting attack upon the Supreme Court of New Zealand, this Parliament did not show its sympathy for the institution of a sister colony by reprobating the language used by the home tribunal. I protest against the use of language of that kind towards any of the Supreme Courts of the States by Judges who do not appreciate Australian legal ability, and do not understand Australian legislation or local conditions. In the New Zealand case, the language used was so outrageous that it was necessary for the Chief Justice of that State to protest against it. Cases have also occurred in which the Privy Council has used objectionable language in reference to the Victorian courts. The sooner the High Court is established the sooner we shall have the complement of the Australian Constitution. The necessity for an Australian Appellate Court has been brought home very vividly to one of my own constituents by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, that the imports of a State government are not liable to pay duty. Shortly before the decision was given the gentleman in question placed an order in England for some £50,000 or £60,000 worth of machinery which is protected under the Tariff, but as the result of that judgment the order has been cancelled until it is known what the Government propose to do in regard to it. If the Government finds it necessary to appeal to the Privy Council, it has no means, such as would exist in the Australian court, of bringing its case on promptly for hearing in cases of urgency affecting many business arrangements.

Mr. CONROY.—Why should not the Government have provided for simply an Appellate Court?

Mr. CROUCH.—The High Court which will be created under this Bill will either appeal to the Government, or any other litigant will appeal immediately from the State Court to the Federal tribunal, and to have its decision speedily determined. The honorable member for Northern Melbourne urged that because we have the Privy Council, and because the Court proposed in the Bill will not be a final court of appeal, we should not have a High Court. He has also said, with equal force, that as the Parliament of the United Kingdom has, unfortunately, the final control of our legislation we should not have any Australian Parliament. As it is, the legislation of the Australian Parliament can be over-ruled by an Imperial Act, and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, together with others who argue that because we have a High Court it should not be created, might just as well take up the position that we should not have a Federal legislative body because we are some 10,000 miles away one which does all the legislation necessary for us. I desire Australia to be self-contained in every direction. When the Privy Council ceases to work, the Australian Court will be complete, and will be immediately to take over the work of hearing all judicial appeals. I think the real question relates to the Commonwealth itself. The honorable member for Gippsland has spoken against the proposed High Court, while the honorable member for Laanecoorie asserts that there are many of the public who do not favor its creation. In this matter, however, I think that those outside Parliament are the ones of whom we should think.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—They are the people who have to pay.

Mr. CROUCH.—Certainly, they have to pay, but they and the press are considering this matter purely as a question of economy; and there are times when public opinion is really the last consideration which should be considered by honorable members. That is more especially the case when public opinion is misled by the press, and when the people themselves have not had time to study the question at issue. I venture to say that of the thousands with whom the honorable member for Laanecoorie fesses to have discussed this matter, not out of every 100 have read the Bill nor speech delivered by the Attorney-General in moving its second reading. We are here as the leaders of the community. We are chosen as its most intelligent representatives, and in a matter of this sort should have regard to our own opinions, and we think it is best for the Commonwealth that a certain course should be followed we should stand up against public opinion—we should do what is best for the Australian people.

Mr. CONROY.—Or the best thing for the voters.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable and learned member insinuates that this Bill will be a good thing for the lawyers I think he would insinuate anything.

Mr. WILKS.—Is it not a good thing for the lawyers?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. CROUCH.—I come now to the question of economy. It is not by any means certain that members of the Supreme Courts of the States will not be chosen to positions on the High Court. They might be chosen, although I think it would be far better to have the position filled by politicians. A lawyer, who is also a politician, knows the constitutional points which are likely to come before this court. And the pleasure of hearing the Attorney-General arguing before the Full Court in Victoria a few days ago, and I was glad to see that he succeeded in winning his case.

He had the greatest difficulty in making the Judges grasp certain constitutional points, from the fact that they had no political experience. The member of the Victorian Supreme Court Bench who has had political experience is the Chief Justice, and when we remember the questions which will be argued before the High Court and the constitutional matters with which they will have to deal, we must recognise that next to being a good lawyer it is essential that a member chosen to act as a High Court Judge should have had parliamentary experience. At any other point I desire to touch upon one of the salaries to be paid. It appears to me that the salaries proposed in the Bill are too high, and that they are really on a scale of the Victorian Supreme Court. They should not take the State expenditures as precedent, but should economize on them.

There is a popular impression that a Judge suffers considerable monetary loss in leaving the bar for the Bench. On this point I should like to make the following quotation from the Memoir of the late Chief Justice Higinbotham, written by his son-in-law, Professor Morris:—

The profession of barrister was not by any means so lucrative to Mr. Higinbotham as to others in a leading position. It has often been said that he made a patriotic sacrifice in taking a judgeship. As a matter of fact it was no sacrifice at all. The salary of a Judge of the Supreme Court is £3,000 a year; and only in one year had his practice at the bar brought in as much.

Mr. CONROY.—He mixed himself up too much in political matters.

Mr. CROUCH.—For some years Chief Justice Higinbotham did not figure in politics.

Mr. CONROY.—He lost a great deal owing to his association with political matters.

Mr. CROUCH.—For a considerable time he was not mixed up in politics. He was a leading barrister when he left the bar for the Bench, and yet his Memoir shows that his elevation to the Bench involved no monetary loss to him. I think this Bill will be of great value to every citizen, and I trust the House will accept it.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I apprehend that no legislative proposal has been yet offered for the consideration of the Federal Parliament which was more pregnant with the future of this Commonwealth than is the Bill now before us. So far there has been nothing, not even the Tariff—which can be recast and remodelled at our will—which has called for so close and careful an investigation into the terms of the instrument of government under which we live, as the measure so ably and eloquently introduced by the Attorney-General. I think that I should not be acting fairly if, before passing to the principles which we have to consider, I did not say a word or two about the composition of the Bill. However much we may differ about the propriety of enacting it, either in its present or in an amended form, and whatever we may consider the just fate of the measure, I think we can all agree that the lucidity of its expression, its comprehensiveness, the symmetry of its arrangement, and the manner in which its provisions cover almost all the essentials of the subject, reflect very great honour upon the honorable and learned gentleman who has had the privilege of introducing it. I think that, together with the speeches which he has delivered in moving the second reading on two occasions, it will add to even his reputation. I shall have occasion, in the course of my observations, to make reference to some of its provisions, of course not in the detail which is more appropriate to another stage; but I now pass by the consideration of particular clauses, to inquire what are the principles which should guide us in casting our votes for or against the measure. I agree thoroughly with many of the honorable members who have preceded me that one great question which we have to put to ourselves is this: Is there a mandate to the Federal Parliament to pass the measure? I take it that if such a mandate is to be found in the Constitution we are not at liberty to disregard it. We are not here for the purpose of remodelling the Constitution. If those who represented the people of Australia in the framing of the compact laid down in it an imperative duty, and the people by accepting it on more than one occasion confirmed that duty, and if while the Bill was under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament—during which time the fiercest light of criticism, both British and Australian, was concentrated upon these very judicial provisions—there was no hint of an alteration in the construction of the High Court, or of its abolition, or of the substitution for it of some other tribunal, a very great responsibility will rest upon those who advise us at this juncture to ignore so plain and definite a duty. I think that calm and careful consideration of the terms of the Constitution will leave no room whatever for doubt that there is such a mandate. After the best consideration I can give to the matter, I believe that there is an obligation resting upon this Parliament to carry out the bargain, and to effectuate the intention of the people of Australia, as evidenced in the only way we can recognise it. I quite admit that it is an obligation of an imperfect nature, that is to say, we are not under any compelling force but our consciences in regard to it. There is no power on earth, short of an Act of the Imperial Parliament, which can compel us to move a single step in this or any other direction without our will. There is no force known to nature, short of such an Act, which can correct our wilful inaction. We are told that if there is a mandate, if there is an imperative command, we are at liberty to disobey it, because no one can go to a competent tribunal and procure a mandamus to compel us to perform our admitted duty. There are many things which are of imperfect obligation in that sense. It is a perfect obligation to be truthful; it is an imperfect obligation upon any country to carry out its treaty pledges. I believe in the sense in which the phrase has been put before us in this House, half the commandments of the decalogue are imperfect obligations. But if we pass by the literal meaning of the phrase, and look only to its spirit, we find in the Constitution the clear and definite duty to proceed without delay to the establishment of the Federal Supreme Court of Australia, and to equip it with the means and power to discharge its great responsibilities and necessary functions. Whether we look at the Constitution with the eyes of a student or of a lawyer, or simply as citizens, we cannot fail to find the greatest recognition in it of the foundation upon which the Federal Government rests. Considerations of history and reason, and the long deliberations of many years, led the two great Conventions of 1891 and 1897 to the conclusion that and every one of the three great pillars of the government—the Federal Executive, the Federal Legislature, and the Federal Judiciary—were essential to a true federation. Amid all the dissensions as to the adoption of the Constitution, among all the struggles for its amendment, through that final commotion regarding the right of appeal, we heard not a word, not a suggestion, as to the desirability of altering the provisions we are now debating with reference to the constitution of the tribunal which is to be charged with the interpretation and enforcement of the Constitution and the laws made under it. I think we shall derive very great help in dealing with this question from a consideration of the sections in the Constitution which relate to the judicature. If honorable members would, during the course of the observations which I shall make, the honour to make to them, refer to those sections, I think they will be better able to follow me, whether they agree with me or differ in their conclusions from those which I desire to place before them for consideration. Section 71 is a central provision which should guide operations and in our votes upon this. That section provides that—

Judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia.

That provision, as I read it, is imperative. We have to bring under the notice of the House the most luminous judgment—one of the great American judgments to which I referable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, referred—which, I think, will throw an immense amount of light upon the question which we are now dealing with.

It is, however, a mandate of the Constitution that the judicial power—that is, the power in the Commonwealth of deciding questions of law—shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court. Not in a State Supreme Court, nor in a Federal inferior court, but in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia. Those are the words, not of mandatory force, but of discretionary power—

“such other federal courts—”

“The members will remember the words of the Constitution. It shows that the Federal Court is first to exist—”

“Parliament creates.”

“It is to the discretion of the Parliament to create ‘other’ federal courts.”

“In such other courts as it invests with judicial power.”

There is a discretion given to this Parliament to create inferior Federal Courts. It may invest State courts—it will surely be seen that the word “other” refers to State courts—with federal judicial power. The position is this—and I think I have to elaborate it in regard to certain matters a little further on—that the Constitution, consistently with the spirit of the Constitution, have the exercise of the Commonwealth judicial power in the absence of a Federal Supreme Court. But you can have the exercise of that judicial power either in a Federal Supreme Court alone, or in association with any other federal courts of inferior degree that Parliament chooses to create, or in association with State courts, in which it may invest with jurisdiction with both these inferior tribunals. You cannot properly, however, transact business in the absence of what I have permitted to call the predominant judicial body; you are not to have the judicial power vested in either or both classes of inferior courts in the absence of the Federal Supreme Court. The last-named tribunal has not only been mentioned by name, but has been to a large extent already fashioned by the Constitution itself. It is to be composed of a Chief Justice and at least two other Judges, or as many more as Parliament, according to what it thinks are the needs for the Commonwealth, may enact. The Judges are to be appointed by the Governor-General in Council—like those for every other federal court. They are to have a life tenure—this is not expressed, but is implied—and they are to be removable only by the vote of both Houses, after proved incapacity or misbehaviour. They are dependent for the amount of their remuneration upon what Parliament gives them, but, again, the limitation is imposed that the remuneration is not to be diminished during their term of office. The High Court is also endowed by the Constitution itself with appellate power supreme in the Commonwealth. It is endowed also with original jurisdiction, in other words, power to hear cases which originate in that court, and do not come to it by way of appeal from other tribunals, and, further, it is within the power of the Parliament, at its discretion, to confer other powers. The Federal Supreme Court stands in the Constitution indicated, not only by name, but to a considerable extent, as I have said, shaped for us, and all that Parliament has to do is to organize it and equip it with the means of performing the duties allotted to it. The court is, therefore, specially designated by our organic law as the tribunal that, before all other courts and in all circumstances, shall exist, and shall possess and wield the highest judicial power in the Commonwealth. It is the court that is to stand as the authoritative expositor and arbiter as to the meaning of the Constitution and of the laws made under it, and, as I shall show, it will practically be the final expositor and arbiter of the Constitution and the laws. It is intended as one of the constitutional checks and balances. It stands as a touchstone with which to test and try the validity of our legislative acts. We, as the trustees of the people, sitting in this Parliament by virtue of the Constitution, have no right to say that the creation of the judicial body which is specially designated to watch us, as well as to do other important acts in the Commonwealth, shall be delayed, or that it shall not be constituted, or that it shall be replaced by some other tribunal. These are the considerations with which we ought to commence the review of our duties, and I protest that we are not to take into account, at this moment, anything but what is right in order to discharge our obligations as fearless legislators in view of the Constitution.

Mr. CONROY.—We are to carry out the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes, to carry out its spirit, undoubtedly. I have directed the attention of honorable members to the words of section 71 of the Constitution, and I think it will be of assistance if I mention that they are not without precedent. There are corresponding words in the Constitution of the United States, which I shall read, and I shall then endeavour to indicate the difference, so far as appears to me to be material, between our position and that of the United States. The words in the United States Constitution are—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Honorable members will see the very strong similarity between the two sets of words. Before I read some extracts from a notable decision which has been given. I desire to make an explanation which may prevent honorable members from attaching to them more weight than they may deserve, although I think they go to the extent to which I have said my mind is led. As the Attorney-General has pointed out, the United States Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction, except in matters affecting consuls and ambassadors, or in cases where a State is one of the parties. It has, however, full appellate jurisdiction in federal matters, and the inferior courts, which Congress had a mandate to ordain and establish—as we have a mandate—were capable of being endowed, and have been endowed, with both original and appellate jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Story, the eminent jurist, who was a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and is also recognised as a great writer on jurisprudence, delivered the decision of the court in the celebrated case of Martin against Hunter. Passages from this judgment are found in Quick and Garra's well-known work, The Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth—a work which I have no hesitation in saying is an perfect repository of suggestion and dent. At page 723, honorable member will find, under the heading of section 71, most instructive observations with reference to the words "shall be vested." I may say, by way of introduction, that Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, pointed out that it was for a long time a matter of discussion in the United States whether the words "shall be vested" were restrictive on Congress, or whether they were applied to what he calls "the future," that is to say, something which might be done in the future. The decision given in the case to which I have referred is that question for all time. In Quick and Garra's work one passage reads as follows:—

The language of the (third) article thus is manifestly designed to be mandatory upon the Legislature. Its obligatory force is so strong that Congress could not, without a violation of its duty, have refused to carry it into effect. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested (not may be vested) in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Could Congress have lawfully refused to establish a Supreme Court, or to vest in it the Constitution's jurisdiction? . . . But one answer is given to these questions; it must be negative.

Mr. CONROY.—Quite so, because there were no courts of any kind to construe the law.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not think it necessary to say whether there were any courts or not, but we find the words I have mentioned were discussing the force of the words. When the Convention framed our Constitution they knew very well that there were other courts, and when the Imperial Parliament passed the Constitution they knew very well the meaning of the words cannot be altered by the fact that there was one court or one hundred.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think that Mr. Justice Story expressly says that the United States were obliged to create a Federal Court because there was no authority to invest the State courts with Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course. It is true that it was mandatory on the Congress to create inferior courts in the United States—that is what Mr. Justice Story speaks of—because there was no authority to invest the State courts with Federal jurisdiction. But I am addressing to the subject of the Supreme Court, the body under both Constitutions, that the United States Court has no of original jurisdiction as has the Court under our Constitution. They were bound he whole judicial power, in an original or form, in the courts mentioned and cond in the Constitution, and to provide inferior to the Supreme Court, in which rial power unabsorbed by the Supreme ight be placed. The judicial power of the United States is, in point of origin and title, equal with the other powers of the Government, and is as exclusively vested in the courts created by or in pursuance of the Constitution, as the legislative power is vested in Congress, or the executive power in the President.

In order to emphasize this point, I invite honorable members to turn to section 1 of the Constitution. There they will find words analogous to those which I have been discussing—

The Legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament.

These are quite as mandatory, quite as declaratory as are the words—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court.

If honorable members entertain any remnant of doubt as to whether these words constitute a mandate or a mere discretion, I would direct their attention to another reference in the Constitution. We all know that section 51 contains a list of the powers of Parliament. This Parliament is given power to do certain things. If it had been intended that it should exercise its own views in determining the time when the High Court should be created, would it not have been included in those discretionary powers? Would the Constitution not have said—"Parliament shall have power to create courts and invest them with federal jurisdiction?" But instead of that, we find a special chapter devoted to the Judicature, just as we have a special chapter dealing with the formation of the Executive and of the Legislature, a chapter erecting, in a co-ordinate form, the Judicature of the Commonwealth, dealing with its judicial power, and using words which in themselves should convince honorable members. I say that, if we consider a decision of the highest rank, which was given when Chief Justice Marshall presided over the United States Court, and Mr. Justice Story delivered his memorable judgment—when the judicial bench of America was never stronger—we cannot fail to believe that these words were intended to be peremptory. As to the time when they were to be exercised this is the answer: No time is mentioned, because it is clearly intended that as soon as there is occasion for exercising the judicial power of the Commonwealth the means of exercising it shall be provided. If we regard the reason and the precedent which I have quoted we cannot relegate this matter to the realms of discretion. The Constitution itself ordains that this court shall be established, and partially creates it. To bring this machinery into motion awaits only the exercise of the power committed to Parliament by the Constitution. After giving the matter my best consideration, I say that for Parliament to refuse to carry out this obligation would be simply an abandonment of duty. It has been said that if we must have a High Court we should utilize the States Benches. Before going one step further I wish to remind honorable members of one landmark, if I may so call it, namely, that the constitution of a High Court of some sort is essential. I have endeavoured to show, and wish to emphasize, that unless we have a Federal Supreme Court we have not the means of exercising judicial power, as I conceive the Constitution intended, or the means of exercising, without doubt, the judicial power of the Commonwealth in federal jurisdiction. We have passed Acts of Parliament, we have moved under them, and this question has not been raised. But I believe that if it is raised, and if the courts are guided by what has been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, it may be that if we do not institute a High Court in some form to accord with section 71 of the Constitution, we shall incur a risk which may cost the Commonwealth a great deal more than any of the sums which have been mentioned during this debate. Having arrived at the stage that there ought to be a High Court, let me deal with the suggestion that the Chief Justices of the States should compose it. Again, I would ask honorable members to look at the Constitution itself. Section 72 provides that the Justices of the High Court and of the other courts created by Parliament—and honorable members will perceive that these are Federal as distinguished from State courts which are to be invested with jurisdiction—shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council, and shall not be removed except on the addresses of the Federal Houses after proof of misbehaviour or incapacity. The section further provides that they shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix, and that such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Do not honorable members see that we cannot validly pass an Act which shall declare that the Chief Justices of the States Courts for the time being shall be Judges of the High Court? We can pass an Act declaring that the first Judge of the High Court shall be the persons who at the time of its passing are the Chief Justices of the States Courts, but when we have done that we have created Federal Courts, and who will hold their office for life, just the same as if we allowed the Government to appoint those whom they thought fit, which means we do not get rid of new appointments. We cannot get rid of new appointments. We can fix the remuneration at whatever sum we choose, and we can appoint whatever number of Judges we think fit, so long as it is not less than one, but that is all we can do.

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable learned member contend that the appointments must be permanent?

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes. Then I ask would be gained by appointing the Justices of the different States? Honorable members do not intend for a moment that they should hold dual positions. No men should serve two masters, however they might be. Neither do honorable members mean that gentlemen who are Justices of the States Supreme Courts, and who can be removed by the States Legislatures, shall hold positions as Federal Judges and be removed in the way I have indicated. Surely honorable members do not think that two anomalous positions could be held by the same gentleman, or that our States Justices would sit upon the Federal Bench and be content to draw varying salaries according to the State from which they come. We do not imagine that the Justices, who are Lieutenant-Governors of the various States, should be Judges of the High Court under the control and removal of this Parliament? A similar proposal was put at the Federal Convention met with no determined opponent than the honorable and learned member for Northern New South Wales.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That proposal was rejected by 29 votes to 9.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Attorney-General has anticipated me. The honorable learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, submitted a proposal that the High Court should consist of a Federal Judge and the Chief Justices of the different States. If I remember right, the proposal contained an addendum that in the event of the death or illness of the Federal Judge the other Judges could proceed duties. That proposal was defeated, all I say, scouted, by the Convention.

CONROY.—There were too many members in that Convention.

ISAACS.—There were nine, including my honorable friend, who gallantly spoke for his proposal, as he does for every proposal which he supports. Yet, in a gathering consisting of 38 members, 29 were opposed to it.

GLYNN.—It was the suggestion of Samuel Griffith, and the honorable and learned member will pay some respect to his authority.

ISAACS.—I pay great respect to his authority, but in this matter I pay respect to the decision of the representatives of Australia assembled in that Convention. With all the weight of that learned Judge's name, and with all the civility of my honorable and learned friend, the proposal was defeated by a majority of arguments, some of which have been read to-night by the honorable and learned member for Illawarra. It was taken out of the Convention, and was not heard of again. It has now been forgotten, in complete oblivion of the fact that the Convention pronounced against it, at its first or second sitting, but at its third sitting, after the fullest light had been thrown upon it. Therefore it has been completely placed aside. It has been made impossible, as I have previously pointed out, by the very words of the Constitution.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Sir Samuel Griffith held to that opinion in 1897.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But the Convention rejected the proposal after 1897.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Convention discussed and rejected it in January, 1898, and it has not been heard of since. There is a misunderstanding in the public mind in regard to this matter. The idea prevails that we will utilize the services of the States Judges as Judges of the High Court. I should like to draw the attention of honorable members once more to the words of the Constitution, because it is only by a close study of them that we can hope to avoid mistakes.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is admitted that we cannot do it now, except with the consent of the States.

Mr. ISAACS.—We cannot do it now, without the consent of the States; and I point out why. We have only power to organize the Federal Supreme Court, to create Federal Courts, and to appoint Judges to both of these tribunals. Whilst we have power to invest other courts with jurisdiction, we have no power to invest Judges or individuals with jurisdiction. We can take the States Courts, regardless of who compose them, and say—"We will invest those Courts with such jurisdiction as we think right." Of course we cannot give them jurisdiction of appeal over the High Court; indeed it is not absolutely clear that we could give them appellate jurisdiction at all. That, however, is a matter for careful consideration, and I pin no faith to it. The point to which I desire to draw attention is that we cannot take an individual Judge, and say that Mr. Justice A, or Chief Justice B, shall exercise Federal jurisdiction. The courts to which the Judges of the States belong remain State courts whether we invest them with Federal jurisdiction or not.

Mr. GLYNN.—Is there not a provision in the Bill that they cannot be appointed? What necessity can there be for such a provision if that course cannot be followed under the Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is no such provision in either measure.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have not heard of such a provision. The honorable and learned member will allow me to say, however, that that is not material to the point I am discussing. I am considering, not what is proposed to be done under the Bill in this regard, but what can be done, and I assert that the power of the Federation in this respect is to invest State courts with Federal jurisdiction. If we said, for example, that the Supreme Court of Queensland should have certain Federal jurisdiction, it would be perfectly immaterial to us if every one of the present occupants of that Bench resigned to-morrow, and a new set of Judges were appointed. The new set would have precisely the same jurisdiction under that investiture as would the present members of the Bench. But we cannot pick out individual Judges and say that they shall exercise individual jurisdiction. We are to say "yes" or "no" in regard to the question of conferring the jurisdiction on the Court. A State court upon which that jurisdiction was conferred would be a State court exercising Federal jurisdiction, but its Judges would be nominated by the State, paid by the State, removable by the State, and answerable to the State. All that we should do in such a case would be to confer Federal jurisdiction upon it by way of giving assistance to the Federal Supreme Court. Therefore, it should be evident that it is impossible to carry out the suggestion that the States Chief Justices should be also Justices of the High Court. It is beyond our competency as I read the Constitution, and I have endeavoured to lead honorable members to read it with me. They must judge whether I am regarding it rightly.

Mr. EWING.—If it were possible, would any saving be effected?

Mr. ISAACS.—I should object to it for reasons which caused me to object in the Convention, as well as for the reasons I have given to-night. I think it would be wrong to ask one man to hold these two offices. He could not do so with advantage to either. As pointed out in the Convention by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, there is a business reason, which appeals to practical men, against the adoption of such a course. How could we expect the Chief Justice of a State who has not only to perform judicial work, but to supervise the judicial work of his brethren, to arrange the course of and give directions for the judicial business to be performed in his State, and also to occupy from time to time the position of Lieutenant-Governor—to go to another State, to be under the direction of the Federal Parliament, and to perform his offices to the satisfaction of either party. I think that even if it were possible legally to make such an arrangement it would be impossible so far as practical conditions are concerned. But as I have already pointed out it has been placed beyond the range of legal possibility by the provisions of the Constitution itself. Then we have the suggestion made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, that we should not create a High Court, but that we should leave the State courts invested with Federal jurisdiction. The investiture of State Courts with Federal jurisdiction is provided for in section 77, which is a most important one. Under section 75 the High Court has certain original jurisdiction inalienably conferred upon it. Shortly speaking, that jurisdiction applies to all cases in which certain persons or States or the Commonwealth itself are parties. That power is quite independent of this Parliament. We do not give that jurisdiction, and we cannot take it away. Section 76 allows the Parliament, if it thinks fit, to confer original jurisdiction upon the Court in certain matters which have relation to parties, but relate to law jurisdiction. Then section 77 comes in and provides that, with regard to any of matters, Parliament shall have power to confer jurisdiction upon inferior courts. Those words are material, because I wish to inform the House that I cannot agree to the contention put forward by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne with regard to paragraph (b) of clause 2 of clause 41, in the Bill now before us. I had better state his contention to understand it, at once, in order that honorable members may see the point of my reference to this section. Clause 41, after referring to the exclusive jurisdiction of Federal courts, says that, in the matters referred to, the several courts of the States shall—within the limits of their several jurisdiction, whether such limits are as to locality, subject-matter, or otherwise, be invested with Federal jurisdiction, subject to the following conditions and restrictions:—

The particular condition and restriction referred to is that contained in paragraph (b)—

Except as hereinafter provided, every appeal from the decision of a court or Judge of a State exercising Federal jurisdiction, not being an appeal from one inferior court to another inferior court, shall be brought to the High Court.

I understand that my honorable and learned friend's contention was that it was not competent for us to say that we conferred Federal jurisdiction upon State Courts subject to appeal to the High Court. I cannot myself think that that contention is correct. We have power to give all or part of this jurisdiction to all or any of these courts. We are not required to give the whole jurisdiction, or none at all, to any of them. We must remember that we can deal, not only with the Supreme Court, but with every inferior court of a State. We may deal even with a petty court, and are we to be driven to say that we must give the whole of the jurisdiction, or none at all, to every court, however inferior it may be? Certainly not. It is to me perfectly clear that we can give jurisdiction to a limited extent to the inferior court. We can give greater jurisdiction to the higher court, and we can give such jurisdiction as is possible within the limits of the Constitution to the Supreme Court. I can see no reason whatever why not say that that jurisdiction shall be taken away by the right of appeal to the High Court.

GLYNN.—Does it not take away the right of appeal to other courts? Is not the effect of the Act to abolish the right of appeal to the Privy Council abolished in the direct appeal, overlooking the right of appeal to the High Court?

ISAACS.—Where is there an appeal taken away from the Privy Council from Federal jurisdiction at the present moment?

GLYNN.—There is a right of appeal from any subordinate court, which, if the appeal is taken through the Supreme Court is taken away, can be exercised as an act of grace by the Privy Council.

ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member is speaking of an English Act of Parliament—the 7th and 8th Victoria.

GLYNN.—Yes.

ISAACS.—Under that Act the Privy Council may pass an order or may give a right of appeal from any court in the British dominions, with the exception of those in the British Isles. But I do not draw the honorable and learned member's attention to certain well-known provisions. At present I do not say that that right is given. At present the orders in Council, certainly in the case of the Dominion of Wales and Monmouthshire—and although I am not so clear as to the other States, I imagine that they are in the same position—appear to me to be the right of appeal to the Privy Council in certain limited cases within the jurisdiction of the State Courts as constituted under State jurisdiction and exercising State jurisdiction. I doubt very much whether we can point to any provision in the Act at the present time by which the Privy Council has conferred the right—the right of appeal, honorable members will observe—on any litigant from this federal jurisdiction. But beyond that there is no provision for saying that the right of appeal is taken away. It has been done in several cases. I forget the date of the last Act by which this was done, but I believe it was in 1883. By Act of Parliament the right of appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of Canada has been forbidden, and that Act was passed in the very case which the honorable and learned member mentioned last—the case of Prince v. Gagnon (Appeal Cases)—as taking away the right of appeal. In that case, Lord Fitzgerald, I think it was, in delivering the decision of the Judicial Committee, said that the right of appeal was taken away by the Canadian Act, and that they were now to consider whether they should grant the appeal as an act of grace.

Mr. GLYNN.—They are granted in that way.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is another matter. I am speaking of the power to take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council; when we get beyond that the observation made by my honorable and learned friend might apply.

Mr. GLYNN.—Most of the appeals to the Privy Council are matters of grace. They are not always exercised as matters of right.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is quite the other way, if my honorable and learned friend will allow me to say so. It was recognised by the Privy Council in the case of Prince v. Gagnon, and recognised by Lord Davey in the speech which he delivered in the House of Lords, on our own Constitution Bill, that the Canadian Parliament had taken away the right of appeal. What position do we get to then? The Privy Council when asked to grant an appeal as of grace, says—"No, we shall not do so if there is a higher court in the Dominion to go to." For the Dominion I may substitute the Federation.

Mr. GLYNN.—Surely the honorable and learned member will not say that the Privy Council refuses in all cases to hear an appeal.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not say so. I say that the rule of the Privy Council is that, if there is a right of appeal to a higher court, you must exhaust that right by appealing to them. Even when they do not act upon that rule they are bound to ask themselves—"Is this such an anomalous case, or a case of such magnitude—not because of the amount of money involved, but in its bearings, in its results, and in its relations—as will justify us in entertaining the appeal as of grace?" When you have whittled the thing down to that small point it becomes minute indeed. Therefore it is beyond my comprehension how it can be said that we are debarred under the Constitution from limiting the Federal jurisdiction of the State Courts upon which we think it right to confer the power of exercising it. If the contention had not been raised by so able a lawyer as my honorable and learned friend the member for Northern Melbourne, I should have thought it incapable of argument.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No other legal critic of the Bill has taken or supported the point.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is acknowledged to be doubtful.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not say that a doubt is not entertained, but I have not heard it expressed before. Treating the matter as I have, I think I have led honorable members along the train of reasoning by which I arrived at my conclusion, so that they may judge for themselves of its reasonableness. We cannot do more than express our views, matured so far as we can mature them. We have power to confer jurisdiction, and there is no word saying that we shall give everything or nothing. The Canadian Parliament has obliterated the right of appeal, and that has been recognised by the Privy Council, who have laid down very stringent rules as to the cases when they will grant an appeal as of grace. When they find that there is a higher appeal court in the territory, they want to know why the right of appeal to that court has not been exhausted. The Supreme Court of Victoria, in a case reported in volume 23 of the Victorian Law Reports, has laid down the rule that no appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of a single Judge of the Supreme Court is to be granted, because there is an appeal from the decision of a single Judge to the Full Court here. That judgment seems analogous to the practice of the Privy Council. Therefore, from every stand-point the position taken up by my honorable and learned friend last night does not seem tenable. I will draw the attention of honorable members to some words in the Constitution which strengthen the contention which I have just put before them. They will see that the provisions of section 77 with respect to matters of original jurisdiction, so far as the High Court is concerned, may or may not extend to appellate jurisdiction so far as the other courts are concerned; I offer no opinion about that. But with regard to those matters, Parliament may make laws defining the jurisdiction of any Federal Court other than the High Court. Clearly it is possible to define the jurisdiction of inferior Federal Courts. We can limit as much as we please. There is a very important subsection defining the extent to which the jurisdiction of any Federal Court shall be exclusive of that which belongs to or is vested in the courts of the States. That proves to me beyond possibility of doubt that we cannot give the jurisdiction of the State Courts to the Federal Courts, and it seems to follow as an absolute corollary that the jurisdiction given to the State Courts need not be unlimited. Would the opposite contention lead to the giving of unlimited federal jurisdiction to every State Court to which we give jurisdiction it would cause an absurdity. If we give the federal jurisdiction of the High Court to the State Courts, it is to hear appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States. But are we compelled to give the Supreme Court of Victoria jurisdiction to hear appeals from the State Courts of New South Wales or Tasmania? Are we to give jurisdiction to an inferior court in one State to hear appeals from the Supreme Court of another State? We do not entertain such a notion for a moment. And yet it seems to me that that position flows from the contention that if we give any Federal jurisdiction we must give it all.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Whose contention is that?

Mr. ISAACS.—I understood that my honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne to say that if we give Federal jurisdiction to a Supreme Court we could not give it subject to an appeal to the High Court, and I say that that is the position that we cannot limit the jurisdiction we give.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That we must give everything or nothing.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is the conclusion.

Mr. CONROY.—What is the meaning of the words "shall invest such other jurisdiction with Federal jurisdiction"?

Mr. ISAACS.—The section does not say that we shall invest the State courts with the Federal jurisdiction possible.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—Does not "Federal jurisdiction" cover the whole of the jurisdiction of the power of the Federation?

Mr. ISAACS.—It may, but it does not necessarily do so. Does the honorable and learned member mean to say that if we give Federal jurisdiction to a police court we must give it all Federal jurisdiction covered by the Constitution? Surely not. I cannot entertain such a notion. There is another contention which has been put forward, and that supposing the Federal High Court proper court to appoint under the provisions of the Constitution Bill as originally framed, changes have been made in England which have so altered its character that the mandate of the Convention ought not to be attended to. I have thought that a considerable amount of apprehension has existed in the public as to the extent of the alterations in the Constitution Bill in England. It was not in Australia at the time, but the opinion I formed from cablegrams and accounts which appeared in the public press was that it was imagined by the public in Australia that under the Bill as it stood appeals in mercantile causes from State courts exercising State jurisdiction had been taken away. That was not so, and it is not so now. Regarding that class of cases, I am right in saying that no alteration whatever has been made by the Imperial Parliament. All questions of mercantile import, all cases of daily occurrence, and all contests in respect of libels, or bills of exchange, or charter parties, or trespass, or contract, were, when the Convention framed the Constitution Bill, matters treated as of right, within the limits of the Federal Council orders, from State courts exercising their State jurisdiction, just as they were before the Convention met, and they are now. But there was in clause 10 as it was sent home, a provision that there should be no appeal at all—I take it to mean from the High Court or from the State courts—to the Privy Council on matters which were called constitutional matters, that is, matters relating to the interpretation of the Federal Constitution or of any part of the Constitution, except decisions affecting the public interests of the British dominions. I thought that the main objection to that provision advanced by the home authorities was this—“You claim in Australia that this provision should stand because you say that it is not an Australian matter. But it is not so. There is no constitutional decision affecting the interests of the litigants immediately concerned, but, not, it is true, of any other part of the Crown dominions, but of foreign countries, because of some treaty obligation of the Empire. Therefore the contention that there should be no appeal to an Imperial tribunal in matters that may affect the Empire in its foreign relations is not right.” That was an understandable objection. The Imperial authorities told the delegates—I am not saying whether it was right or wrong, I am merely stating the contention as I understood it—“We are prepared to give you absolute finality—subject only to the right of your High Court to grant an appeal to the Privy Council—in all matters that are purely Australian and of constitutional importance, that is, contests of a constitutional nature between the Commonwealth and the States, or between the States, as to their mutual powers and limitations.” That was the position. Of course, only appeals from the High Court were affected. This is the change that has been made: That whereas before questions of constitutional interpretation, whether of the Federal or of the State Constitutions, going from the State courts were not appealable either as of right or of grace, they are now appealable as of right in the proper amounts from State courts in their State jurisdiction, and, it may be, unless we limit it, in their Federal jurisdiction. I think, as I have explained, that we have power to limit it.

Mr. CONROD.—It would be very unfortunate if we have not, because we should then have to appoint 50 Judges.

Mr. ISAACS.—We can limit the Federal jurisdiction but not the State jurisdiction. We can, if the views I have stated are correct, limit the Federal jurisdiction we confer upon any State court. The Federal Parliament, under the Bill as it went home, had power to limit the cases in which an appeal as of grace might be allowed. They still have that power, subject only to the reservation of any Bill for the Royal assent.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member is now referring to appeals from the High Court.

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes. I do not think that we need bother about the cases involving the Constitution of a State. The number of such cases that will arise in the Supreme Courts of the States in their State jurisdiction will be comparatively small. The constitutional cases which will arise will come mostly, I think, under the Federal jurisdiction, and we can limit them on the same principle that Canada limited the right of appeal to the Privy Council, except in matters of prerogative.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it the opinion of the honorable and learned member that the Privy Council have no power as an act of grace to allow an appeal from the High Court without the consent of the Court in matters affecting the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS.—These are the words of the Constitution—

No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question howsoever arising as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council.

Mr. WATSON.—No act of grace can override that.

Mr. ISAACS.—No. These words are contained in an Act of the Imperial Parliament, to which the Crown is a party. Appeals can be made from the High Court to the Privy Council as an act of grace, but that act of grace must be performed by the High Court. The section reads further—

The High Court may so certify if satisfied that for any special reason the certificate should be granted, and thereupon an appeal shall lie to Her Majesty in Council on the question without further leave.

Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal prerogative to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. The Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked, but proposed laws containing any such limitation shall be reserved by the Governor-General for Her Majesty's pleasure.

So that practically we have the matter in our own hands. I should like to point out that section 73 confers the appellate jurisdiction in regard to decisions of any Judge or Judges of the High Court, short of the Full Court, or of any other federal court, or of any court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any State, or of any other court of any State, from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies to the Queen in Council, or of the Inter-State Commission. In all this appellate jurisdiction it is provided that the judgment of the High Court shall be final and conclusive, and therefore all appeal as of right from the decision of the High Court is entirely shut out. That is recognised in many cases, notably in the case of Cushing v. Dupuy, 5 Appeal Cases—a decision of the Privy Council—and in the case of Prince v. Gagnon, 8 Appeal Cases. This provision shuts out appeal as of right, and this Parliament may shut out all appeals as of grace subject to the Bill being reserved for His Majesty's assent.

Mr. GLYNN.—Still, in Canada, there are 10 appeals of grace as against 23 appeals of right.

Mr. ISAACS.—That would be from provincial courts.

Mr. GLYNN.—No; from the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. ISAACS.—No appeal as of right exists there, for the reason that the Canadian Parliament shut it out.

Mr. GLYNN.—But the appeals are of right.

Mr. ISAACS.—Our position is much better than that of Canada, but in Canada they have not the power to shut out appeals as of grace. They have purported to do it, and they cannot do it.

Mr. CONROY.—The words in the Bill are final and conclusive.

Mr. ISAACS.—But they relate only to appeals as of right.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes; but appeals of grace.

Mr. ISAACS.—My honorable and learned friend has forgotten the concluding words of section 74, which are as follows:—

The Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked, but proposed laws containing any such limitation shall be reserved by the Governor-General for His Majesty's pleasure.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—But the Parliament has not done that.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am not discussing whether we have done, but what we have the power to do.

Mr. CONROY.—I thought that was the subject of the discussion.

Mr. ISAACS.—Yes, but in relation to the provisions of the Constitution. I thought from the turn of the discussion that we were interested in ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution, and the powers of Parliament. We are not limited to the mere words of the Bill or any other Bill, but we are free to determine whether we shall lay the foundation of a judicial system upon one line, or upon another line, or upon no line whatever.

Mr. CONROY.—The words of the Canadian Act are even stronger than those of the Australian Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think not. I do not pretend to have noted all the verbal objections that have been taken by honorable members. I have endeavoured, not occupying too much time, to deal question broadly. There are many provisions in the Bill which I am sure would offer matter for amendment. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Bendigo that some of the provisions regarding relief of causes may with advantage be considerably altered; but these are not vital matters, and may very properly form the subject for discussion in Committee. I quite agree with one observation made by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, that we should be careful not to encroach upon the existing jurisdiction of the State Courts. I do not think we need take away from the State Courts one atom of the jurisdiction they possess. Their maritime jurisdiction may be exercised by them, and if they did not possess it, I should be inclined to confer it on them. Perhaps it may hardly be the case with one who is every day practising before State Courts—although, perhaps, I may speak out any fear of being misunderstood—namely, that there is no occasion for any want of confidence in our State courts. I am not making my arguments in favour of the High Court upon any distrust of the State courts, but I have sought to confine attention to the requirements of the Constitution, and that is best for the Federation.

MR. CROUCH.—What about distrust of the Privy Council?

MR. ISAACS.—I cannot feel the same confidence in the Privy Council that I should have in an Australian court, in relation to Australian matters. Up to the present time I have endeavoured to deal with this proposal as if it were a mere question of moral obligation, arising out of the settled terms of our charter of Government. I have endeavoured to express myself as to what that instrument compels the honourable member to do; but I am not afraid to state the position from the stand-point of expediency. I am not afraid to offer my opinion as to what we should do if we were absolutely free from any ties, and were at liberty to choose our own lines of action in the Judiciary question. I have no objection in saying that it would be an act of high and wise statesmanship, both from the stand-point of expediency and economy, to establish a High Court at the present time, on the lines demanded of us by the Constitution. We heard a good deal of the time that the federal delegates were in England, bravely fighting the battle of this Bill, about the institution of an Imperial Court of Appeal, and if I remember rightly, one of the strong arguments used by the Imperial authorities against the delegates' view regarding Privy Council appeals was that it was most inopportune to discuss any such question because they had in contemplation the establishment of an Imperial Court of Appeal which would dispense justice uniformly and evenly for the whole Empire. This was a grand and noble conception, and one that in time would have had a great influence, but that proposition is dead. It is relegated to the shelf of obscurity. It has died from suffocation under the load of tradition and interests, from which we in Australia are happily free, and it is now labelled as one of the failures of history. I feel proud that our representative, Mr. Justice Hodges, at the Conference which was afterwards held, took the stand he did with regard to Australia. We should have reaped the benefit of his action if the scheme for the Imperial Court of Appeal had been brought to a head. At present, however, we are left with the Privy Council as the apex of our appellate system. Now, I desire to speak of that body as I ought to, with all respect. It is a venerable body, and it sits in a somewhat dingy den in Downing-street; but, none the less, its decisions are authoritative, and binding upon this Federation.

SIR EDWARD BRADDON.—The dingy den does not affect its decisions?

MR. ISAACS.—Of course not; though the surroundings sometimes do. But the Privy Council itself, apart from its surroundings, is a body consisting of men of varied eminence and attainments. There are upon it men of whom any nation might be justly proud. There are also retired Judges from India, from the West Indies, and from other parts of the British dominions, who have served their time faithfully and well, and who are now—at all events, members of the Privy Council. You can get a very strong court, undoubtedly, if the Lord Chancellor chooses to come down with some of his brethren from the House of Lords, and you can get a very weak court indeed, one much weaker than, I think, the majority of our State courts in Australia. There are men on the Privy Council, who, for some reason or other, have not been elevated to the House of Lords, and who, while they are not allowed by law to become members of the ultimate Court of Appeal for the inhabitants of the British Isles, are considered quite good enough to give final judgments upon matters affecting the subjects in British dominions abroad. I protest against that condition of affairs, which would have been swept away by the adoption of the project for the establishment of an Imperial Court of Appeal. Now, that that scheme has been abandoned, I do not hesitate to say that the Privy Council is not a court in which we can place the fullest reliance in regard to the interpretation of our laws. There would be no more advantage in our asking an Indian Judge to interpret an Australian Act than there would be in the Indian Government seeking the assistance of an Australian Judge in interpreting one of their acts. To my mind there is something anomalous about it. I wish to say that if we get a strong Privy Council Court—a tribunal as strong as can be obtained in the House of Lords—and put before it a question of general mercantile import, we shall obtain from it a decision of great weight. There are guides to these decisions in other than Australian cases. But if we put before that Court a matter of local concern, and one arising out of Australian conditions—such, for example, as our mining, our land, or our labour laws—does any one mean to suggest that it can, as the Attorney-General put it, “translate itself to an Australian atmosphere,” and tell us what we intended in framing our laws?

MR. CONROY.—It can tell us how to construe those laws.

MR. ISAACS.—It can tell us how to construe them, but surely if we are capable of making those laws we are also capable of interpreting them. If our Judges do not put the interpretation that we prefer to put upon them, we are here to alter them. Seeing that we have an Australian Executive and an Australian Legislature, I cannot understand why we should not have our own Judiciary. At all events, whether there be an appeal to the Privy Council or not, why should we not have the option? Why are Australians to be necessarily driven 12,000 miles away to get a decision which, as far as local matters are concerned, is generally a mere guess? It may be a guess which is right, but it may be one that is wrong. In any case, if we give the option to the Australian people to obtain decisions which are practically final, because I have already pointed out that a judgment of the High Court will be to all intents and purposes final, and that we can make it absolutely so—we shall have the means of deciding upon the spot, the meaning of our Constitution, and of the laws for which we, as an Australian people, will be responsible. Those decisions are much more likely to be correct than would be the case if they were given by gentlemen unacquainted with our conditions, and in most cases, therefore, as unable to interpret the meaning of our statutes as if they were living in the planet Mars. In considering the question of whether there is a necessity for erecting this court now, or whether its creation should be deferred for some considerable time—I think one honorable member mentioned ten years—when interpretation have been put upon our Constitution and our legislation, and the trend of our life has been fixed by hands other than our own, we ought to recollect that we stand here upon the threshold of our united life. We should remember that the direction which the rivulet obtains determines the ultimate course of the stream for all time. Here and now, if we are true to our duty, we shall erect a Court to which all Australians, rich and poor alike, may resort for guidance as to the laws under which they live—not a Court such as was suggested by my honorable friend the other night, a tribunal that will be swayed or controlled by sympathy—but one that is composed of our fellow citizens, cognizant of our conditions, consciously or unconsciously alive to the impulses of our daily life, and not likely to be misled by the crude and uninformed arguments of lawyers 12,000 miles away. Such a court as that is one to which all Australians ought to have access, and, I believe, not only on the ground of expediency, but upon that of economy, such a tribunal is eminently desirable. I quite agree with the Attorney-General that whilst we need not take away one iota of jurisdiction from the State courts, the erection of this High Court with its power of appellate jurisdiction from the State courts in their State as well as their Federal jurisdiction, will relieve the State Judges to a very large extent. It will enable them to traverse country districts which they cannot traverse now, and to devote more attention to them, and will relieve them of some of the heaviest appeals which are called upon to hear, whilst litigants are only too glad to avoid first an appeal to the State Supreme Court and then an appeal to the High Court or the Privy Council. Frequently they will avail themselves in numerous instances of an appeal direct to the High Court. Not only from the stand-point of expediency, but for all the economical reasons that have been so lucidly stated by the Attorney-General, I hold that we should rather than lose in monetary expenditure the establishment of the High Court. We cannot obtain an Imperial Court for the whole Empire, why should we not have an Australian Court from which we can draw a definite, decided, and uniform system of judicial expositions for the whole of Australia? This Australian Court would pay its way. It would do more than

It would form, as it was designed to be, the great bulwark of our Constitution. It would be an easily accessible tribunal, practically a final one for the elucidation of our Constitution and laws. It would be high above political interference as to be free from the faintest breath of suspicion, yet so close to the common life of our people as to feel the pulse-beat of their life. No doubt it would be keenly alive to the verbiage of the enactments and it might be called upon to construe; it would also be able to interpret them according to the inner purpose and meaning which they were enacted. The Judges would be proud indeed to be members of the glorious Empire, but none the less, and as a first, they would be citizens of this Commonwealth, whose rights and liberties it would be their special charge and privilege to cherish and preserve.

EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). I thought for one moment that, as the honorable and learned member for India has said, I should be false to the trust reposed in me by the people if I opposed this. Nothing would induce me to adopt that course. But far from that being the case I should be false to my trust if I did not do it. I should be false to my trust in giving my sanction to a measure which would impose on the people a heavy charge for the creation and maintenance of an institution which, I believe, is not absolutely necessary at the present time. If I fight with the Attorney-General that in doing as I propose to do, I should be guilty of any violation of the Constitution I should not dream of adopting the attitude which I take up. But no straining of words can make it absolutely positive that there is a direct mandate in the Constitution to appoint a Federal High Court at any particular time. There is a mandate doubtless that a High Court shall be appointed, but there is no hint whatever as to the period within which that should be done. As one who regards it as necessary to the completion of the Commonwealth edifice that we should have a High Court at some time or other, I adhere to the view that the present time is eminently inopportune. The Attorney-General describes the High Court as "the keystone of the federal arch." I should prefer to call it the cope-stone of the edifice—a cope-stone which is not absolutely essential to a building which has its foundations soundly laid. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo has pointed out a fact of some little importance, namely, that since the delegates to Downing-street permitted an amendment of the Constitution by which Australian appeals may go direct to the Privy Council the description of the High Court as "the keystone of the federal arch" is just as applicable to the Privy Council as it is to the Commonwealth Judiciary. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, has shown that by this amendment of the Constitution the Privy Council actually becomes the final arbiter in all cases of constitutional difference. I hold that at the present moment there is no pressing necessity to impose this fresh charge upon the people of the Commonwealth. In some of the States they are already overburdened with taxation. Let us examine the duties of the High Court under the Constitution and consider how far they can be effectively performed without the establishment of that tribunal. The first of its duties has reference to matters of original jurisdiction arising under any treaties. It cannot be urged that in this connexion there is any urgency for its creation. The Commonwealth has no power to enter into treaties, except through the medium of the British Government. Then it has power to exercise jurisdiction in matters affecting consuls or other representatives of other countries. I understood the Prime Minister to say that these matters are not likely to create any very great amount of business. The third duty of the High Court would be to deal with matters in which the Commonwealth or a person suing, or being sued on its behalf was a party. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo has pointed out how effectively, and without bias, the State courts have conducted all the cases arising under this particular heading to the eminent satisfaction of the people generally. The fourth sub-section relates to matters of the greatest possible importance—that is, cases arising between States, or between the residents of different States, or between a State and the residents of another State. In this connexion I would point out that when the Post and Telegraph Act was passed through this Parliament, the Premier of Tasmania raised the question that in regard to one particular section operating against “Tattersalls,” the Commonwealth Government ought to stay their hands until the matter could be decided by the High Court. That was, obviously, peculiarly a case as between the conflicting laws of States, and concerning which it was desirable that there should be such an appeal. We had in Tasmania a law which said that application for tickets in that particular institution should be sent only through the post, and by no other channel. The Federal law said that the post should be absolutely closed to those applications. Without entering upon any consideration of how far the action as to “Tattersalls” is to be justified or not, there was this conflict of laws, to which the Premier of Tasmania naturally, and very properly, asked that consideration should be given by the High Court before any action was taken by the Commonwealth. That request was refused, because it was pointed out that there is vested in the States courts sufficient power to deal with the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the Commonwealth Government say that?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—They said that Tasmania could seek her relief in the courts already existing. The fifth matter concerns cases in which a writ of mandamus or an injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth. As to this there can be no doubt that the power exists in our courts to-day to grant all that is required. My great objection to this Bill is on the score of expense. When we have embarked upon this matter we do not know where we shall be landed. We are told that the cost of the establishment of the Judges and their officials will be about £30,000.

But we have not had mentioned a full of the officials, and no account what has been taken of the very heavy cost, bably, of the buildings that will have erected for the sittings of the High Court. Are we to believe that this, the highest court in Australia, will be a peripatetic court, finding its place of sitting here, there, and wherever it can borrow or temporarily rent some suitable or unsuitable house to sit in? There will inevitably be a very considerable charge upon the people for building for the High Court, in addition to the expenditure in other directions; and in all of £30,000, in all probability the expenditure will be very much greater. I point out that while the Commonwealth is in a position to be lavish with the people's money; while it is free from the obligation which binds the people of the States to the interest on their debt; while that greatest charge is a burden upon the States, they find it very difficult to bear; because of that they have to exercise economy in every possible direction, to cut down expenditure even to the curtailing of charitable grants, and raising taxes, it has never been raised before in so many of the States—while all this is so, and more so as long as the States are wholly and solely responsible for the whole of the interest, we have a Federal Government free from any obligation of the kind, free from that responsibility, and only restrained to its expenditure by the Braddon clause, which prevents it from spending more than one-fourth of the net Customs and Excise revenue collected. While that is so, in seasons such as this—a season of depression and difficulty for the great majority of the people—we should hesitate before we put into any expenditure whatever that is so thoroughly and amply justified by its necessity. It is for that reason—although in principle, a supporter of the idea of a High Court, and have no sort of objection that a substitute can be found for it in the appointment of Judges as occasional Judges of Courts or anything of the sort—altogether, I believe that in the fulness of time, we can afford it, and when occasion demands it, we must have a court such as is contemplated here, that I shall have willingly, but still in conformity with the views I entertain and the sense of responsibility to my constituents that I feel rests upon me, to oppose the second reading of this Bill.

RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—Remarks which I shall have to make on the subject of the creation of a High Court of Australia will be few. It seems to me that the object of such an institution is to be to limit and restrain litigation; apparently, from the character of the Bill before us, that tendency of attention have been kept in mind. On the other hand, it may be argued that litigation will be reduced very considerably in the event of our leaving the appeal to the Council as a final court of appeal in connexion with all legal disputes occurring within the Commonwealth, because the Council is such a far-off and expensive institution that men will pause and hesitate before resorting to it. It seems to me that these two extremes have to be kept in mind. On the one hand, there is our desire not to increase facilities for litigation by creating here a High Court and other courts, which lead one to the other in order to arrive at something like finality in vexed questions; and, on the other hand, there is our desire, in the case of men having differences against other men, or against a Government, or an institution, not to put any insuperable barriers to proceeding to a final court, where the parties may find a verdict which will commend itself to their common sense and conscience as being in accordance with the facts of the case. It is a difficult and an ideal thing to keep these two things before us in reference to the establishment of a final court of appeal. But it costs money unfortunately; and it is when we translate them into cash that it becomes apparent that there are some things which may be too expensive. This is not such an ideal. As an ideal it may be a true one. It may be the ideal upon which we should act in trying to find a way out of our difficulty in connexion with vexed legal questions, whether between man and man, or between man and State, or State and Federation. It is a matter for argument whether now is the accepted time for realizing this ideal, and that is where I confess to some scepticism. There are times and conditions which limit all things, and it is quite likely that we shall never have a perfect Constitution—a Constitution which begins with an appeal to the people, then carries their voice expressed in Parliament, and finally realized upon the statute-book administered by a final court of appeal in Australia. That may exist as an ideal, but yet may be an apocryphal ideal; and it is quite likely that it may be one of those things for which we can afford to wait. I would remind the House of one thing. I was one of those who took upon themselves the odium of opposing the Commonwealth Bill. We were spoken of in anything but complimentary terms for so doing. We opposed it largely because of the presence in it of this chapter dealing with the judicature. We were told then that we were traitors to the highest and best interests of Australia. But to-day those same people who clamoured for federation in the loudest terms possible are preaching that now that we have accepted federation we ought to stumble at this most essential part of it. It ill becomes those people who, a few years ago, when they were forcing federation upon the people—rightly or wrongly; I now believe rightly—told us that the judicature was an essential thing, and that we must have it, to tell us that those who support this legislation, giving effect to the programme they forced upon the people, are traitors to the cause and not they. I say that if this is a matter of completing a programme and carrying out an ideal, by all means at whatever cost let us carry out that ideal at the earliest possible moment. I think the Government, whatever may be said about the time and wisdom of their action, are to be complimented upon this—that they have tried to complete the skeleton work of our Constitution, which never will be completed without a final court of appeal, composed of Australian Judges.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—We are indebted to a number of legal members of this House for giving us the benefit of their experience as to what this High Court is likely to be, if it is established on lines laid down by the Government. The Attorney-General, in his speech last year, mentioned that he was indebted to Sir Samuel Griffith, Sir Josiah Symon, and Mr. Justice Clark, of Tasmania, for very valuable suggestions and recommendations in framing or drafting this measure.

Mr. DEAKIN.—For criticising the drafting.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—For criticising the drafting. But the Attorney-General went on to say that while those gentlemen made certain recommendations, he was of opinion that they would not approve of the Bill as introduced by the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; I said I would not say they did approve.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Attorney-General had good reason for making that admission. I take it, that while those gentlemen made certain recommendations and suggestions, they did not necessarily approve of a Bill of this character, but, if the Government made the introduction of the measure a part of their policy, they were willing, to the best of their ability, to assist in making it as perfect as possible. The Attorney-General on that occasion further said that any defects in the Bill were his; indeed, I think he was more emphatic, because he said—

Every weakness in it no doubt is due to some of the alterations I myself have made. I am anxious without undue delay to recommend it to lay members of the House.

Was that admission made because of the imperfections in the Bill, or was it because of the fact that if we investigated pretty fully the opinions held by the gentlemen to whom he referred, we should find that, when they had the opportunity of speaking for the States they represented in the early Convention, they did not approve of the establishment of a High Court such as is outlined by the Government? Sir Josiah Symon favoured, I think, the proposals that were made by Sir Henry Parkes, that we should have a Court of Appeal that would give a final decision in Australia—that there should be no appeal to the Privy Council. That opinion was held by every member of that Convention, because the resolutions to that effect were carried unanimously. But Sir Samuel Griffith, in his report to the Legislature of Queensland, presented after he became a Judge, made special reference to the Constitution Bill, which was practically the Constitution as we have it to-day. To-night the honorable and learned member for Indi laboured very hard to show that it was mandatory in the Constitution that this Federal High Court should be established because without it the Constitution is not complete—that a High Court is the complement of the Constitution. Sir Samuel Griffith in his notes, as he termed them, which he made on the draft Federal Constitution framed by the Adelaide Convention of 1897, and which he presented to the Queensland Government, stated that the Constitution is practically the same as that introduced in the Adelaide Convention. Sir Samuel Griffith said—

The most important formal change consists in substituting the formula of the United States Constitution, which declares that the judicial power of the State shall be vested in a Supreme Court, for the provision of the draft of 1891 that the Federal Parliament might establish such a court. The change is, however, of no practical importance, for until Parliament provides salaries for the Judges, and the necessary machinery for the exercise of their jurisdiction, the judicial power will necessarily remain in abeyance.

That is the opinion of Sir Samuel Griffith as to the reading of the words "may" or "shall." He proceeded—

There are certain recognised rules which may be called rules of courtesy, usually followed in the language of Statutes relating to the Sovereign and the prerogative. Thus it is not usual to enact that the Sovereign or her representative "shall" or "shall not" do an act. In the first case the word used is "may," and in the latter, the act itself is declared unlawful. In the draft of 1891 it was declared that the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal should be "final and conclusive," with a proviso that the Queen might give leave to appeal in certain specified cases. The legal effect was the same, but the expression was not open to the charge of discourtesy or disregard of established usage.

Thus we have it on the authority of the Chief Justice of Queensland that the establishment of a High Court is not mandatory, for until provision for salaries is made, no Judges can be appointed. The Attorney-General quoted Chief Justice Marshall as saying that a Federal High Court is the "keystone of the federal arch"; but in that quotation the Chief Justice was referring to the Supreme Court of the United States, a country which has no court of appeal outside its own territory. In the case of Australia, the High Court is not the final court of appeal, because we may, if we choose, go to the Privy Council, either from the High Court or from the Supreme Court of the States. The Attorney-General put the matter very tersely, I think, when he said—

The fundamental issue is whether this Parliament is called on at this time to establish a High Court, and, if so called on, whether the means proposed are adequate and not excessive.

That is the real crux—whether Parliament is called upon at this time to establish a High Court. I am of opinion that we are not, at this juncture, called on to take that step. In Canada, where there is no High Court in the same sense as in the United States, the people are able to perform all their legal work with satisfaction, and for years past have successfully carried on making appeals to the Privy Council, withstanding the disparagement passed that body by the Attorney-General, by the honorable and learned member Indi, I find that the former, in other parts of his speech, commends the decisions made by the Privy Council in cases submitted from the Dominion. Therefore, I think it that if we adopt what is called a "catch court" by the Attorney-General, we shall be adopting a system that was recommended by Sir Samuel Griffith in the reports which I quoted a few minutes ago. That report he also said—

Before leaving this branch of the subject I take pleasure to submit, as a question deserving of serious consideration, whether the work that would fall on the Federal Supreme Court is likely for some time to be sufficient to warrant the immediate creation of a complete separate judicial establishment. The arguments in favour of an independent Federal Judiciary are obvious, and are, no doubt, very cogent. It might, indeed, be necessary to have one or two exclusively Federal Judges to reserve the continuity of the tribunal, and to organize and supervise its machinery, but it is, I think, worthy of consideration—

As to this I specially direct the attention of the Attorney-General—

Whether it might not be wise to empower the Federal Parliament, if they think fit, to make laws authorizing the provisional constitution of the High Court, in whole or part, by Judges of the States Courts.

There is an opinion expressed by the Chief Justice of Queensland, that the Judges of the States Courts might perform all the functions of the High Court, so that the States might appeal to them for decisions on matters on which there was conflict in the several States, and that there would still be the final court of appeal provided for in the Constitution. The honorable and learned member for Indi referred to the visit to England of Mr. Justice Hodges, of Victoria, who made it very clear that the establishment of an Imperial Court of Appeal would be of immense advantage to the Empire. Should there be an amalgamation of the Committee of the House of Lords with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council take place, it would, as at present, be an appeal direct from the Supreme Courts of the Colonies. Such a court would, I think, be of more influence, and their decisions would be of even more value, than would those of a court established in Australia. While we have the pick of the best amongst 4,000,000, in Great Britain there is a choice amongst 40,000,000 of people. Great Britain is the commercial centre of the world, and has had wider scope of experience; and we may safely conclude that a court of that character would carry much more weight than would a court such as is proposed under this Bill. We must take into consideration what this magnificent measure will cost. The Attorney-General has modified his views upon this subject, as he finds that the Bill is not meeting with commendation. In the speech which the honorable and learned gentleman delivered last year upon the subject, he referred very fully to what the cost of the High Court would probably be. As he made but one quotation from that speech yesterday, I shall make one with a view of correcting the quotation which the honorable and learned gentleman then made. In the speech which he delivered last year, the honorable and learned gentleman said—

Honorable members will notice that we put down only the sum of £6,000 per year to provide for all these officers, say £7,000, including the salary of the Crown Solicitor. That added to the £15,000 paid as salaries to the Judges, after allowing for their travelling expenses, associates, &c., will bring the amount up to about £30,000 as a maximum.

Then I find that in another place he said—

In all these matters it is intended to commence in a tentative fashion. I do not think it will be necessary to have men wholly devoted to the duties of marshal the first few years. Probably, for a small honorarium we shall be able to obtain officers in the different States who will undertake those duties for some years to come.

And he also said—

On the Estimates we have provided £3,000 to cover the salaries of marshals, registrars, and other court officers, and contingencies for six months, or at the rate of £6,000 per annum. If we set down the sum at £7,000, that will cover the salary of the Crown Solicitor as well.

If honorable members will consider these figures they will find that there is proposed an expenditure of £15,500 for the Judges, £7,000 for court attendants, marshals, deputy-marshals, registrars, bailiffs, and so on, and a further sum of £7,500 for travelling expenses. Adding the £7,500 for travelling expenses to the £15,500 we find that £23,000 will be the sum actually paid to the Judges. It is not to be supposed that the Judges will be able to travel from one part of Australia to another without incurring heavy expenditure, and on the figures given it is clear that the amount of £4,600 per Judge is provided for in this estimate. The Attorney-General, however, says that these arrangements are merely tentative, that the £6,000 provided for court attendants will merely cover an honorarium to each of these officials, and will not cover the salaries they will be paid when they are more fully employed. Notwithstanding the Attorney-General's contention yesterday, that we could establish the court for not more than £20,000, we have it upon his own showing that the expenditure upon the Judges alone will be not less than £23,000, or £4,600 per Judge. That is an expenditure which is certainly not warranted, when it is not necessary to establish such a court. The citizens of the Commonwealth have at the present time every opportunity they need of securing justice by being able to appeal to the Privy Council without the establishment of this Australian High Court. We must, in addition to the £30,000 spoken of by the Attorney-General, take into consideration the fact that a large expense will be involved in securing court-houses, Federal police, and possibly Federal gaols as has been pointed out by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. The Attorney-General has certainly not shown to the satisfaction of lay members of the House, who are business men, that this High Court can be established and maintained for £30,000.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If the honorable member will look at section 120 of the Constitution, he will find that provision is already made for the custody of offenders against the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who is a lawyer of large experience, devoted himself very fully to this question, and made statements which the Attorney-General was quite unable to refute. The honorable and learned gentleman made no interjection to dispute the statements being made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. The chief opposition to the Federal Constitution, when it was before the people in the form of the Commonwealth Bill, was founded upon the expense likely to be involved in the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The honorable member surely believes that the States will give the use of courts and gaols, and the service of police, when they know that they will have to meet the expenditure proportionately afterwards if they do not?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—This expenditure will be borne proportionately. But it is contended by the Attorney-General that in certain States—where the Judicial Bench is weak—the Federal Judges on circuit will have the most work to perform. This court therefore will be a heavy tax upon the State of New South Wales—where the Bench is strong—as one-third of the cost of this Judiciary will fall upon the people of that State. We have found so far that everything wanted by the Commonwealth has had to be paid for. With the exception of this building, and the Government houses, the Commonwealth has had to pay rent for all the buildings occupied. Though we do not pay rent for this building, we pay for the upkeep of the gardens, and we pay a considerable amount in honorariums to officials attached to this building.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have our own officers here.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I know that on the Estimates passed last year there were large sums of money provided for officers about this House. I was saying that the principal opposition to the Commonwealth Bill when it was before the people was founded upon the heavy expenditure which the Federation was likely to entail. It was certainly hoped that the expense of the Federation might be curtailed below the Convention estimates. It was shown by an estimate submitted by our Speaker at the Adelaide Convention that the cost of the Federation would not be more than £300,000 a year. But it was afterwards contended in the press and upon public platforms that the establishment of the High Court and other Federal institutions would render the expenditure of the Federation too heavy for the people of the Commonwealth to bear. The opposition to the Commonwealth Bill on that ground was so keen in New South Wales that I feel it to be my duty, as a representative of that State, to do what I can to prevent the Government entering upon excessive expenditure. So that the fears entertained by the people with respect to the cost of Federation may not be verified, I shall be found voting deliberately against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. A. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I did not intend to say anything upon this question because my views are well number or more than a sufficient number of qualified lawyers to constitute a High Court themselves, have during the last two-and-a-half years allowed State Courts, vested with Federal jurisdiction, to try cases in which the Commonwealth has been interested, and to settle them. If the Government knew all this time that the action of those courts was ultra vires, and that they had no legal power, attention drawn to the fact at the present time comes a little too late. Are we to believe, as we are told now, that State courts could decide cases in which the Commonwealth is interested for two-and-a-half years, but they cannot continue to do so for five or six years? If that is the contention I refuse to believe it. If the decisions of those courts were legal during the past two-and-a-half years, they will be legal for five or six years, and if they will be illegal in the future they must have been illegal in the past. The honorable and learned member for Indi himself took part in some very important and prominent cases against the Commonwealth, which were heard before State Courts, and although, with all the force and ability of which he is capable, the honorable and learned gentleman raised other points, and said that certain action taken was ultra vires, did he for a moment contend that the courts themselves had no jurisdiction because there was no High Court in existence? The honorable and learned member never took that point, and we never heard of it until we find it used for the purposes of this Bill. I rely upon the Commonwealth Constitution, which sets forth that certain matters shall be dealt with within a given time. For instance, it provides that the Department of Customs and Excise shall be taken over by the Commonwealth Government immediately upon the creation of the Commonwealth. It provides that a uniform Tariff shall be adopted within two years of the creation of the Commonwealth. It provides that the bookkeeping provisions shall remain in force for ten years, but for the establishment of the High Court no time is fixed. It provides that there shall be a Federal High Court, but it does not say when that Federal High Court shall be established, and I venture to say that the common-sense and business view of the constitutional provision is that it shall be established when the necessity arises, and not before. If we establish it before the necessity for it has arisen we shall be incurring unnecessary expenditure, which, in my opinion, cannot be justified. I would again ask honorable members to consider the rate at which we are travelling in the matter of expenditure. The Pacific Island Labourers Act, when it is in full operation, will involve an annual expenditure of £340,000. Taking the yield of sugar at the figures which were supplied by the Minister for Trade and Customs, a bonus of £2 a ton on 170,000 tons, which is a moderate estimate, will amount to £340,000 a year. The minimum wage provision in the Public Service Act will, according to the Treasurer, involve an expenditure of from £40,000 to £45,000 a year.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He has reduced that estimate to £26,000, I think.

Mr. A. McLEAN.—For the first nine months of this year the expenditure has been £21,000 odd, and a large number of persons have yet to come in who have not been paid anything. If we put that expenditure down at £40,000, it is a very low computation. Our ordinary annual expenditure for last year was £275,000. The total expenditure provided for up to the present time has been at the rate of £655,000 a year, although the people of the Commonwealth were told that the additional expenditure in consequence of the establishment of the Commonwealth would not exceed £300,000 a year. It is £55,000 more than double that sum, and that is without the High Court, the Inter-State Commission, the capital, and the two transcontinental railways, with which the Government are coquetting. What will it amount to if we go on with these additional works? We were told by the Attorney-General last night that probably the High Court will not cost more than £23,000 a year. I am surprised that my honorable and learned friend is so much under the influence of his own seductive eloquence, I am perfectly sure that if he were not he would not for a moment believe that it would be within anything like these limits. The salaries of the Judges alone will be £15,500 a year. Then the salaries of five associates have to be paid. What will the travelling expenses of five Judges and five associates, passing continuously from one State to the other, amount to? They will amount to a sum very nearly as large as their salaries. When my honorable and learned friend tells us that they could utilize the State buildings and State officials, does any honorable member believe that that would continue to be done? Would he not be the first to come down in the session after the Court was established and tell us that it was derogatory to the dignity of the Commonwealth Government that they should go cap in hand to the States to ask for shelter for their Judges? We know perfectly well that the very same thing would occur in that session as occurred last session, with regard to our Public Works Department. We were told at first that we could use the State Departments of Public Works; but we were not in session very many months when the Minister for Home Affairs came down and told us that he would not rely on the State officers, that he must have his own Department of Public Works. What is the consequence of this policy? If repairs need to be effected to any building in an up-country township, we have the spectacle of a State officer going up to see if two or three palings require to be replaced on a State school, and of the Commonwealth inspector travelling up in the same train to see if a shingle or two or a sheet of iron require to be fixed on the local post-office. So we go on, duplicating work in every Department. The Commonwealth, as well as the State, must have its own complete set of Departments. I am not prepared to follow in that direction. I am prepared to give the Government a consistent support, so long as they show a reasonable regard for the material interests of the people. But I shall not follow any Government into, what I consider, reckless and extravagant expenditure. A High Court was, very properly, provided for in the Constitution, and when the time comes—and I have no doubt that it will come—it will be necessary for us to establish such a tribunal. But I hold that to do so before that time arrives would be an unnecessary piece of extravagance, and that every person having the interests of the people of the Commonwealth at heart should consider very seriously before committing himself to it. I regret to say that I cannot support this Bill, and therefore I have paired against its second reading.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—After having this subject debated so ably by the legal luminaries of the House, it may appear presumptuous for ordinary laymen to speak, but at the same time there are one or two phases of this very important question appeal particularly to laymen, and require a little consideration as well as legal aspects. I have listened carefully indeed to the arguments of the gentlemen, and of course it is necessary to do more than intimate for the purpose of the few remarks I have to make at there appear to be three courses open to us. We can leave things as they are, or we can patch up an arrangement with the States for utilizing their services, or we can adopt the measure proposed, with such alterations of course as may be thought necessary. I do not intend to discuss the second course, which is open to us. The proposal to leave things as they are, with the States for utilizing their services, has been made by the Judges of the High Court, but it seems to me to be so absurd and impracticable by any reasonable and learned member for India, that there is no necessity for dealing with that part of the question. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks more particularly to the question of whether we should leave things as they are. The famous plan of Mr. Chamberlain, when he was confronted with the proposal in the way of progress, was to ask impatiently, in language which I cannot exactly reproduce—"Why can't we do it alone?" This seems to be the attitude of many honorable members of the House, and I apprehend that this attitude was called into existence for the purpose of pushing forward things which could not be obtained for the people of Australia by the States Legislatures, and that the formation of a Federal Government was emphatically one of those things which we are asked, however, to stay our hands for a more or less indefinite period because one or two of the States are in a feverish condition in regard to retrenchment. I am sure that honorable members who ought to know better than to sympathize with such false cries as have been raised in this Parliament, in the direction of retrenchment, should be charged with extravagance, should not effect such charges here, when time and again it has been shown that the Federal Government is far from increasing the burden on the people of Australia, has in some respects reduced it. At any rate it cannot be shown that the total taxation of Australia in any way has been increased by the formation of the Federation. We are reminded that the people of Victoria are intensely anxious for retrenchment and reform. We are told that they have been indulging in an extravagant policy for some years, which it is necessary for this Parliament to put right, by leaving undone work which it was called into existence to perform. Sympathizing as I do to some extent with the people of this State, I cannot accept that position. If they look the situation fairly and squarely in the face, they will see a clear way out of their State difficulties. Instead of retrenching and injuring civil servants and railway employés—

Mr. SPEAKER. — I do not think that the honorable member can discuss the methods of retrenchment adopted in the Victorian Parliament.

Mr. FOWLER. — I was only wishing to show, sir, that this cry for economy on the part of Victorian representatives in this House is a false, and, to some extent, a hypocritical one, and I believe that in a very few words I can make my position perfectly clear.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The honorable member will only be in order if his remarks can be connected with the measure before the House.

Mr. FOWLER. — We are told, for instance, by honorable members that a serious loss has been going on in Victoria for some years in connexion with its railways. If the people of the State care to go thoroughly into that question they will probably find that that loss is to be traced rather to the centralizing policy of Melbourne than to any overmanning or overpaying of their employés.

Mr. SPEAKER. — I cannot see how the honorable member can connect these remarks with the Bill.

Mr. FOWLER. — I shall proceed to another phase which I think has a still closer bearing on the subject before the House. We are told again by the representatives of Victoria in the House that it is necessary to retrench—and that we should remember that State particularly in connexion with the proposal before the House—because there is no other alternative available. What do I find with regard to its taxable position? Turning to Coghlan, I find that in 1901-2 its indirect taxation amounted to £2,392,000, while its direct taxation was only £700,000. I have to say to its representatives here that it is their duty to tell the people of Victoria, and if necessary the State Government, that what is wanted is not a parsimonious attitude to the Federal Government, but rather a placing of the local taxation upon a proper basis. The taxation in Great Britain is, roughly speaking, one-half direct and one-half indirect. In Victoria we have less than one-third of direct taxation, and if the authorities will only place its taxation on a proper basis it will be able to overcome all its financial difficulties without any trouble. I listened very carefully to the excellent speech delivered last night by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. At one stage of his address he almost succeeded in convincing me that it would be wrong to support this measure. I refer to the point at which he particularly emphasized his opinion in regard to paragraph (b), sub-clause 2 of clause 41. He even went so far as to say that, if the construction which he placed upon it were put before an impartial authority, and decided against him, he would probably have to confess that a good deal of his opposition to the Bill was unfounded. To put it in a rough-and-ready way, as a layman must necessarily do, his contention was that it would be possible for appellants to pass the door of the Federal High Court, and go direct to the Privy Council. If that were the situation I should hesitate very much before committing myself to support this Bill. The honorable and learned member's contention was put with much earnestness, and coming as it did from a man of such recognised ability, it rather staggered me for the time being. But upon looking into this question a little further, what do I find? I find that the opinions of possibly a dozen men, including probably some of the best authorities in Australia, can be quoted in direct opposition to the view taken by him. That being so, I must say, with all respect for the honorable and learned member's opinion, that I feel impelled to recognise the views of such men as Sir Samuel Griffith, Senator Symon, and several other equally reputable authorities in Australia, as carrying considerable weight.

Mr. CONROY.—Those opinions were given before any alteration was made in the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. Those opinions were given after these provisions were made.

Mr. CONROY.—I admit my mistake. I should have said that they asserted at the time of the Convention that it would not be necessary to appoint a High Court if an appeal from it were allowed.

Mr. Fowler.

Mr. FOWLER.—Apart from that interjection, I may remark that apparently one of the reasons for the hostile attitude taken up in regard to this Bill by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne arises from the process which he has called a "tampering" with the Constitution, on the part of the Imperial authorities, before it was finally passed. With all deference to the honorable and learned member, I question whether that is a correct expression to use in regard to a perfectly legitimate and above-board action on the part of the Imperial authorities. As I understand the expression, no tampering whatever took place, and when I hear an honorable member indulging in language of that kind with regard to this measure, it very much vitiates the value of his argument. More than once in this House I have heard charges insinuated against statesmen in Great Britain, which I should hesitate to direct against even the most disreputable denizen of Pentridge. I am surprised to find the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne indulging in such language relative to a matter which gives no justification whatever for its use. One point which I have been particularly anxious to keep in view is the question of whether the High Court of Australia will have the interpretation of our Constitution. I am fairly familiar with the conditions which exist in Great Britain, so far as the superior courts there are concerned, and I indorse the attitude taken up by some honorable members who say that the Imperial authorities at Home are unlikely to be the best interpreters of our Australian conditions and our Constitution. There is no doubt that their environment must be altogether different from that of the High Court of Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—Both have merely to construe the law. Neither can attempt to make it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Influences that have much to do with the shaping of their decisions are frequently operating quite unconsciously in the minds of some of the most impartial Judges who have ever held office when they are construing the law. I do not think I am libelling the higher courts of Great Britain when I say that their unconscious bias—if I may use the term which has been used in this debate by honorable members who belong to the legal profession—is more frequently of a conservative than of a democratic kind.

CONROY.—The honorable member not say so if he saw some of the legislation. It is much more and democratic than ours.

FOWLER.—In some respects it

But I say that we can hardly our Constitution to be interpreted the courts with a due regard to all ditions, and in that atmosphere of ey which must surround the High of Australia. For that reason, and for son alone, I consider it is highly y to constitute the High Court at the opportunity. I view with a good alarm the possibility of interpreta- ing given, and of precedents being ed at the outset of our national h may hamper us in the future, ously interfere with the true pro- of Australia. The advantages to be from this High Court put the ques- expense wholly in the shade, and regard to the people as a whole, I that the expense involved will be icant compared with the advantages ll be derived from the creation of rt.

CONROY.—Does the honorable member to the estimate of £30,000 a to what the actual cost will be?

FOWLER.—I am not going to n any sum, although I shall cer- do my best to see that the expen- is kept within the limits indicated Bill. But, whatever the expense, endeavour to see that this Judi- f ours secures the highest possible of efficiency. I have to complimentorney-General upon the courageous which he has faced the cry for y now raging throughout his own lar State. He accepts the responsi- and I, for one, am willing to accept are of the responsibility of giving, earliest possible moment, to the of Australia, a High Court which, I, will be the stronghold of their n, and the interpreter in the worthiest blest sense of our Constitution.

CONROY (Werriwa).—The hour er late for me to commence my s, and perhaps it would be a con- t time to adjourn.

DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned or should allow the second reading arried. He will not lose his right k. Practically the first clause refers to the power to appoint five Judges, and raises the whole question again.

Mr. CONROY.—I think I should speak on the second-reading stage.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member must either proceed with his speech or resume his seat.

Mr. CONROY.—I was asking for the adjournment of the House, and I think time would be saved by consenting to my request.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Some honorable members have come back to-night in order to vote on the second reading.

Mr. CONROY.—It would be a considerable advantage to the Government if my request for an adjournment were allowed.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. This procedure is quite disorderly. The honorable and learned member must either proceed with his speech or some other step must be taken.

Mr. CONROY.—I think, that in a matter of this kind, it is unnecessary that the debate should be closed with any undue haste. In similar circumstances an adjournment has been granted to many other honorable members, but that privilege is denied to me. We are asked to give power under this Bill to establish a High Court, and we have the statement of the honorable and learned member for Indi on the one side, that that court is the natural corollary of the Constitution. I am one of those who assert that, at the present time at all events, it is not necessary for us to establish a High Court, and, if it were, the manner in which it is proposed under this Bill to establish it is open to serious criticism. I think that we are undertaking an unnecessary expense in proceeding in the way proposed. If a Bill had been brought in to establish a court of three Judges, with appellate jurisdiction, one might have been disposed to listen to the arguments advanced in favour of the proposal. If the immediate establishment of the High Court is absolutely required by the Constitution, and that were clearly proved, no doubt honorable members would accept the situation, and, regardless of the present financial position of the States, would say—"We must establish this court because the Constitution requires us to do so." But the position is very different. We have been told that the provision in our Constitution is similar to that in the Constitution of the United States, and the honorable and learned member for Indi very clearly and forcibly laid before the House his reasons for that assertion. But it seemed to me that he entirely overlooked an essential difference between the two Constitutions. Although he quoted the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, he did not quote the statement of that excellent Judge in which are given the reasons why it was absolutely necessary to establish a Federal Supreme Court in America. Mr. Justice Story points out that Congress could not vest any portion of the judicial power of the United States in any courts but those ordained and established by itself. We are in a very different position because we have power, not only to constitute a Federal High Court, and such other Federal Courts as we may think fit, but to invest State courts with Federal jurisdiction. As a proof of that statement I need only refer to clause 71 of the Bill, under which certain powers are given to the States courts. Mr. Justice Story points out that if in any of the cases enumerated in the Constitution, the States courts did not possess jurisdiction, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court could not reach them, and consequently the injunction of the Constitution that the judicial power should be vested would be disobeyed. There, again, is a marked difference between the position of the two countries. Here we have an absolute appellate jurisdiction over all the States courts, and can invest any one of them with Federal jurisdiction. The attitude of the honorable and learned member for Indi in regard to this matter was not that of a legally trained mind trying to consider it judicially, since, while he quoted one part of Mr. Justice Story's opinion, he did not quote another part which told against his argument. Mr. Justice Story goes on to show that Congress was bound to establish inferior courts in which to vest jurisdiction which, under the Constitution, was exclusively vested in the United States, and of which the Supreme Courts of the States could not take cognisance. It is true that the Government are quite within their rights in proposing to establish a Federal High Court consisting of five Judges. Section 71 of the Constitution says that the High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and not less than two other Justices, so that they could propose the appointment of as many other Judges, in addition to the Chief Justice, as they might think fit. One of the objections I have to the Bill is that the number of Judges it is sought to appoint cannot be sufficient for both appellate and original jurisdiction. If it were proposed merely to set up an appellate court, no doubt five Judges would be sufficient; indeed, I should have been prepared to reduce the number to three. That would have brought about a saving of £6,000 per annum in the first instance, and a further saving of the salaries of two associates. We know that every Judge must travel around, not only with his associate, but with his tipstaff, and that there will be attendants with all the officials. Therefore, it will be incumbent upon us to limit the number to the lowest that will be consistent with the requirements of justice. Unless the Government can clearly show that the larger number of Judges is necessary in the case of appellate jurisdiction, we can take the opportunity of expressing our disapproval when the clause is before us. Then the honorable and learned member for Indi did not think we could appoint Judges from the Supreme Courts of the States to be Justices of the High Court—that they would not be qualified to sit. I do not know under what section of the Constitution he attempted to fortify himself in making that assertion, because he did not mention it. But the idea of the framers of this Bill was very different from that. We find in clauses 4 and 7 of the Bill that the qualifications of the Judges of the High Court are to be as follows:—Either a Judge of the Supreme Court of a State or a practising barrister or solicitor of a State Supreme Court of not less than five years' standing. The Government recognise in clause 4 that a Judge of the High Court could be appointed from the Supreme Court of a State. But when we come to clause 7 we find them stating that a Justice of the High Court shall not be capable of accepting or holding any other office or place of profit within the Commonwealth except such as may be granted to him under the King's sign-manual. If that clause is to be carried out in its entirety, what does it mean? In clause 4 the Government recognise that any Judge of a Supreme Court may be appointed a Justice of the High Court, and therefore the contention of the honorable and learned member for Indi was not recognised by the Attorney-General in the framing of this Bill. If a Justice of the High Court is not capable of holding any other place of profit within Commonwealth, it would prevent any amendment whatever being made to the Court of any Judge of a Supreme Court even temporarily. I do not think the words following—"except such as appointed to him under the King's sign"—would get over the difficulty, because the Judges of the various Supreme Courts are not appointed in that way. In section 72 of the Constitution it is said that Justices of the High Court, and other courts established by the Parliament—shall not be removed, except by the Governor-in-Council, on an address from both Houses of Parliament in the same session, praying for removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity.

We remember that the Judges are to be elected in that way, and that they are so valuable, I trust that we have heard the Attorney-General on behalf of the Ministry of the Crown that we are to place upon the Court Bench a body of men who will amplify or extend the law. Because, in the assertions of the Attorney-General, anything at all, they meant that in interpreting the law which they were called upon to interpret the Judges would absorb and make law. There can have been no other meaning, when it was asserted that the Judges appointed would be more in sympathy with the Federal spirit than State—that is to say that the Government would appoint only such men in the first place as would amplify the law. I consider that what we want is not a body of Judges who are willing to do that, because it is not their place. We are here to decide, it is the function of the Executive to carry out the legislation, and it is the function of the Judiciary to construe the law only.

The Attorney-General says that these Judges are to be a body of men whom we should have reverence and esteem. A nice thing to say if we are to be called upon to interpret such a high body of men to whom the law says what it really does not say. A pretty thing if we are to have a Court of that sort! The Government has a fine idea of the duty of Judges, if they consider that it is their duty to interpret the law and to stretch it. No other meaning can be assigned to the statement of the Attorney-General except that the Judges are to expand the law to suit the desires of the Federal authorities. What about the State authorities? Where do they come in?

Have they no rights? In many respects their rights are entirely sovereign. Yet we are to have a Court constituted which, in the opinion of the Attorney-General in charge of this Bill—and consequently in the opinion of the Cabinet itself, which will have the making of these appointments—will act in such a Federal spirit that they will be able, perhaps, to take away from the States rights which they at present enjoy. Can any man look at that position with calmness? Is that the way in which we are called upon to legislate? Is that the reason why the Federal Parliament was called into being? Nothing of the sort. I say distinctly that the mere statement on behalf of the Ministry that there would be found in this Commonwealth a body of men who would be likely to act in such a fashion, is in itself sufficient to show that there will not be that wise and just discretion exercised in choosing the occupants of these high positions, should this Bill pass, that we should like to see.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—I ask the Attorney-General to allow the debate to be adjourned until to-morrow, with a view to allowing the honorable and learned member for Werriwa to continue his speech. We have reached a late hour, and honorable members desire to catch their trains.

Mr. DEAKIN.—This being only the second night of the debate on an important Bill, I should have felt it a matter of course to grant the request preferred by the right honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon. But the honorable and learned member for Werriwa is perfectly well aware that, under the impression that there was to be no further speaking before the vote was taken, an impression arrived at in consultation with that honorable member, a number of honorable members have been detained or brought back to the House. If there had been shown any indication of a desire to prolong the debate to-morrow, so reasonable a request could not have been refused for one instant. It is unfortunate that a number of honorable members have been greatly inconvenienced by this request, at the last moment, for an adjournment; but now that the request has been made by the acting leader of the Opposition, as well as by the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, I have no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I wish to point out that interpositions to debate, such as those just made by the right honorable member for Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, and the Attorney-General, are not provided for in any way by the standing orders. I perceive it is the desire of the House that if possible the sitting should not be prolonged, and so I did not prohibit the remarks; but it must be understood that no interpositions of the kind can be permitted under the standing orders except by leave.

Debate (on motion by Mr. CONROY) adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.—POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

In submitting this motion I desire to point out that the two Bills relating to the sugar rebate will be taken first to-morrow, in order that the Treasurer may explain them, and that the House will then proceed with the Judiciary Bill.

Mr. BATCHELOR (South Australia).—Honorable members will remember that during the passage of the Public Service Bill promises were made by the Minister in charge of the measure—sometimes the Attorney-General, and at other times the Minister for Home Affairs—that all persons employed in the State Departments taken over should, though technically on the pro tem. status, be classified as permanent employes. These men were practically permanently employed, and the promise given by Ministers had a great deal to do with inducing honorable members not to place any provision in the Bill dealing expressly with their case. I informed the Minister for Home Affairs that I intended to draw attention to this matter, and, in his absence, I desire to point out to the Prime Minister that in the line-repairing branch of the Post and Telegraph Department there is a very considerable body of men with services ranging from 20 to 30 years, but none of whom have been brought under the Act. That, of course, is a disadvantage to these men, and is apparently not carrying out the promises made to the House. There may be some circumstances which have caused a suspension of their right to be brought under the Act; but so far the only reason I have heard is that it is ridiculous to have a court of appeal which would be required to traverse the continent of Australia in order to inquire whether a cook in a line repairer's camp should be dismissed. That may be an argument against the provision made in the Act for a court of appeal, but it is no reason why a section of the temporary employes in the Post-office should be excluded from the benefits conferred by the Act. If the Government think that the law, as it stands, is ridiculous, they should take steps to amend it. I hope the Prime Minister will take a note of what I have said, so that the Minister for Home Affairs may adopt the measure necessary to bring all the men who are now under suspension within the operation of the Act at the expiration of the six months term, on 30th inst.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I might remind the Prime Minister that a deputation waited upon him just before the Act was gazetted.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There had been a notification of the exemption of these men from the operation of the Act.

Mr. TUDOR.—Yes, and the object of the deputation was to protest against the exemption. It was then represented that some time must elapse before the Public Service Commissioner could bring the men who were in temporary employment under the provisions of the Act, and the deputation did not then press their protest. Now, however, that the term of exemption has almost expired, I hope that no further extension will be granted. At present the men are not only prevented from sharing in the benefits of the court of appeal, but they are also deprived of the advantages of the provision regarding the minimum wage. I understand that many of the temporary hands employed in the Post and Telegraph Department have been served with notices that their services will be dispensed with at the end of June, and I hope that the whole question will be inquired into by the Minister for Home Affairs, and that the men will not any longer be treated as temporary hands.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I desire, on behalf of those public servants in New South Wales who are concerned in this matter, to support the request made by the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor. At the time exemption was granted, the Public Service Commissioner considered that he would not have me difficulty in dealing with temporary employes in New South Wales than those in some other States. Months, I think, is ample time in which to fulfil the promise which was given that the men should be placed upon the permanent staff. I press the matter upon the attention of the Prime Minister, because I think that some of the officers who may report on it are averse to conferring upon men thus employed the standing which they themselves enjoy.

EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Member for External Affairs).—I have a recollection of the deputation which came upon me several months ago in connection with this matter, although I shall need to refresh my memory upon it. I will put the points which have been advanced by the honorable members before the Minister for External Affairs, in whose Department the matter rests. To what extent the Commissioner has a free hand in questions of this kind I am not at the present moment able to recall, but no doubt that question has been satisfactorily settled. So far as any action appears to have been worked, I have sufficient faith in the Commissioner to believe that he will do his best to remedy it. The question is resolved in the affirmative.

Senate.

Thursday, 11 June, 1903.

PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 and read prayers.

ELECTORAL ACT: REGULATIONS.

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

When the regulations under the Electoral Act specially those mentioned in sub-section 139, will be issued?

Will such regulations be framed before the close of the present session, in order to give members an opportunity of discussing them before being used in the next elections?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's question is as follows:—

It is intended to prepare regulations under the Electoral Act to provide facilities for enabling members to vote at elections for the Senate and for the use of Representatives in accordance with the provisions of section 139, and to lay the regulations before the House of Representatives of the existing Parliament.

MAIL SERVICES.

Senator WALKER asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What quantities of mail matter, letters, packages, and newspapers were despatched and received in 1902 by the Vancouver and the San Francisco routes respectively?

2. What was the expenditure and the financial result to the Commonwealth of each mail service?

Senator DRAKE.—The following is the answer to the honorable senator's questions:—

The necessary inquiries are being made, and a reply will be given in due course.

ECCLESIASTICAL PRECEDENCE.

Senator HIGGS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Does the question of ecclesiastical precedence at Commonwealth functions affect the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth?

2. If so, will the Government submit the matter for the consideration of the Parliament of the Commonwealth?

3. Is it true that the question of ecclesiastical precedence is the subject of correspondence between the Government and the Colonial Office?

4. If so, does the Prime Minister think that the officers in the Colonial Office know more about the question as it affects Australia than the members of the Federal Parliament?

Senator DRAKE.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follows:—

1. It may affect its peace.

2. No occasion has yet arisen for doing so.

3. The whole question of precedence has been the subject of correspondence.

4. I am unable to say whether the Prime Minister has instituted any comparison.

TRADE PREFERENCE.

Senator HIGGS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Has the Government observed that Mr. H. A. Grainger, the Agent-General of South Australia, is reported to have written a letter to the London Standard, stating that the colonies ask Great Britain to make a beginning, however small, in the direction of trade preference?

2. Have the States of Australia made any request of the kind. If so, through what channel?

3. What Australian products is it proposed to allow into Great Britain at a lower duty than is charged other nations?

4. What British manufactures is it proposed to allow into Australia at a lower duty than is charged other nations?

5. If Mr. Chamberlain proposes that Australia shall allow British manufactures into Australia at a low duty, will the Prime Minister ask for a guarantee that the British manufacturer shall pay his employés the Australian rates of wages for the Australian number of working hours?

6. Can the Prime Minister give the Parliament any details of the proposals for preferential trade?

7. Would it not be likely to save a lot of misunderstanding, heartburning, and disappointment to get down to details at once?

Senator DRAKE.—The following are the answers to the honorable senator's questions:—

1. Such a statement has been observed in the press.

2. No official or collective request has been made. I cannot answer as to any other.

3. The Government has no official information on the question.

4. No proposal has yet been formulated.

5. I think not, but the question is somewhat premature.

6. Not at present.

7. That is a matter for argument.

LETTER CARRIERS: QUEENSLAND.

Senator GLASSEY asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is he aware that the letter-carriers and others employed in the Postal service of Queensland, who have previously been paid overtime allowance and mail money which is part of their earnings, have been deprived of this portion of their earnings since the beginning of the present year?

2. Will he take such action in this matter as will enable these men to draw this portion of their earnings without further delay?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's questions is as follows:—

1 and 2. The numerous payments made by way of special allowances to officers required a careful investigation of the circumstances before they could be continued under the altered conditions of the service. This inquiry necessarily took some time, but it is now so far completed that a decision in each case will be arrived at in a few days, and it is expected the amounts due will be ready for payment next week.

I may add that just before entering the Chamber I ascertained that the amounts due to the men under the old arrangement will be paid at once up to the end of this month, and whatever may be due to them under the new circumstances will be ascertained.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Resolved (on motion by Senator CLEMONS)—

That leave of absence for fourteen days be granted to Senator Matheson on account of urgent private business.

STANDING ORDERS.

In Committee. (Consideration resumed from 10th June, vide page 685.)

Standing Orders 177 and 178 agreed to.

Standing Order 179—

The title shall agree with the order of leave, and no clause shall be inserted in any such draft not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am afraid that the marginal note—"compare South Australia 275"—is a little misleading, because that standing order refers solely to the title of the Bill, and has no relation to its subject-matter. It is a very excellent rule, which reads as follows:—

No clause shall be inserted in any such draft foreign to the title of the Bill.

Its object is to prevent the insertion of clauses that are irrelevant to the title which is on the draft Bill. Our proposed standing order is more restrictive than that one. There is no reason why we should restrict the opportunities which honorable senators may have so long as they keep the provisions of their Bills within the titles given by the orders of leave. We are introducing into our standing orders something which has no relation to the titles of Bills. Our present rule says that when a Bill is introduced it shall contain no clause which is foreign to the title, which is specified in the order of leave, and if subsequently we insert provisions which are not within the title, power is given by a subsequent standing order to the Committee to alter the title accordingly, and to make a special report to the Senate. The only object of the proposed standing order is to prevent a clause being inserted in a draft Bill which is foreign to the title, and the use of the words "or not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill" very much enlarges the scope. As it is supposed to be founded on the South Australian Rule No. 275, we ought to adhere to that rule.

Senator DOBSON.—Which is the more restrictive rule?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The one which is before the Committee. All we require to provide at this stage, as is done in our present rule, is that no clause in a draft Bill shall be foreign to its title. The only restriction which ought to be placed on an honorable senator is that the provision of a Bill which he presents pursuant to the order of leave, shall be within title therein contained. The subject-matter of the Bill we deal with at a later stage. But it will be very unfair to ask an honorable senator when he brings up a Bill, or at the first reading of it, to have him given that some particular clause is irrelevant to the subject-matter, when the Senate in committee may decide that that particular clause is perfectly relevant. It is to protect honorable senators and to see that they are free from all restrictions in introducing Bills. If a clause of a Bill differs from the title that is a matter for immediate ruling, and can be dealt with; but the question whether some clause is relevant to the subject-matter ought not to be left to an immediate ruling. The President of the Senate ought not to be placed in the position of ruling that a clause in a Bill is out of order because it is not relevant to the subject-matter. That is not his function at this stage. All we have to do is to give a senator leave to introduce a Bill and to give him the title, and then to see that no clause in the Bill differs from the title or goes beyond it. We can all decide that. If we give power to the President to say whether any clause in a Bill is relevant to the subject-matter we give a power which is easily controlled by the Senate than we would if the question simply is whether a particular clause differs from the title. Any member of the Senate can say at once whether a clause differs from the title of a Bill, but it is a different thing to say whether a clause is relevant to the subject-matter. It would be a pity to make a change in our existing standing orders in this respect. The practice in South Australia has been limited to compelling a member who brings in a Bill to see that his clauses do not go beyond the title. An injustice may possibly be done to a senator in having a ruling given which may be no possibility of checking. The title of a Bill is like the writing on the wall. Every one can understand the titles of Bills nowadays are made much more elastic than they used to be. The Minister for Trade and Customs, whose position as a draftsman is well known, has in recent years in South Australia, indeed, the practice of giving Bills such a title as—"A Bill relating to such-and-such, for other purposes."

Senator DRAKE.—What does "other purposes" mean?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If it is intended by this standing order to defeat that convenient practice, let us understand it. That is a good reason it may be for departing from the old standing order, the object of which was to get rid of technicalities. If the committee puts in the words "not relevant to the subject-matter," it transfers a subject which has to be decided by the President from the title to the words of the Bill, and that may raise some difficulties. I move—

That the words "not relative to the subject-matter of the Bill" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "foreign to its title." I think that honorable senators will find that that is the form adopted by the other branch of the Legislature.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Senator Symon is asking us to take a very retrograde step. He is asking us to go back to a practice which was found wanting a long time ago. The original practice of the House of Commons was that a Bill, as introduced, should contain no clauses not within the title of the Bill. That was also the practice in most of our State Parliaments for a very considerable time. But it was found to be too restrictive. It was found that it prevented a great many clauses being introduced in a Bill which the mover and originator of the Bill thought ought to be introduced. Honorable senators will, no doubt, be aware that of late years the tendency has been to reduce the preamble of a Bill, and to diminish the title to a very short wording. In fact, the preamble has almost entirely disappeared, and the titles of Bills have become very short. In consequence of that tendency, the various Legislatures have found it necessary to alter their standing orders, and to give more scope to the introducers of Bills to put into them all they want. Instead of this standing order being, as Senator Symon has argued, a restriction, it is the reverse. The senator who introduces a Bill introduces what he likes, and what he introduces is the subject-matter of his Bill. He may include in that subject-matter almost anything he wishes relevant to the Bill. As a matter of fact, if this amendment is carried, honorable senators will be very much restricted indeed. It may be that the marginal note of the standing order is not quite clear, but that is of small importance. The amendment is inconsistent with the present practice of the British House of Commons, and of almost all legislative bodies. We want to give as free as possible scope to senators to introduce Bills, and to put into those Bills every clause that they think fit. Take an illustration. Suppose an honorable senator moves that he have leave to introduce a Bill to do so and so. He can introduce into that Bill almost anything he likes that is in any way relevant or has any connexion with the title. But there may be clauses introduced into that Bill when it is first presented, which are foreign to the title. The standing orders say that if that happens the title must be altered before the measure passes; and that is all. I hope we shall not adopt such a restrictive provision, and go back so many years in, I will not say the history, but the practice of legislation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am quite confident that this question is not to be settled by describing an amendment intended to conform with our existing standing orders as restrictive. It is very much better if we can to avoid the use of any epithet of that description when we are dealing with what best gives effect, not only to parliamentary practice, but to the rights of honorable senators. No consideration seems to have been given to this subject, or to the South Australian standing order when our draft standing orders were framed. When I originally read the marginal note to this standing order, and saw the words "clauses to come within the title," I passed it. Then I read it again, and found that instead of the standing order providing that clauses were to come within the title, it said that no clause was to be inserted that was not relative to the subject-matter of the Bill. What Senator Baker, no doubt, intended to give us was a standing order providing that the clauses of a Bill should come within the title, but what the Standing Orders Committee have done is to give us a provision that no clause shall be inserted that is not relevant to the subject-matter. That is a very different thing. Who is to decide it? What does Senator Baker ask the Senate to accept? That anything an honorable senator who introduces a Bill puts into it is the subject-matter of the Bill. If that be admitted we do not want the standing order at all. We are prescribing the course to be adopted in the initiation of a Bill. What we require is that the title shall be specified in the order of leave. If the title is specified the clauses of the Bill must come within the title. That is the initiatory stage provided for in these standing orders—that no clause shall be in a Bill that is not relevant to the subject-matter. But who is to decide that? The question to consider is, what is the object of initiation? Is it to deal with the subject-matter or what is specified in Standing Order 177? If an honorable Senator conforms to that, he has a right to bring in his Bill, and not to be questioned as to the subject-matter of his Bill when he gives his title. A Senator introducing a Bill, says in effect: "In the form of this leave I bring in my Bill, every clause of which conforms to the title." There is the landmark—the title—and by that is the right to introduce a Bill tested, and not by the ipse dixit of the occupant of the Chair for the time being, influenced, it may be, by his political views. It is the Senate, and not the occupant of the Chair, who should judge the subject-matter of a Bill. Why should we depart from the existing standing order, which has been suggested for adoption also in another place? I am sure that none of us has the slightest wish to interfere with the privileges of honorable senators, and they will be seriously interfered with by the proposed standing order. I should like to hear some precedent given for a standing order allowing a ruling to be given as to the subject-matter of a Bill at the time of its introduction. If such a precedent can be submitted, I shall be the first to bow to it.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General). — The honorable and learned senator should remember that these South Australian standing orders were adopted with very little consideration indeed. He will remember that he moved a motion by which a sub-committee was appointed to consider the standing orders of the various States and bring up a report within 24 hours, a task which I pronounced at the time to be quite impossible. In order to overcome the difficulty the sub-committee recommended as a temporary expedient, and without consideration of the standing orders of the other States, that we should adopt the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia. That is no good reason why we should not now depart from them if we think it advisable to do so. I have not the advantage of being well acquainted with the practice of South Australia, but I know that in Queensland and in New South Wales the rule is that at all stages of a Bill the whole of the matter contained in it must conform to the order of leave. I know that Senator Symon raises his objection particularly on the point that the standing order proposes action to be taken at the introduction of a Bill. But the question is whether all clauses, whether originally in the Bill or subsequently inserted, should conform to the subject-matter or the title of the Bill. In Queensland and New South Wales, the title of a Bill may be altered at any time. Under the practice there, any amendment which is relevant and conforms to the subject-matter of a Bill, may be agreed to, and if the title of the Bill does not fit the new matter introduced the title has to be altered. The very last thing done with a Bill may be to alter the title in order to make it fit the subject-matter. But the whole of the subject-matter of a Bill must be homogeneous. In my opinion, the standing order, as now proposed, is a better safeguard than that previously adopted, because the titles of Bills are now often very short. A Bill is introduced, for instance, to amend a certain law, and the words "and for other purposes" which are very often inserted have been held to have very little meaning, because, in carrying out the standing orders, the President or the Chairman of Committees will look past them to see whether an amendment proposed is relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill; otherwise a clause might be put in in the last stages of a Bill which would come within the title, but which would be foreign to the subject-matter of the Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is there a standing order like this in New South Wales?

Senator DRAKE.—I do not say there is, but I am arguing as to what can be done with an amendment. According to the practice to which I have been accustomed, any amendment may be introduced which is relevant to the subject-matter of a Bill, and if the title does not fit it the title must be altered. If that is so, and a ruling to that effect may be given at any time, why should not it be given at an early rather than at a late stage of the Bill?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I ask the indulgence of honorable senators to refer to May's Parliamentary Practice, which sets forth the practice of the House of Commons as being exactly what I have endeavoured to explain, and what is embodied in the South Australian standing orders at present adopted by the Senate. At the initiation of a Bill the only thing we have to look at is the title, and whether the Bill conforms to the title, which is the essential part of the order of leave. An honorable senator moves that he have leave to introduce a Bill entitled so and so. That is all the Senate knows, or can know at the time, of the subject-matter of the Bill; and if the order of leave is conformed to in that way, then the honorable senator's privilege is clear to carry his Bill through its first and second reading. This is what May says at page 440 of the 10th edition, as to the practice of the House of Commons—

In preparing Bills great care must be taken that they do not contain provisions which are not authorized by the order of leave; that the prefatory paragraph prefixed to a Bill which defines the object thereof, known as the title of the Bill, corresponds with the order of leave; and that the Bill itself is prepared pursuant to the order of leave and in proper form.

The South Australian standing order under which we work at present is exactly in conformity with the practice of the House of Commons. The standing order we are here asked to pass departs from the practice laid down by the existing standing order, and it is also a departure from the House of Commons practice as laid down by May. We may very well adhere to the practice of the House of Commons and to our present practice, and leave the standing order in a shape which merely enables the Chair to rule whether a particular Bill conforms to the title in the order of leave. Senator Drake quite unconsciously rather confused the object of the standing order, which has nothing to do with amendments extending beyond the title. These can be introduced in Committee. We may make a Bill intended for one purpose cover half-a-dozen different purposes; but if that be done we must at the close of the proceedings in Committee move that the title be enlarged to embrace those purposes. If we adopt the standing order now proposed we shall be doing violence to the practice of the House of Commons, which has existed for centuries, and we shall be giving a power to the Chair to prevent an honorable senator introducing a Bill and having its subject matter considered in Committee, not because it does not conform to the order of leave, the test of which is the title, but because in the estimation of the Chair it contains some provisions which are not relevant to the subject-matter.

Senator CLEMONS.—Where do we find the subject-matter?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot find the subject-matter anywhere until the Bill has been introduced. The standing order proposed is really an absurdity. It is very important that we should not restrict the privileges of honorable senators in introducing Bills, and in one aspect this standing order is worse than a restriction, because it puts an autocratic power in the hands of the President of the Senate to give a ruling upon the subject-matter of a Bill, which we have not before us at all.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The argument just used by Senator Symon is untenable. The honorable and learned senator says that we propose to give an autocratic power to the occupant of the Chair to rule a Bill out of order, if any of its provisions are contrary to the subject-matter. But the honorable and learned senator is willing to give the Chair power to rule a Bill out of order, if any of its provisions are not in accordance with the order of leave. Where is the difference? There will be just as much difficulty in arriving at a conclusion, and just as much room for argument upon any conclusion arrived at by the Chair in the one case as there will be in the other. In all my experience I have never known a Bill ruled out of order for any reason when first introduced. We are really fighting a shadow, because I do not suppose for one moment that a Bill introduced by a senator would so far transgress the order of leave, or so far wander from the subject-matter as to be ruled out of order. Senator Symon has referred to the practice of the House of Commons, and I shall now read from May, 9th edition, page 566—

In the Commons, all amendments were formerly required to be within the scope and title of the Bill; but by standing order, 19th July, 1854—

Any amendment may be made to a clause provided the same be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, or pursuant to any instruction, and be otherwise in conformity with the rules and orders of the House; but if any amendment shall not be within the title of the Bill, the Committee are to amend the title accordingly and report the same specially to the House.

Since then the test always has been relevancy to the subject-matter of the Bill. As I said before, the House of Commons and various other Legislatures have found wanting the test as to the title of the Bill. In order to give more freedom to members, and to enable matters to be brought under consideration, the rule was enlarged and the subject-matter was made the test. If, of course, honorable senators wish to restrict themselves it does not matter to me; I am quite prepared to administer any standing order the Senate may make.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is your duty to do so.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I am now speaking personally; and I am only anxious to give to senators the greatest freedom and the greatest power.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—This seems to be a somewhat praiseworthy effort at complication which arises from a confused train of thought. The standing order, as we found it, like every other standing order, was extremely simple. For instance, in the corresponding standing order adopted by the House of Representatives is—

The title shall agree with the order of leave, and no clause shall be inserted in any Bill foreign to its title.

That is perfectly simple, and can be clearly understood.

Senator DRAKE.—It was probably copied from the South Australian standing order.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not deny that; I am simply saying that that is the standing order adopted by the House of Representatives.

Senator DRAKE.—It is only a temporary standing order; the House of Representatives has not yet passed standing orders.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am well aware of that. In the standing order now before us there is a confusion between the subject-matter and the title. In the original standing order there is the clear connexion between the title and the order of leave, and we have the fact that every clause must be cognate, and in harmony with the title. The standing order before us requires that the title shall agree with the order of leave; and that is all right. But then it proceeds—and no clause shall be inserted in any such draft not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill.

Where is the connexion between the subject-matter and the title? These may be as far asunder as the poles. The subject-matter be decided to be one thing, and the title be taken to cover something totally different.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Bill is given in print at that stage.

Senator CLEMONS.—Of course it is and who is to say what the subject-matter is? No one, not even our present President, could say what the subject-matter is on the initiation of a Bill. All we can know is the title. Under this standing order it would be competent for the occupant of the Chair for the time to rule that some clause was not relevant to the title. But at that stage we are to decide on so vague a question as to the subject-matter? We have heard from Senator Baker that the present standing order is quite in conformity with other standing orders. No doubt in conformity with the other standing orders which provides for amendments; and Senator Baker's arguments had been put before us in discussing Standing Order 195, which would have been applicable and of which Standing Order 195 is as follows:—

"An amendment may be made to any part of a Bill provided the same be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill and be otherwise in conformity with the rules and orders of the Senate."

An amendment is very different from an original clause, and the standing order I read is most excellent at the stage to which it applies. Between an amendment and the subsequent stage of a Bill and a clause in the Bill as laid on the table, there is a vast difference. This standing order has been complicated without any benefit, and it would be far better to go back to the simple condition in which we found it and every other standing order, and remove all doubt and difficulty. I would suggest that all the words in the standing order after the word "such" be struck out. The word "draft" is used. It ought to be

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The honorable senators may be of opinion that "Bill" is a better word than "draft," and yet not be prepared to vote for the other words be struck out.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—To remove any doubt, I am prepared to withdraw the amendment, and to suggest as a preliminary, that the word "Bill" be substituted for the word "draft."

The amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) agreed to—

That the word "draft," line 2, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "Bill."

Amendment (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That all the words after the word "Bill," be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "foreign to its title."

Standing Order 181—

Except as to Bills which the Senate may not amend, the question "That this Bill be now read a first time," shall be put by the President immediately after the same has been received, and shall be determined without amendment or debate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I wish to direct attention to a word which I think ought to be changed. The only Bills which we receive are those which come from the other House, and which are dealt with under another standing order. The word "received" may be applicable to such Bills, but it is not applicable to the Bills which are presented to the Senate under Standing Order 178. I suggest that we should use the word "presented," which is to be found in our present standing order. It is only fair that we should hear the view of Senator Dobson, who is a member of the Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Dobson.—I think that the word "presented" ought to go in.

The CHAIRMAN. — The word "received" is a technical one which, I think, should be allowed to remain. A senator presents and the Senate receives a Bill. The proceeding is thus described in May—

The Speaker thereupon calls upon him by name: he answers "a Bill, sir," and the Speaker desires him to "bring it up," upon which he carries the Bill to the table, and delivers it to the Clerk of the House, who reads the short title aloud; when the Bill is said to have been "received by the House."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am exceedingly obliged to you, sir, for your explanation. I am only pointing out that in each instance the word "presented" is used in our existing Standing Orders 277 and 278. With Senator Dobson, I think it is the right word to use, because it would cover both cases.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It seems to me altogether a misuse of words to say that a Bill is presented by the House of Representatives. A Bill is sent up here, where it is received. A senator presents a Bill, and the Senate receives it. The standing order is quite right as it is.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—After the view which has just been expressed with so much vigour, I shall not press my objection.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Order 182—

In Bills which the Senate may not amend the question, "That this Bill be now read a first time," may be debated, and the debate need not be relevant to the subject-matter of such Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia). — This standing order deals with a matter of a very grave nature. It relates to Money Bills, which are dealt with in a separate chapter, beginning at Standing Order 225. It deals with Bills affected by the financial sections of the Constitution. Having regard to the great power which the Senate has in connexion with Money Bills, it should have some corresponding opportunity to that which is possessed by the other House of dealing with grievances. I suggest that we should delay the consideration of this standing order until we come to deal with the whole question of Money Bills in another chapter. It is out of place in a chapter which has no relation to Money Bills in particular, but which deals generally with Bills which come before the Senate for consideration. I should like to have the standing order considered in connexion with the provisions dealing with Money Bills, so that we may have all the rules relating to such Bills set out in one part of our code.

Senator DOBSON.—This standing order does not affect our relations with another place.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have two sets of standing orders dealing with Money Bills, which can only come to us from another place; and why should we not insert this particular rule, which relates to Money Bills, in its proper place in our code? It is very desirable that we should have a clear arrangement of our standing orders.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It seems to me that the standing order is in its right place. We are now dealing with first readings, and the first reading of a Bill which we may not amend comes under that heading. In the first place, we say generally that the first reading of a Bill shall not be debated, and then we say that the first readings of particular Bills may be debated. I admit that it is not a matter of very much importance; but I submit that the standing order is in its right place.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I move—

That the consideration of Standing Order 182 be postponed until after the consideration of Standing Order 225.

My desire is to make the standing order as large as possible in terms, and if it is shown to be large enough as it stands, I shall have no objection to its being inserted immediately after No. 225.

Motion agreed to.

Standing Order 183—

No Bill shall be read a first time unless the same be in print.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I would ask Senator Drake to consent to the elimination of this standing order. Our practice is that after leave is obtained by an honorable senator the Bill is presented and read a first time without debate, and the next motion is that the Bill be printed, and the second reading be made an order of the day for a certain day. This standing order will compel an honorable senator who, perhaps, may not desire to proceed with his Bill after it has been read a first time to get it printed before it is introduced. Why should he be put to the expense of printing his Bill when between of the first reading and the day on for the second reading he might have in his mind?

MR. DRAKE.—Why does he bring in a Bill? A senator does not bring in a Bill for fun.

MR. SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—Why do we have difficulties by requiring a Bill to be read before it is read a first time? A Bill is usually read a first time while it is in the Bill-book. The Government Printing-office and the Government are always anxious in facilitating the printing of Bills by private senators, but why go to the expense of printing Bills before the first reading and before it is known whether the senator desires to give leave to print? The Government may say—"We will not allow you to print your Bill, and to print it," and then to reject the motion for the first reading under the present standing order is—

Under the first reading the question shall be whether this Bill be printed, and the second reading shall be made an order of the day for such-and-such a day.

Is it better than that?

MR. DRAKE.—There are very strong arguments in favour of this standing order. It is not to have Bills printed as soon as they are read a first time, as it is desirable that they shall be circulated before that time. If the expense of printing has to be considered, what harm is there in requiring a Bill to be printed before the first reading? The Senate should not be seized of the contents of Bills until it is as possible. A small check like this is reasonable. We do not want to have Bills coming along with piles of manuscripts which they never intend to have printed, and then sending them down, and asking the senator to have them read a first time. Government Bills have always been printed before the first reading.

MR. CLEMONS.—What about Senator Symon's Divorce Bill?

MR. DRAKE.—That could have been printed before the first reading. The only objection of money could be where a Bill was read a first time, and not carried any further. We do not want to encourage that. How many cases are there of Bills having Bills read a first time and then being rejected?

Standing Order negatived.

Standing Order 184 agreed to.

Standing Order 185 (Day fixed for second

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This standing order does not provide for the reading of a Bill the second time. It ought to read—"after the first reading the question shall be put." There must be an order of the Senate for the second reading. A Bill cannot be merely set down without an order. How does a Bill become an order of the day under this standing order? Our present standing order provides that the question shall be put, "That this Bill be printed, and the second reading be made an order of the day" for such-and-such a day.

Standing Orders 186 and 187 agreed to.

Standing Order 188 (Amendments to be relevant).

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I should like to have some explanation from Senator Dobson on behalf of the Standing Orders Committee, as to why this standing order has been put in? Is it not a fact that any amendment that is inconsistent with the second reading of a Bill defeats the Bill?

Senator DRAKE.—I do not see why Senator Symon should insist that on every occasion we should follow the South Australian orders, never deviating from them by a hair's breadth. This standing order is taken from the standing orders of the Victorian Legislative Assembly. I also find that the standing orders of the Queensland Legislative Assembly provide—

No other amendment may be moved to such question unless the same be strictly relevant to the Bill.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 189 to 192 agreed to.

Standing Order 193—

The following order shall be observed in considering a Bill and its title:—

1. Clauses as printed, and proposed new clauses.
2. Postponed clauses (not having been specially postponed to certain clauses).
3. Schedules as printed.
4. Proposed new schedules.
5. Preamble (if any).
6. Title.

And in reconsidering the Bill, which can only be done upon recommitment, the same principles shall be followed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This standing order makes, in a very indirect way, a change which honorable senators ought to be made aware of. At present we have three opportunities of reconsidering the clauses of Bills which have been dealt with in Committee. One is at the close of proceedings in Committee when the motion is made that the report be brought up. Any honorable senator may then move for the reconsideration of any clauses which may have been previously dealt with. That is a most convenient process. It is done before the Bill goes out of Committee, and when everything is fresh in the minds of those who have been dealing with it. It saves the Chairman leaving the Chair. I do not know how far that practice has been followed in connexion with parliamentary institutions elsewhere, but in South Australia it has been pursued ever since parliamentary Government has existed. It has also been adopted in the Senate with great advantage. The second way of getting clauses reconsidered, is when the motion is made for the adoption of the report in the Senate. Then any honorable senator can move for a recommitment. The one process is reconsideration; the other is recommitment strictly so called. The third process is when the motion is made that the Bill be read a third time. Then any honorable senator may move to have any clause recommitted. But if we pass this standing order in its present shape, it provides that a Bill can only be reconsidered upon recommitment, and we shall be abolishing and depriving ourselves of the power we have at present of securing the reconsideration of clauses before a Bill gets out of Committee. I wish to preserve every possible power for dealing with Bills, and I think that this is an ill-considered amendment, in the sense that it has not been sufficiently thought out, and that it curtails the power and rights of senators. I therefore move—

That the words "which can only be done upon recommitment," lines 11 and 12, be omitted.

If that amendment be adopted I shall, a little later on, move to the effect that when the motion is made that the report be brought up, any honorable senator may move for the reconsideration of any clause or clauses.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—No doubt this is altogether a matter of convenience, and the practice of reconsidering a Bill without taking it out of Committee is peculiarly a South Australian practice. When the Senate first met the majority of honorable senators were against this practice. They had never had any experience of it and did not like it. As will be seen from the memorandum accompanying the Standing Orders Committee's report, one of the objects of the Committee was to frame standing orders which they believed would be approved of by the majority of honorable senators. Senator Symon is slightly in error when he says that there will, under the proposed standing order, be only three opportunities of reconsidering clauses, because a Bill may be recommitted over and over again. Therefore, the amendment will not give the Senate any greater opportunity of reconsidering clauses than we shall have under the standing order as proposed. The only difference will be in the mode in which the reconsideration takes place. There is one objection to the South Australian practice of reconsideration without taking a Bill out of Committee, and that is that we cannot get a fair copy of the Bill, and if a Bill is reconsidered in that way two or three times, it sometimes gets into such confusion that it is difficult to follow. Whether it is better to formally report a Bill to the Senate, have a fair copy supplied, and then reconsider it; or whether it is more convenient to reconsider it in Committee, is a question upon which I am not prepared to give a strong opinion either way. I think it does not matter much which course we follow, but there is undoubtedly an advantage in having a fair copy of a Bill when it is being reconsidered.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).

—It is a very great convenience to be able to reconsider a Bill in the same Committee without having it reported, because if that is not done, and the matter is postponed for consideration at a later date, and until a fair copy of the Bill has been printed, the subject-matter and details of the Bill pass out of honorable senator's minds, and it is possible that some honorable senators, who have taken a great deal of interest in the measure, may not be present when it comes on for reconsideration. I am sure it will be admitted that during last session we reconsidered Bills in Committee under the existing South Australian practice with great advantage to us all. I remind honorable senators that if a very great number of amendments have been made in a Bill, and a clean copy of it is desired, there is nothing to prevent us refusing to give leave for reconsideration in such circumstances. I am sure that the practice we have so far tends to expedite business, and is convenient to honorable senators.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr HIGGS (Queensland).—All the clauses which apply to reconsidering the Committee apply, in my opinion, to discussion of new clauses, and I propose to move an amendment dealing with the matter.

CHAIRMAN.—It is too late for an honorable senator to move the amendment.

(by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON)

The word "principle," line 12, be omitted, and to insert in lieu thereof the word

Mr Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Perhaps the word "principle" is the very best word to use, but I do not think the word "order" is as good, because the reconsideration of one clause is proposed, and how can we then say the same "order" is to be adopted.

Mr Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The same

Mr Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think we could not do better than to use the word "order," which the Standing Orders Committee have used previously in this standing order, and to overcome the objection taken by Senator Baker that "followed" might subsequently be taken with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "observed as far as possible."

Mr MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I do not think that the word "order" carries out the idea Senator Symon has in mind. I think the word "practice" would be a proper word to use.

Amendment agreed to.

The word "followed," line 13, be omitted, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "observed as far as possible."

Standing Order 194 (Manner of reading

Mr Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria).—The standing order provides that in the case of the clauses of a Bill it shall be sufficient to read the numbers and the notes only. I move—

The words "unless otherwise ordered" be inserted at the end of the standing order.

An honorable senator may desire to have a clause read, in order that it may be properly understood.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 195 agreed to.

Standing Order 196—

No new clause or amendment shall be at any time proposed which is substantially the same as one already negatived by the Committee, or which is inconsistent with one that has been already agreed to by the Committee, unless a re-committal of the Bill shall have intervened.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—A slight confusion arises under this standing order, because it overlooks the fact that we can have a reconsideration of a Bill without having it reported. I suggest that the standing order might be amended by leaving out all the words after the word "Committee" where it last occurs, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "but on re-committal decisions of the former Committee may be reversed."

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—If we are to adopt the practice just agreed to of reconsidering Bills in the same Committee, we shall have inconsistent conclusions come to in the same Committee. This standing order requires reconsideration, in consequence of the amendment which has been agreed to in Standing Order 193. Personally I think that it might be struck out.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This standing order is not necessary and it might as well be struck out as appear here with a reference to the South Australian Standing Order 291. Really I wish the printer had omitted all these references because they are absolutely misleading. This standing order has no relevance to the South Australian Standing Order 291. I agree with Senator Baker at present that this standing order should be struck out.

Standing Order postponed.

Standing Orders 197 to 200 agreed to.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is at this stage that a consequential amendment should be made introducing a standing order to preserve to us the power we now have of reconsideration before a Bill leaves committee. I shall indicate what I propose and then, perhaps, the Chairman will rule whether I am in order. I move—

That the following be inserted as a new standing order:—"Whenever it is moved that the report be brought up the reconsideration of any clause or clauses may be moved as an amendment."

The CHAIRMAN.—That cannot be considered at this stage, unless the honorable and learned senator introduces it as an amendment to a standing order before the Chair. It might be submitted as an amendment to Standing Order 203.

Standing Orders 201 and 202 agreed to.

Standing Order 203 (Bill ordered to be reported).

Amendment (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) agreed to—

Standing Orders 204 to 217 agreed to.

Standing Order 218—

No amendment shall be proposed to an amendment of the House of Representatives that is not strictly relevant.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This is said, in the marginal note, to be the universal practice, and if that be so, it is a pity to lay the procedure down within the limits of a hard-and-fast standing order. So far, my objection to the standing order is the introduction of the word "strictly" before the word "relevant." An amendment is either relevant or not relevant; there can be no question of degree. As worded, the standing order simply introduces another question which will have to be decided and another element of discussion. I move—

That the word "strictly," line 3, be omitted.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The words "strictly relevant" are to be found in this connexion in the standing orders of every Parliament. They are in the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia, and they have been interpreted over and over again in the House of Commons and in the Legislatures of all the Australian States. It would be inadvisable to alter the wording, especially in this standing order, because this deals with an amendment on an amendment of the House of Representatives. The question of relevancy is always difficult to decide, and each case must be settled on its merits. No hard-and-fast rule can be laid down; a question of strict relevancy is one which must be left to the presiding officer. In the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia, which are much admired and properly so, the words "strictly relevant" are to be found several times.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I should like to see some of these instances pointed out. The fact is that the word "strictly" has been scattered much as is pepper from a pepper-box, and it is absurd to have these strong arguments in favour of the word "strictly" being retained when, in the very next line of the same standing order, we have the word "relevant" standing alone.

Senator DOBSON.—That shows that in the one case the rule is to be more strictly applied.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Has there to be a difference made as to the relevancy?

Senator DOBSON.—A difference in degree.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable senator tell us what that difference is—why in the one case an amendment has to be strictly relevant, and in the other case simply relevant?

Senator DOBSON.—In the case of an amendment on an amendment from another place, the rule must be strictly construed.

Question.—That the word "strictly" proposed to be omitted stand part of the standing order — put. The Committee divided.

poned Standing Order 182 (Debate on the first reading of Bill, which Senate may amend).

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—As I said before, I think this standing order fairly meets the case. To proceed on going into Committee of the whole, and to the substance of the standing order, I have no objection to offer. I think Standing Order 182 should stand as amended. Standing Order 225A.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I thought that this standing order was to be inserted under the head of Bills. It certainly will not be in that place if it is put in here. It deals with the first reading of Bills which the Senate may not amend, and it ought to be under the standing orders which apply to the first reading of Bills or under standing orders which relate to Bills which the Senate may not amend.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The standing order deals with Bills received the first time from the House of Representatives. These Bills are in three classes—those which we may amend, those which we may not amend, and those which either class has to be read a first time. Standing Order 225 sets out the procedure to be adopted; and then we make an exception in regard to a particular set of Bills in which we desire to take to ourselves the right of discussing grievances. I think that the standing order will be in the right place, with this exception, that it ought to begin with these words: "in the case of Bills." I move—

That the words "case of" be inserted after the word "Bills," line 1.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The standing order is inserted in this place, and it will not be inconsistent with Standing Order 226, which reads—

That in any such Bill shall have been passed by the House with or without amendment.

Standing Order 182 deals with Bills which the Senate may not amend, and if it is inserted after No. 225, we shall have to make an alteration in No. 226. I suggest that it should be inserted under the head of proposals on Bills which the Senate may not amend.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is a matter of perfect indifference to me where it is inserted, so long as it is connected with Bills which are brought from the other House. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment with a view to the further postponement of the standing order.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Order further postponed.

Standing Orders 226 to 232 agreed to.

Standing Order 233—

No amendment can be proposed in any words of the Bill, which, having received the concurrence of the House of Representatives, have not been the subject of, or immediately affected by, some previous amendment, unless such proposed amendment be consequent upon an amendment already agreed to, or made by the Senate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I should like Senator Dobson to explain this standing order, which apparently is without any precedent.

Senator DOBSON.—It is the universal practice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If it is the universal practice it should not be embodied in a standing order. There is a great difference between what is called "universal practice" and its formulation into a rigid standing order. This standing order is very difficult of construction. I appeal to any man to say what it means. I cannot make out what it is intended to prevent. It is far better to rely upon what is called "universal practice" than to confine ourselves within the iron-bound limits of a standing order.

Senator DRAKE.—In the Queensland standing orders the general practice is shown in italic letters for the guidance of the members, and the rules defining such practice are interspersed with the standing orders. It allows honorable members to know what is the practice, without having a rigid standing order. That plan has not been adopted in the case of these standing orders. We have no option but either to have no standing order on the subject, and to rely on universal practice, or to make a standing order. It will be an advantage to have the universal practice stated in a standing order, in order that our actions may be uniform.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—It is the universal practice that there must be some finality about Bills. One House passes a Bill, and the other House amends the Bill and passes its third reading, so that it has been passed by both Houses except as to certain matters which are in dispute, and on which further proceedings take place. Amendments on the amendments are made, and so on, until at last a point is reached when there ought to be finality, and that point is met by the standing order. It gives a certain amount of latitude in making amendments on amendments, and in making amendments which are relevant to those of the other House. I admit that when a Bill has passed three or four times between the Houses and amendments have been made, and these are followed by consequential amendments, it is very difficult to arrive at a conclusion as to what is open. But there must come a time when only certain matters are open, and when those matters must be agreed to by both Houses or the Bill must be lost. This standing order, which was drawn by the Clerk, formulates the practice of all the States and the House of Commons.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I regard as of great value the practice which is adopted in Queensland. The volume which Senator Drake has been kind enough to hand to me is practically an annotated volume of standing orders, comprising references to the practice of the House of Commons, and so on. I wish that something of the same kind could be done for the Senate. I am not prepared to say that this standing order does or does not accurately define the universal practice. I do not understand it. I do not know what it is driving at. I have the greatest possible jealousy of having too many standing orders. We have here over 400 standing orders, and it is quite enough to master those which are plain, without having new ones piled one on top of the other, expressive of what is described as the universal practice. I give the utmost credit to the Standing Orders Committee for making an effort to embody in a standing order what is described as the universal practice, but we are all subject to human frailties. I defy any man to embody adequately in six or seven lines the universal practice on a debatable question, which must be the subject of either a ruling by the Chair or a deliberate conclusion by the Senate on the occasion when it crops up. Why is it necessary that we should have another standing order upon this subject? We have just had a division on Standing Order 218, which defines the kind of amendments which can be made upon amendments of the House of Representatives. Is not that enough? We cannot propose an amendment on an amendment of the House of Representatives that is not relevant, nor can an amendment be moved to a Bill unless that amendment be relevant to or consequent upon the acceptance or rejection of an amendment of the House of Representatives. What is this standing order wanted for? It is a repetition in obscure and metaphysical language of another standing order. I ask that the Senate should not be hampered by an attempt—a laudable attempt—to embody something which is described as universal practice in a rigid, cast-iron standing order. Let us have some degree of latitude. If we are to be bound hand and foot in the discussion of matters, we may as well give up a portion of our freedom. I appeal to Senator Zeal, as one who has had considerable experience, as to the difficulty of interpreting unnecessary standing orders. Why should we pile 233 upon 218, which is clear and expressive, for no earthly object except to attempt to reduce to a standing order what is universal practice? If it is universal practice we can deal with cases as they come up; but in reducing it to language we may be doing more than universal practice warrants.

Senator DOBSON.—It only gathers up a principle.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is, as Senator Dobson knows, great difficulty in using precise language. The principle is a good one; the effort may be a good one. But it is a dangerous thing to adopt a standing order if you have a universal practice, because in framing your standing order you may, through the infirmity of human language, express something different from the universal practice. The whole object is to have all the freedom we can have in debate in the Senate, and in proposing amendments. We have already passed 218, which limits the kind of amendments which may be moved on amendments coming from another Chamber. The standing order under discussion practically does the same thing, but does it in a much less precise way.

Senator DOBSON.—But in maintaining freedom of discussion we should not violate the principle of this standing order.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have done enough in Standing Order 218, and I shall, for these reasons, vote against this standing order.

The CHAIRMAN.—It is most desirable that our practice in regard to our own Bills, and messages thereon, should be the same, as far as possible, as h regard to Bills coming from the place. As to Bills originated in the we have distinctly and definitely in Standing Order 218 what our shall be. It is undesirable that we adopt any different practice as re-bills coming to us from the House of Representatives. The situation may be met considering Standing Order 225, which t—

Bills coming to the Senate from the e from the House of Representatives, proceeded with in all respects as similar presented in pursuance of orders of the

Every these standing orders bind us. All es that we have been considering amendments bind us. There is no whatever that I can see why we not have some kind of standing elating to the final stage of amend- between the two Houses, such as e with regard to the first, second, ird stages. The history of this standing order is this. Some time ago it was decided in South Australia—I think by the House of Assembly—to adopt new standing orders. The Clerks of the two Houses—Mr. Blackmore and the Clerk of the House of Assembly—formulated this standing order, after careful consideration. The Standing Orders Committee do not take credit for it, because it was in the standing orders drafted by Mr. Blackmore.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales). —I have been studying this standing order as a layman, and I can see, after reading it without certain parenthetical sentences, the meaning of it very clearly. I will read it without those sentences, and the Senate will see the force of it—

No amendment can be proposed in any words of the Bill which . . . have not been the subject of . . . some previous amendment, unless such proposed amendment be consequent upon an amendment . . . made by the Senate.

It practically means that no new matter is to be put in a Bill after a certain time. I support the standing order.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). —I think it would be safer to accept this standing order. It is one that would be seldom exercised, but it is just as well to have it. As I understand the position, a Bill comes from another place and is amended here. It is then sent back to the House of Representatives, and the amendments which we have made are either amended or agreed to. So the process goes on till the last stage; and then it is provided that after another place has agreed to words to which we have already agreed, no further amendment on that amendment can be made. A finality standing order like this provides a safeguard against confusion when that last stage arrives. I hope it will be carried.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that more confusion than even the standing order itself contains has been thrown around it in the course of the discussion. Senator Walker solved the difficulty by eliminating about one-third of the standing order. That is one way of solving a question. I admire that method, and wish to carry Senator Walker's process a little further by eliminating the whole of the standing order. The serious contention which has been put forward in favour of it is that the standing order contemplates the last stage of amendments. All I can say is that if so, the last stage will be very much worse than the first. Senator McGregor was rather carried away by the contention that the standing order is intended to meet the last stage, which is, however, absolutely met by Standing Order 218. That standing order also embodies the universal practice, and is fairly intelligible. Our desire is to provide that our powers in relation to amendments coming from the House of Representatives shall be, in some shape or other, properly under our control—that we shall not do more than deal with the amendments, and shall not re-open the whole Bill, which would be a monstrous thing to do. But how is that prevented? It is prevented by Standing Order 218—

No amendment shall be proposed to an amendment of the House of Representatives that is not relevant thereto.

That is a pretty high barrier to erect. It means that we cannot introduce anything which was forgotten when the Bill was in Committee in the Senate. Amendments made must be relevant to amendments of the House of Representatives, and must not seek to embody matters thought of afterwards. But that is not all. The standing order goes on—nor can an amendment be moved to the Bill.

That is, not to an amendment of the House of Representatives, but to the Bill or any part of it.

... unless the same be relevant to or consequent upon either the acceptance or rejection of a House of Representatives' amendment.

It is absolutely final. It exhausts the whole subject.

Senator Higgs.—What about our own amendments?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think the suggestion of the Chairman was an excellent one, emanating from a mind experienced in parliamentary affairs. That suggestion would make it clear that the general practice is applicable not only to Bills coming back to us from the House of Representatives, but to amendments to Bills coming from the House of Representatives and amended by us. If we like to substitute for 233 a repetition of 218 we shall be using less ambiguous language and doing precisely the same thing. The whole essence of it is the concurrence of the House of Representatives in what we have done. We cannot alter that. If the Chairman's suggestion is adopted, the matter will be put beyond doubt. Standing Order 218 is exhaustive and intelligible, and that this standing order is difficult of apprehension is shown by the fact that the powerful mind which Senator Walker possesses, though trained, by the way, on the Judiciary Committee of the Convention, has been unable to comprehend it. We should not hamper ourselves with standing orders which require the elimination of an essential part before they can be understood.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—The difference between Standing Orders 218 and 233 is, that under Standing Order 218 consequential amendments upon amendments made by the House of Representatives may be moved, and under Standing Order 233 consequential amendments may be moved in connexion with Senate amendments. That is what is intended by the standing order, and it is the universal practice. But as there is shown to be so much difference of opinion upon the matter, perhaps the safest plan to adopt will be that suggested by Senator Symon of leaving this standing order out, and then, when difficulties crop up, the President can rule as to what the universal practice is as questions arise.

The CHAIRMAN.—I apprehend that it will be desirable to have as far as we can a universal practice laid down. There are two ways of overcoming the difficulty. The first is that suggested in connexion with the reconsideration of Standing Order 225, and the other the introduction in this standing order after the word "unless" of the words which follow the word "unless" in Standing Order 218—"the same be relevant to or consequent upon, either the acceptance, amendment, or rejection of a House of Representatives amendment."

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—On looking into the matter I find that Standing Order 218 really applies to Bills which originated in the Senate, because it deals with amendments upon amendments made by the House of Representatives in Bills which have originated in the Senate. Standing Order 233 refers to Bills received from the House of Representatives. I am not prepared to say that Standing Order 218 applies to a Bill in all its stages, but at all events Standing Order 233, as Senator Baker has pointed out, is expressly placed under the heading of "Amendments after disagreement." It appears to me, therefore, that it would be wise to leave this standing order in. With reference to the remark that this is the universal practice, it appears to me that it embodies a principle which we should be doing a gross wrong to violate in any way. When we are dealing with amendments made by another place, we are bound to adhere to the constitutional practice whether we provide for it in the standing order or not.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I point out to Senator Dobson that Standing Order 233 does not exclusively relate to Bills received from the House of Representatives. It is under a heading of its own "Amendments after disagreement," but it refers to all Bills. That being so, the honorable and learned senator's argument falls to the ground. Then Standing Order 233 does not refer to the condition of things to which my honorable and learned friend would limit it. It refers to identically the same set of Bills as are referred to by Standing Order 218. In the meantime, I think we should strike this standing order out, and at the conclusion of the consideration of the standing orders we should reconsider either Standing Order 218 or Standing Order 225. If we decide to amend Standing Order 218, we can make it apply to Bills going both ways by an additional word or two.

Senator Dawson.—The cost of leaving this as it is will not be nearly so great as the cost of the argument.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If that is the attitude to be adopted in considering these standing orders, I have no objection, but I remind Senator Dawson that we should not agree to standing orders which will cast any reflection upon the Senate, and I remind him also that we shall have to submit to rulings upon these standing orders.

Senator Dobson.—But this does not conflict with Standing Order 218.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It does absolutely. My honorable and learned friend admits that it applies to the same Bills as Standing Order 218, and it introduces a lot of words which will receive an additional interpretation every time a Bill comes up to us from the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I desire to point out that the words of this standing order are, with the exception of the use of the word "Senate" for the word "House," identical with the words of the House of Representatives' Standing Order 249.

There is a marginal note to Standing Order 249 of the House of Representatives giving a reference to Standing Order 207. That is a reference to a standing order of some other House. So that we have in support of this standing order not only the recommendation of our own Standing Orders Committee, but that of the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives, and a reference to a standing order of some other House. In these circumstances I think we ought to pass this standing order. It is all very well to speak of the universal practice, and to say that we shall get a ruling upon the universal practice, but how is the President to rule upon the universal practice? We have no standing order to say that he shall do anything of the sort, or to give him power to do it, and it is a moot question whether or not we should adopt the usual course of providing that where we have not otherwise provided by our standing orders the practice laid down by the House of Commons is to prevail. Even if we agree to such a provision, we shall still have uncertainty instead of certainty, and I ask honorable senators to pay some attention to the recommendation of their own Standing Orders Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Undoubtedly there has been temporarily adopted by the House of Representatives a corresponding standing order. But we have no assurance that this standing order will be finally accepted by the House of Representatives, and there is no authoritative standing order to this effect at present existing in any legislative assembly in the world. We are now engaged upon the task of adopting permanent standing orders for our guidance, and our object ought to be to endeavour, as far as possible, to have only such standing orders as can be thoroughly understood. When we come to deal with a standing order of this description it is not enough to say that it is at present in existence in a draft which has yet to come up for consideration in another place. We have to settle for ourselves whether this is a standing order which we ought to adopt. I agree that if we have no standing order applicable to a particular state of things, it is infinitely better that the Senate should have the practice of the House of Commons to go to, and to have a ruling sought, as a ruling must be sought upon all these questions, upon which each member of the Senate will be able to formulate his views of the universal practice relevant to the particular question that crops up. What I object to is the attempt to embody unnecessarily what may be described as the universal practice in a hard-and-fast standing order, when that universal practice is covered so far as it can be by the earlier Standing Order 218. Here we are at the beginning of the Federal Parliament endeavouring to lay down a hard-and-fast rule defining universal practice. It is from this point of view that, in the interests of the Senate, I think we should refuse to be bound by more fetters than are absolutely essential. For us to off-hand formulate in these standing orders a sort of political axiom of political practice is a task we ought not to undertake except under the most serious pressure. It is a task which we still less ought to attempt if there is already a standing order which, with the amendment as suggested by the Chairman, would exactly meet the case.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The difficulty was met last session in another way, when, although we knew that consequential amendments must be made, a Bill was passed, and the amendments left to be inserted on the suggestion of the Governor-General after the final stages had been passed in both Houses. It seems to me that that is the practice that should be followed.

Senator DRAKE.—Is it not better to have the practice embodied in a standing order than to have long discussions and repeated references to May?

Senator PEARCE.—The practice of allowing the Governor-General to suggest consequential amendments is embodied in the standing order. It has been pointed out that, if the standing order be passed as proposed, there might be a tendency to abuse it. It would rest with the President to practically determine whether an amendment was consequential, and should he determine that it was, the other House might take the view that, so far from being consequential, it embodied a principle.

Senator DRAKE.—The President would still have to determine the point if we were relying on the unwritten practice.

Senator PEARCE.—At any rate I think the standing order might have a tendency to create friction.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The object is not to create friction, but to definitely lay down rules which will so guide the two Houses that neither may have cause for offence. If the question be left open or vague, friction may arise, and it must be remembered that every standing order binds or "fetters" us in some degree. The object of standing orders is to facilitate business, and save time by preventing discussions at every stage as to what the procedure shall be, and the bonds are not very heavy, seeing that the standing order may, at any time, be suspended.

Standing Order postponed.

Standing Order 234 agreed to.

Standing Order 235—

If in any session the proceedings on any Bill shall have been interrupted by the prorogation of Parliament, the Senate may in the next succeeding session, by resolution, order such proceedings to be resumed; provided a periodical election for the Senate has not taken place between such two sessions.

Senator DRAKE.—The other day we were discussing the interesting question whether this is one continuous Parliament, or whether there is a new Parliament after each periodical or general election. Supposing it should be held that the Parliaments are separate, is it intended to take power to resume the consideration of Bills which have lapsed from a session of the preceding Parliament?

The CHAIRMAN.—I think that after the word "periodical" there should be inserted "or general."

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—This standing order was made in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That after the word "periodical," line 5, the words "or general" be inserted.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—So far as I understand the standing order, it is only effective from session to session. At the end of the present session there will be a general election—that is, a periodical election for the Senate, which is a continuous body, and a general election for the House of Representatives, though the latter election is also periodical in a sense. If what Senator Drake has in his mind is a penal dissolution, I think that is covered by the word "general." I understand that when the new Parliament meets next year—that is, new in one sense, though not new as to the Senate in another sense—a Bill partly completed this year could not then be taken up at the stage it had reached. A Bill partly completed last session, however, could under such a standing order have been taken up this session.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 236—

Any such Bill may be sent to the House of Representatives as if it had been introduced and passed by the Senate in the second session.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I think a verbal alteration is necessary in order to make this standing order clear. The words "second session" ought to be omitted, and "next succeeding session" substituted, thus following the wording of a previous standing order.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—If the words suggested were substituted they might be interpreted to mean the session after the session in which the Bill was being dealt with. I move—

That the word "second," line 3, be omitted, with a view to add after the word "session" the words "in which such proceedings have been resumed."

Senator PLAYFORD.—Is there any necessity for the standing order?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think there is, and the simplest way would be to strike the standing order out.

Amendment agreed to.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think the standing order ought to be struck out as unnecessary. The House of Representatives have nothing to do with us in this matter, and the preceding standing order enables us to do all that we want to do. Why pass a standing order which assumes that we are committing some gross irregularity?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I do not think it matters much whether or not this standing order is retained.

The CHAIRMAN.—I have discussed this matter with the Clerk, and it is only right to say that in his opinion it is desirable that the Senate should have a general authority in their standing orders to transmit a Bill.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 237 agreed to.

Standing Order 238—

Whenever the Governor-General shall return any Bill presented to him, and transmit therewith any amendment which he may recommend, such amendment shall be considered and dealt with in the same manner as amendments proposed by the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—As the standing order reads, it will be competent for the Governor-General to transmit with a Bill an amendment of any description which he may recommend. I decline to be a party to allowing a Government under cover of the Governor-General to have an amendment of principle or substance made in a Bill after it has been passed by both Houses. Therefore, I move—

That after the word "amendment," line 3, the words "not affecting the principle or substance of the Bill" be inserted.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—If a principle of a Bill were interfered with by an amendment, and the Senate disagreed with the recommendation, it would be rejected at once. There is no necessity to introduce any words into the standing order, because the right of decision will always rest with the Senate. If we tie our hands we shall have long and tedious debates on the question whether an amendment does or does not interfere with the principle or substance of a Bill. The more we leave our hands free, the better it will be for ourselves. We can deal with each case on its merits.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I hope, with Senator Playford, that if the Governor-General recommended any amendment that infringed the constitutional principle which he laid down, the Senate would instantly reject it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But if it were approved of by the Senate, it might not be rejected.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I object to any amendment coming down from the Governor-General which infringes that constitutional principle. Otherwise a strong Government, with a strong backing, might force through the Houses an amendment which altered the principle or substance of a Bill, and which ought to be the subject of fresh legislation. The standing order is intended to cover formal amendments, and not amendments affecting the principle or substance of a Bill. If that view is expressed in the standing order it will avoid the necessity for the heated discussions which Senator Playford deprecated, and possibly greater care will be exercised in sending down amendments.

Senator DOBSON.—Have we the power to limit the scope of the Governor-General's amendments?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In this standing order we are erecting a sign-post so that the Governor-General may know that the amendments which he is to recommend are to be formal or verbal. I admit that this view has not been embodied in a standing order in South Australia, but I think we have now reached a stage when the constitutional practice ought to be embodied in a standing order.

The CHAIRMAN.—The Constitution of nearly every State contains a provision to enable the Governor to recommend amendments in a Bill; but most jealously every Parliament has dealt with only amendments of a formal or verbal character. In this connexion perhaps I may be permitted to read section 58 of our Constitution—

When a proposed law, passed by both Houses of the Parliament, is presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, he shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to this Constitution, that he assents in the Queen's name, or that he withholds assent, or that he reserves the law for the Queen's pleasure.

The Governor-General may return to the House in which it originated any proposed law so presented to him, and may transmit therewith any amendments which he may recommend, and the Houses may deal with the recommendations.

I do not think that any Government would fare well which attempted in this way to introduce any amendments which affected the principle or substance of a Bill. I hardly think it is necessary to limit our powers in this respect.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I think we should erect this sign-post, but I exceedingly regret that Senator Symon did not undertake the work in the Convention.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that the section in the Constitution could not have been better expressed than it is.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Under the Constitution the Governor-General has a perfect right to send down any amendment, affecting a principle or otherwise.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What does section 58 of the Constitution say? It says that the Houses "may" deal with the recommendations of the Governor-General. My honorable friend said that if a recommendation were in violation of the well-understood practice, it would be rejected at once.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We shall be over-riding the Constitution if we embody that view in a standing order.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Not at all. What we say is that if the Governor-General should send down substantial amendments we shall not consider them. I am seeking to preserve the privileges of the Senate and to give notice by our standing orders that certain recommendations are not to come down because they will be rejected.

Senator MCGREGOR.—This limitation should have been stated in the Constitution.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think so, because the Senate has full power to regulate its own procedure. All I ask the Committee to say in this standing order is that the Governor-General may not remit any amendment which affects the principle or substance of a Bill. I desire the recommendations of His Excellency to apply to only formal amendments as was understood by the Convention, and not to amendments which might be the means of overruling a minority in either one House or the other.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—It will be the height of discourtesy on our part, and, I think, contrary to the Constitution, if we frame a standing order to the effect that if the Governor-General sends down any amendments affecting the principle or substance of a Bill the Senate will not consider them. Any amendment which involved a principle of the Bill could not be put by the President to the Senate if we had such a standing order. The Constitution Act says that the Senate shall consider any amendments which are transmitted by His Excellency. An occasion may arise when it may be eminently desirable that a very important alteration should be made. As a general rule, the amendments recommended by a Governor are accepted without discussion, because they are merely of a verbal nature. But it may happen that by some means or other a very important provision has, by the omission of a few words, been left out. Our clerks are especially careful, but a printer's error may be made. To tie our hands, and say that because we have made some mistake which affects the principle of a measure, we shall not be allowed to consider an amendment in order to put ourselves right, seems to me to be absurd.

We should treat every amendment suggested by the Governor-General on its merits, whether it refers to a matter of principle or of detail. The Constitution is clear on the point. I ask Senator Symon not to press his amendment.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—When my honorable friend, Senator Playford, gives me advice with so much solemnity my immediate impulse is to accept it. I totally dissent to his argument and his view of the Constitution. I would point out to him that his argument is self-destructive. I will put a point which he can weigh between now and when we shall have this matter again under consideration—because I intend to have it dealt with again, for the reason that it involves an important constitutional question. Senator Playford says that we should not tie our hands so as to prevent ourselves from dealing with any amendment recommended by the Governor-General on its merits. I decline to deal on its merits with any such amendment affecting the principle of any Bill passed by the Senate. This provision is simply for the purpose of enabling clerical and formal amendments to be made, such as Senator Playford himself has illustrated. They may be errors of a typographical nature, or errors made by the Clerk at the table, or possibly there may be an omission in a clause dealing with the principle of a Bill, which may be amended by message from the Governor-General. It is not within the functions of the Governor-General to recommend an amendment which touches the principle of a Bill, and we should refuse to entertain any such amendment.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We often make amendments in Committee which conflict with other parts of a Bill, and the conflict is not noticed at the time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Those are formal, consequential, or verbal amendments, and would not change the mind of the Senate one iota. But the more wrong my honorable friend is in his arguments, and the more unacceptable his views may be, the more ready I am to follow his advice when he proffers it with so much earnestness. In this case I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Order agreed to.

Standing Orders 239 to 241 agreed to.

Senator DRAKE.—We now come to those standing orders which regulate our practice in a way which will affect the House of Representatives, and I understand that there is a desire not to proceed with the discussion of them just now. If that be so, I am quite willing that they shall be postponed. It is very desirable that they should receive the fullest possible consideration. I have already expressed my opinion with regard to them, and need not repeat it now. I move—

That Standing Orders 242 to 250 be postponed.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I suggest that the numbering of these standing orders be entirely altered. Their wording is not so bad, but they are a complete jumble in their present order. For instance, 242 refers a Bill to the Committee. Then 245 should be 243; 244 should follow, and next should come 243. No. 243 deals with the position after a Bill has been returned from the House of Representatives. Standing Order 248 should be numbered 246, because it deals with the proceedings in Committee; 249 should be numbered 247; 246 should be numbered 248, and 247 should be numbered 249. By altering the numbers in that way we shall have some sequence, and the standing orders will follow in their natural order. In the present jumble there is not the slightest sign of order.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The standing orders as here printed follow the same system as is followed in the ordinary standing orders. Instead of being a complete jumble, Senator Pearce will, on further examination, see that the first part deals with proceedings in the Senate. Then follow the standing orders affecting the powers of the Committee and defining them; then those relating to proceedings in Committee are set out. There is no jumble at all. They follow in logical order. The mode in which they are arranged is first of all that they set out what the practice in the House shall be; then they set out what are the powers of the Committee, then the practice of the Committee. If Senator Pearce will look at the standing orders we have just gone through, he will see that we have adopted the same sequence as to ordinary Bills. First of all, we have set out as to ordinary Bills what may be done in the way of practice in the Senate itself; then the powers of the Committee; then the practice of the Committee. The sequence is perfectly logical, and consistent with our ordinary standing orders. I am aware that another arrangement is possible. If Senator Pearce looks at the first report of the Committee, he will see that another sequence was there adopted. But, on consideration, it was thought that the present arrangement was better. I think that it is more logical, at all events.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—My own idea was that the arrangement of these standing orders was a little bit confusing. But, after hearing Senator Baker, I think that perhaps there is a good deal to be advanced on the other side. What I rose particularly to say was that I am not going to be a party, unless compelled by action on the part of the House of Representatives, to the passing of standing orders affecting the two Houses without having exhausted every power we have to come to an amicable arrangement avoiding trouble in the future. I know what it will very likely mean if we pass these standing orders as we have them drafted. We shall have a conflict with the other House, and that pretty quickly. It is better for us not to have such a conflict if we can possibly avoid it. We have no printed precedents to guide us. In South Australia the two Houses have been working from day to day, and the practice has not been reduced to writing. They have a compact which can be broken by either House at any time, and which is no part of the Constitution. They have no standing orders dealing with the matter. Their position is different from ours. We ought to exhaust every means within our power to arrive at an agreement between the two Houses as to our standing orders upon this exceedingly important point. If we do not, the chances are that we shall be led into a dead-lock, which will be greatly to our injury, and much to be deplored. Therefore, I am not prepared under present circumstances to consider this part of the subject until, at all events, I can be sure that every effort has been made to arrive at a practical arrangement, or unless the other House shows a determination to adopt a course which I, as a senator, could not consistently agree to follow. I think that these particular standing orders ought to be postponed indefinitely. We can pass the others, and come back to this question again.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I am quite as anxious as Senator Playford is, and as every honorable senator must be, that there shall be an amicable arrangement between the two Houses. But it seems to me to be absolutely impossible that we can have any joint standing orders on this question. What are our standing orders for? To regulate our own practice. Our own practice is to make requests to the House of Representatives. Their practice is to grant or refuse those requests. So that our standing orders must be absolutely different. Let honorable senators look down these draft standing orders, and see if it is possible for the House of Representatives to adopt any one of them. It cannot be done. They only regulate our own procedure. Then look at the draft standing orders of the House of Representatives, which their own Standing Orders Committee have presented to them for adoption. I refer to their Standing Order 258, which has a number of sub-sections, but there is not one there that we can possibly adopt, because they cover their practice concerning a different state of affairs. We make the requests, and they grant or refuse them. How can we have joint standing orders to regulate such matters?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We could have an understanding.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I do not know how we can arrive at that except through the Senate. A joint Standing Orders Committee certainly would have no power to come to such an understanding. In the earlier part of last session, the Standing Orders Committees of the two Houses, I shall not say conferred together, but exchanged their drafts. I gave Mr. Speaker the draft of the standing orders the Senate's Committee then proposed in reference to Bills which the Senate may not amend, but I said to him—"You cannot possibly adopt any of those; they are not suited to your position." We obtained from them the draft standing orders they proposed, but we could not adopt any of them. The only point upon which we can come to any understanding—and it must be done by the two Houses—is as to how many requests we may send to another place before a difference of opinion is finally settled. The standing order dealing with that matter is the only one which is at all open for discussion between the two Houses. All the others refer to our own practice in the Senate and in Committee. I cannot myself see how it is possible, except by resolution of the Senate communicated by message to the House of Representatives, or vice versa, that we can arrive at any arrangement in this matter. I do not know whether it is probable that we should arrive at any arrangement, nor do I know whether it is more probable that we should then arrive at an arrangement upon the abstract principle involved, than when the question arises in respect of a particular Bill as it did last session. In any case it is not a matter for settlement by the Standing Orders Committee, but by the Senate itself.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—Perhaps I used an inaccurate phrase in referring to “joint” standing orders; but Senator Baker has hit the point to which I intended to refer. My object is that we should come to some agreement upon the particular matter involved in the proposal to send three messages. That is the matter upon which trouble may arise between the two Houses, and we should, I think, arrive at a decision in regard to it. We should, I think, embody the arrangement come to with the House of Representatives on that point in our standing orders, and they should embody it in their standing order. We may arrive at a decision to send so many messages down. After they have considered our suggestions we may then reconsider the message they send back, and we may send suggestions back to them again a second and a third time. We should have some mutual understanding as to what the practice upon that point is to be. The practice which the House of Representatives will desire to follow will unmistakably be that followed in South Australia, where only one message is ever sent from one House to the other upon such questions. No doubt the House of Representatives will fight for the adoption of that practice as hard as they can, and we naturally will fight for the adoption of a practice which will give us what will practically amount to the power to make amendments. There will be differences of opinion between the two Houses upon this point, and we ought to agree to some compromise in connexion with it. I think that before any Money Bill is sent up to us upon which we may make suggestions that point should be settled between the two Houses. The House of Representatives gave way on the Tariff Bill last year, but they did so under protest, and we, therefore, do not know how they will treat similar messages from the Senate on the next occasion. We may find that they will be the cause of trouble between the two Houses. I desire that we should avoid that if we can. We know what the results of a dead-lock between the two Houses may be. We had an experience of them in South Australia which was certainly a sad one. A dead-lock in that State caused an immense amount of trouble, and was settled eventually only by a compromise between the two Houses. Here, in Victoria, the State was placed in a worse position as the result of the dead-lock occurring between the two Houses of Parliament in connexion with the Darling grant. They had then the “Berry Blight,” “the Stone Wall,” “the Iron Hand,” and I do not know what not.

Senator DOBSON.—Our Constitution provides for a dead-lock, and the way out of it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The trouble and loss resulting from the dead-lock in Victoria were very great, and we can imagine what trouble would result from a dead-lock between the two Houses of the Federal Parliament. Its evil effects would extend over the whole Commonwealth, and would not be confined to one State. If we once begin to discuss a Money Bill and carry what we consider to be important suggestions, and send them on to the House of Representatives, and if that House refuses to give them any consideration at all a dead-lock will ensue, and the chances of arriving at a compromise when our passions are heated and excited, will be very much less than if we were now quietly to sit around a table and discuss the matter calmly and amicably in order that we might arrive at a conclusion upon this very important point. I think that we should try to come to some understanding with the House of Representatives upon this proposal for three messages, with a conference at the close, before we deal with the other standing orders referring to these matters, and affecting only the conduct of affairs in the Senate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—There can be no doubt that the point involved in this particular standing order is one of vital consequence to the smooth and effective working of our system of parliamentary government. At the same time, I do not think that Senator

Playford's picture of the evils of the dead-lock which occurred in Victoria in connexion with the Darling grant, or those of less momentous political importance, which occurred in South Australia when a difficulty of the kind arose there, at all resembles what would happen if a dead-lock arose under our Constitution. A dead-lock under our Commonwealth Constitution would be, I think I may say, quite a different sort of event or occurrence from those to which Senator Playford has referred. It might be none the less disastrous—perhaps I ought not to say disastrous—and it may be none the less a result to be avoided by every possible means. But under our Constitution, as Senator Playford will remember, we have provided for the very contingency of a difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives in relation to vital matters of this kind. We have machinery of great power to meet the case of a disagreement continuing for a certain period and under certain conditions between the two Houses. That machinery, although large and in some senses severe in its working—

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is very drastic.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It may be drastic, but my honorable friend knows that for a great purpose such as is to be served in solving a dead-lock of that kind the machinery must be considerable, and it must operate over the whole Commonwealth of Australia. That is to say that it simply means that after we have exhausted our efforts to agree, and have failed in agreeing—and, of course, there will be no disagreement unless upon a point which is vital and fundamental—the whole matter is then to be remitted, by means of a penal dissolution, not of one, but of both Houses of the Federal Parliament, to the arbitration of the people of the Commonwealth.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is not Senator Playford's point, how far we can go before exhausting our efforts to agree.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend, Senator O'Keefe, is mistaken. I am not dealing with that now. I desire to point out, in dealing with the picture which Senator Playford has presented of what has been called a dead-lock in the States, that if we assert our constitutional position as a Senate, although the assertion of that position may result in what is termed a dead-lock, under our Constitution that dead-lock is absolutely and constitutionally provided for, and its solution is equally provided for by provisions which form a part of the system of our constitutional machinery. Whilst I agree very largely with what has been said in relation to these proposed standing orders, I do not wish it to be supposed, for a moment, that I shall be averse to giving full effect to the constitutional powers of the Senate, and to bringing these constitutional powers, if they come into conflict with the powers of the other branch of the Federal Legislature, to the arbitrament prescribed by the Constitution, the votes of the electors of the Commonwealth.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Neither shall I.

Senator DRAKE.—At the right time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am afraid Senator Drake misapprehends the point raised by Senator Playford. I have been dealing with a larger matter than that with which Senator Playford has dealt in order to appeal to our sympathy—the matter, if I may use the expression, of peace and order in parliamentary government, in relation to the assertion of our rights under the Constitution. I am not influenced by what Senator Playford has said, but I am influenced by the belief that everything ought to be done now to prevent a conflict, and everything ought to be done when a conflict does arrive, to avoid it if possible, and to minimize its effects if it is unavoidable. These standing orders are really divisible into two parts, and it is there that any difference lies between what has been said by Senators Playford and Baker. We have in these proposed standing orders some which are entirely our own affair. As Senator Baker has said, our object is to regulate our own procedure. There are some of these standing orders which affect ourselves, and ourselves only, but even those should not, I think, be couched in language which, when read by members of the other branch of the Legislature may irritate them a little. I dare say that members of the House of Representatives give some attention to our proceedings and to our language, and I think that if we can conserve and assert our rights by the use of diplomatic and careful language, which will not wound the susceptibilities of members in another place, we should do so. From that point of view I think that the particular set of standing orders which are our own, which we have a right to frame and alter as we please, might very well bear revision. But, as I have said, there are two sets of standing orders here—those which deal exclusively with our own affairs, and those, or one, at any rate, which directly challenges the other branch of the Legislature, and which would precipitate a conflict with the other Chamber at an early stage. That honorable senators may give the matter consideration before these proposed standing orders are again considered, I would point out that there is a very grave hiatus. In the first place, Standing Order 242 is unnecessary. Bills which the Senate cannot amend are precisely in the same position, until after the second reading, as any other Bills which come from the House of Representatives. Then we are taken right to the stage at which messages come from the House of Representatives dealing with our requests. What I suggest for consideration is that between the two events there is a considerable interval. A good deal has to be done, and I think we should prescribe, to begin with, at what stage the requests we make are to go to the House of Representatives.

Senator DRAKE.—The Constitution says “at any stage.”

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, but we are prescribing our procedure, and it cannot mean on the second reading.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We might go half through the committee stage and then send on a request, as has been done in the Legislative Council of South Australia.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I was not aware of that. “At any stage” means at any stage of the Bill, and last session discussion was provoked as to whether one set of requests exhausted the powers of the Constitution. That was the rock on which there was a possibility of splitting, but more amicable considerations came into play, and brought about a result, so far as procedure went, that at all events answered our purpose. But that has nothing to do with the point with which I am now dealing. In relation to procedure, we ought to have a standing order providing when our requests should go back—whether on the first clause of a Bill, or in the middle, or at the end. It would be rather absurd, I presume, to send messages at any particular stage in Committee, and, therefore, we want a standing order; and I am throwing out this suggestion in no critical mood.

We want the standing orders to be exhaustive, and I shall endeavour to frame amendments which will assist the Committee. My suggestion now is that we ought to have clearly prescribed what is to take place between the second reading and the time when the messages come back from the other branch of the Legislature, accepting, rejecting, modifying, or, to speak generally, dealing with our requests. The standing orders, as now submitted, are very crude to lay before the Senate, the members of which are not in the position of a Standing Orders Committee, and cannot sit round a table and discuss them. These standing orders are of vital consequence, and I know it is very difficult to frame them; but I am allowing for all that in the remarks which I make. Standing Order 244 provides that if a message is returned completely complying with the requests of the Senate, the Bill, as altered, may be read a third time and passed. What is to intervene? The Bill cannot be read in the interval; and the meaning is that the Bill must be read when the intervening process has been gone through. That should be prescribed by the standing orders; and all we have to do is in half-a-dozen lines to lay down the different steps to be taken, and make the matter as clear as midday. There are other standing orders to which similar consideration could be given with advantage, and instead of having, I will not say a jumble, but a crude set of standing orders, dealing with so vital a matter, we should have them in better form. The great difference, however, is in connexion with the second set of standing orders which directly affects the other House. Strong as I am in support of the widest constitutional powers of the Senate in relation to Money Bills, and adhering, as I do, to the position which I took up in the Convention, and out of it, as to the amplification of that power if possible, I shall never assent to such a standing order as that embodied in No. 246 without trying in some way or other to secure—though it may be impossible to secure—the adhesion of the House of Representatives. For instance, if such a standing order were embodied in our code, I think the members of the House of Representatives would be perfectly justified in scouting it and saying—“If you, by your standing order, declare that a Bill must be sent down three times, and returned by the House of Representatives three times, and you can carry such a provision into effect, you are a much finer set of fellows than we took you to be." Such a standing order would be provocative in the highest degree. If the House of Representatives did not return a Bill three times, what then? There are conditions on which we are to do—what? We are to demand, not politely request—though I think a little politeness might be engrafted on our standing orders—a free conference. But what would happen if the House of Representatives did not send back the Bill three times? We, like Mahomet's coffin, would be hung up between heaven and earth, and I do not know where the Bill would be.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Bill would be in the other House.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—To meet such circumstances, we ought to provide that the Bill should then be considered as laid aside in the other House. Let us provide something which will get us out of the impasse into which we shall be put by a standing order that assumes a condition of things to which the House of Representatives may never assent.

Senator DOBSON.—Standing Order 247 enables us to send a Bill back.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We may send a Bill back, but what will happen? I am merely suggesting that the standing orders want the very greatest consideration. I do not like approaching the House of Representatives on this subject, but this is a matter on which both Houses must agree somehow; and if it is to be the occasion of a dead-lock, the sooner we bring it about the better.

Senator DRAKE.—If we are in the right?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Suppose the House of Representatives think they are in the right?

Senator DOBSON.—Will not the High Court have to say what is the meaning of the words "at any stage"?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But Senator Dobson does not want a High Court.

Senator DOBSON.—I do want a High Court.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I thought the honorable senator did not; but at any rate a High Court, while it would solve many difficulties, would not solve this difficulty.

Senator DOBSON.—The High Court would have to solve it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The High Court would not solve the question of the desirability of our endeavouring at this stage, like it or not as we may, to arrive at a modus vivendi with the other House.

Senator HIGGS.—In such a case the High Court is the people.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; and in the other instance it is a High Court constituted by the people. With Senator Playford, I feel that we ought to attempt to arrive at some agreement with the other House as to the number of times requests may be transmitted. In my opinion the House of Representatives are under the Constitution bound to receive requests, even seventy times seven, in matters of disagreement; but the question is—shall we approach this matter from the point of view of trying to arrive at some definite agreement on the subject? If so, let us try, and if we cannot succeed we shall be just where we were. From all these points of view I think a postponement is exceedingly desirable. Do not let us be overpowered with timidity, because of the pictures of other dead-locks which have no relation to our parliamentary condition. At the same time let us take care that our own standing orders are absolutely complete and clear, so that he who runs may read, as to the different stages the Bill must pass through. As to the standing orders which impinge more or less on the functions of the House of Representatives, or on what the House of Representatives may consider to be their rights, or regard as their constitutional duty, let us do everything we can to come to some arrangement. If we cannot we must make our own standing orders and abide by them, and fight for them until the last jump.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not know that I have anything to add to the remarks that I made in the Senate, except to say that I think that the counsel given by Senator Symon to the Committee is extremely wise. I believe that we shall do well to carefully consider the proposal which he has made. There is no particular reason for hurrying on the consideration of this part of the standing orders. I am still of the opinion that there is no necessity for passing these particular standing orders. Seeing that we dealt with some difficulties of this character last session, and in a manner which enabled us to get the legislation put through, it might be well for us to wait until another occasion arose, and then to deal with it according to the circumstances.

Senator PEARCE.—When we are involved in a quarrel.

Senator DRAKE.—That is the way in which standing orders have been evolved. A certain practice has gradually grown up in a deliberative Assembly, and, after a time, the record of the debates has been looked up, and the procedure crystallized into standing orders. Is not that the best way in which to proceed in a matter of this kind?

Senator DAWSON.—But the Senate stands in a different relation from an ordinary Upper House to the other House.

Senator DRAKE.—I admit that; but the same necessity arises for standing orders, and these are evolved in the same way. There is, of course, a novelty, because the relation between the Houses does not correspond with the relations that exist between the Houses of any other Parliament of which we have any knowledge. But still, I think the same argument is good—that seeing that we cannot be perfectly sure of a correct interpretation of the Constitution, we should proceed slowly, and not, before the necessity arises, put into print standing orders which would force us afterwards into an attitude which we might not be disposed to take up.

Senator DAWSON.—A joint committee might arrive at some conclusion.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not know whether a joint committee could do it, but, certainly, it would pave the way to a better understanding if the Standing Orders Committees were to meet and confer, and, by discussion, we could no doubt arrive, to a certain extent, at an agreement as to what the practice should be. In any case, I think that most honorable senators will agree that there is room for improvement in all the standing orders which we have been discussing. Seeing that we have postponed some standing orders, including the first chapter, which probably will require the attention of the Standing Orders Committee, I propose to go on to-night with the consideration of the remaining standing orders, and then to adjourn the further consideration of the code, including all the postponed standing orders, for, say, a fortnight. That will give an opportunity to the Standing Orders Committee to meet and to carefully deliberate, and to bring up the postponed standing orders with such amendments as may appear advisable to them in the light of this discussion. Judging from the tone of the debate, and the excellent speeches from Senators Playford and Symon, I believe it will see the advisability of bringing up the postponed standing orders in such a form that they can be adopted without any long discussion.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I also think that we can get along very well without this chapter. If we agree to these standing orders, we may commit ourselves to a course of which we cannot approve later on. We may be going in one direction; the House of Representatives may be going in another direction; and thus we may be getting further asunder than if we had no standing orders on the subject. It is far better not to have any standing orders than to force ourselves to go in a direction which may be contrary to common sense at a particular time. I hope that the consideration of this chapter will be postponed; in fact, I hope that it will not be brought forward again. Even if the Standing Orders Committees did meet, they would not be likely to agree on this subject.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I think it will be a wise thing to postpone the consideration of this chapter, on the understanding that the Standing Orders Committee shall approach the corresponding committee of the other House and ascertain what it is prepared to do. I have my own opinion about what it will do, and about what the members of the other House will do, and it is derived from the proceedings on the Tariff Bill. A number of honorable members in another place think that we have the right to send down a Money Bill only once. I take the view that under the Constitution Act we can send down a Money Bill 100 times if necessary. If there is an idea abroad that the Senate could send down a Money Bill an unlimited number of times, it will not lead to the rapid transaction of business. There should be an understanding on the part of the two Houses as to when finality is likely to occur. If it is known that a Bill will pass between the Houses only three times, honorable members will make up their minds on any question before the last opportunity of arriving at an agreement is availed of. We have advanced a stage, and when the Standing Orders Committee report the result of their efforts, we can decide whether it will be wise to have any standing orders on the subject, or to rely upon the provisions in the Constitution Act.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—This discussion divides itself into two parts. First of all, as to the relationship between the two Houses, I quite agree that we should exhaust every effort to come to an amicable arrangement. I am not at all sanguine about an arrangement being arrived at; but still, if we can do so, well and good, and perhaps it is a waste of time to discuss that question now. There is another aspect to be considered, and that is the standing orders which absolutely relate to our own procedure, and which will come on for discussion again. I wish to answer some of the rather hypercritical suggestions made by Senator Symon. He has said that we ought, in the language of these standing orders, to be as conciliatory as possible. I agree with that. He objects to the words "demand a conference" as being language which ought not to be adopted. But I would point out to him that it is the language which has always been adopted in reference to conferences. At page 412, May says—

Either House may demand a conference.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not the language of a standing order.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—The objection of the honorable and learned senator was to the use of the word "demand."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In a standing order.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—So far as my experience goes, that word has always been used in asking for a conference. May says—

Either House may demand a conference upon matters which, by the usage of Parliament, are allowed to be proper occasions for such a proceeding.

May goes on to say—"in demanding a conference," and so on. It is a matter of no very great importance whether we use the word "demand" or the word "request," but the former word was used because its use was sanctioned by the practice of the British Parliament and the State Parliaments. Again, Senator Symon objects to this standing order—

If a message is returned from the House of Representatives completely complying with the request of the Senate as originally made or modified, the Bill, as altered, may be read a third time and passed.

That was our practice last session. I will ask honorable senators to note the fundamental difference between the practice on Bills which we may amend and on those which we may not amend. In regard to an ordinary Bill, we go into committee, make amendments, and then pass the third reading; after which we send a message to the House of Representatives stating that we have agreed to the Bill subject to certain amendments. Those amendments, and those only, are open for discussion. In the case of a Bill which we may not amend we must in the nature of the case adopt a very different procedure, and a different principle is brought into play. In the case of a Bill which we may not amend, we go into committee, but we do not read the Bill a third time, and do not pass it. The Committee reports to the Senate and the Senate sends a message to the House of Representatives requesting that certain amendments be made. Such a Bill has never been passed by us; the third reading has never been agreed to; and the motion that the Bill do now pass has never been put. The Bill is open so far as the Senate is concerned, because we have never gone out of committee. The Bill is still in committee, subject to a message having been sent to the House of Representatives. Therefore the standing order which I have just read is quite right. In the case of a Bill which we may not amend, we have not read it a third time, whereas in the case of an ordinary Bill we do read it a third time before sending it to the House of Representatives. Supposing we receive a message from the House of Representatives virtually complying with our request, there is no necessity to refer the Bill in question back to the Committee, because everything in connexion with it is finished. The Houses are in accord, and all that we have to do is to read the Bill a third time and pass it. So that the difference in procedure and in the principles upon which we base our procedure is great.

Senator CLEMONS.—Do such Bills on leaving Committee go back to the Senate?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—What we did last session, and must do, is this: A Bill is referred to the Committee, and the Committee reports to the Senate. We do not read the Bill a third time, but we send a message to the House of Representatives informing them that we make certain requests. In the case of ordinary Bills we do read them a third time and pass them before sending any message to the House of Representatives. So that the position is entirely different. When the message comes back from the House of Representatives, if it does come back, agreeing to everything we suggest, and making amendments accordingly, we are in this position: There is no necessity to refer the Bill in question back to the Committee, because they cannot amend it. All our requests have been complied with, and all that we have to do is to read the Bill a third time and pass it, if we choose to do so. So that I contend that the words of the particular standing order which I have read are correct. I ask honorable senators to bear in mind the fundamental difference between the two positions. If they do that, I am quite sure that they will see that the procedure suggested, which was the procedure we adopted last session, and which has always been adopted in South Australia, is correct. I am not going to labour the argument, or to say anything more about it, because the subject will come up for consideration again. I make these observations so that when it does come up again, honorable senators may bear in mind the fundamental difference between the position of a Bill which we can amend, and which we read a third time and pass, and concerning which we send a message to the House of Representatives embodying our amendments; and the position of a Bill which we cannot amend, which we do not read a third time, which we do not pass, and on which we wait till the House of Representatives makes the amendments we desire. When the House of Representatives makes those amendments, the whole matter is at an end so far as we and they are concerned. There is no question between the two Houses, and all that we have to do is either to read the Bill a third time and pass it or to reject it. There is no object in referring it back to the Committee of the whole Senate, because that Committee can do nothing. It is, as it were, functus officio. The Senate has adopted the Committee's report, and sent a message to the House of Representatives, which has agreed to make the amendments we require. The Bill comes back containing those amendments in the form in which we want them, and we read it a third time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—My criticism of the standing order referred to by Senator Baker was not limited to the point that when a Bill is returned from the other place with a compliance with our requested amendments, it must then be read a third time without the necessity for its going back to the Committee of the whole. We all know that a Bill which we cannot amend, cannot be read a third time if we request amendments in it until those amendments have been dealt with in another place. What I complain of is that after the time when the Bill is read a second time—as unnecessarily stated in the first of these new standing orders—there is nothing to prescribe what the course of procedure of the Senate or of the Committee of the whole Senate shall be. There is a jump from the second reading of the Bill to the return from the House of Representatives of the message with regard to the requests of the Senate. It is merely with the object of suggesting further consideration in the interval, and so that these rules may be recast, and we may arrive at something definite, that we are discussing them now. The first standing order in question is No. 242—

Bills which the Senate may not amend shall (unless otherwise ordered), after the second reading has been passed, be referred to a Committee of the whole.

We know what is done there. The next standing order is 243—

All messages from the House of Representatives in reference to such Bills which do not completely comply with the request of the Senate . . . shall . . . be referred to the Committee.

There is a great gulf there. One standing order leaves off with the second reading of the Bill, and its reference to the Committee of the whole, and the next standing order starts with the return of our request from the House of Representatives either complied with or not complied with or modified. It is as though a Rip Van Winkle had made these standing orders and had gone to sleep between Nos. 242 and 243. What is the procedure? When a Bill which we cannot amend gets into Committee it will be dealt with in the ordinary way, except that we shall make requests instead of amendments in form. But there is nothing to prescribe that they shall take any particular form, or at what stage of the procedure in Committee we are to make our requests. If it is to be at any stage, let us say so.

It is not provided in these standing orders how the report is to be made. Personally, I think the Bill should go back to the Committee of the whole, because it has never left the Committee as a Bill in the Committee stage. Suppose there is a standing order prescribing that we shall send it to the House of Representatives before the preamble is agreed to?

Senator DRAKE.—We sent the Tariff Bill back from the Committee.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — We adopted procedure for the moment on that occasion. I dare say we can do so again. But here, in this off-hand, loose, undefined way, at the end of Standing Order 244, it is provided that, if a message is returned from the House of Representatives complying with every request made by the Senate, the Bill may be read a third time, and passed forthwith. That is not the way to settle a matter of that kind. Suppose there were half-a-dozen requests made, and the House of Representatives complied with part of them, should not the Bill go back to the Committee for the re-consideration of the remainder? I hold that the Bill is in the Committee stage up to the time of the return of the message from the House of Representatives. It is only a matter of procedure that in order to get the Bill to the House of Representatives with our requests for amendments, it goes back to the Senate, because the Committee is not a proper body, and the Chairman is not the proper functionary to send a message to the other House. The Bill is still in Committee, and that is what Senator Baker has entirely overlooked.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is as plain as possible that if a Bill leaves the Senate with suggestions for amendments, and those amendments are not agreed to, it is in the Committee stage and should go back to the Committee to have the suggestions reconsidered. When a final agreement is arrived at between the two Houses, the Committee reports to the Senate and the Bill is read a third time. There is no hypercriticism, as Senator Baker supposes, in calling attention to a matter which affects the substance of our constitutional position. My criticism regarding the word "demand" is not got rid of by reference to May. I say that Standing Order 246 is one that might be construed as holding a pistol at the head of the House of Representatives. The language used is of a most aggressive character throughout. What is more to the point, having regard to our constitutional position, is the fact that it ties our hands to three messages, and does it aggressively; whereas if we had an opportunity of sending 30 messages, we might avoid all difficulty. It is a fact that we are laying down by that standing order a rule of conduct for the House of Representatives—that they shall receive our messages three times and return them three times. I think that carries out our constitutional position fairly. I refer to this because there are two parties to the bargain, and it is said I am hypercritical. I believe that my honorable friends opposite, and many others, are of that opinion, and if the Tariff Bill had come back again to us, and we had not been inspired by the spirit of compromise, we should have had to incur the odium of laying it aside. I hold the opposite view that we have the right, under such circumstances, to return the Bill to the House of Representatives, and throw upon them the odium of laying it aside. I rather agree with the standing order, but if we lay down this rule it must be remembered that we are laying down a rule which impinges upon what the House of Representatives may claim. Suppose they differ from it, it may turn out to be like a man receiving a letter which he does not like. He sends it back again, and it is again sent to him, and so the game of battledore and shuttlecock goes on until the address upon the letter is worn off. I recognise Senator Playford's view that we should incur the odium, but I say "no," the other House ought to do so. But if we, by a standing order, put our foot down, and say—"This House is going to adopt this course," that will only be another instance in connexion with which we may get ourselves condemned before our time by the House of Representatives. If we are going to assert that right—and I do not deny that we may fairly do so by a standing order—I think it ought to be couched in some kind of language which will be, perhaps, less aggressive than that which is here adopted by which in effect we say—"This is the law we lay down. We are going to act upon it. If you, the members of the House of Representatives, and we, the Senate, disagree, we will send the Bill back to you, and you may do what you like with it." It is fair that we should try to preserve that right to ourselves, but we should do it in as unaggressive a way as we possibly can. So that my criticisms are not hypercritical. They are observations of substance which, I am sorry to say, Senator Baker seems to have entirely misapprehended.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—Senator Symon has entirely overlooked some of these standing orders. The honorable and learned senator says there is an hiatus between what it is proposed we shall do with a Bill after we have referred it to the Committee of the whole and the time when we send a message to the House of Representatives. I absolutely contradict that. If honorable senators will look at these standing orders they will see that first of all the Bill is referred to a Committee of the whole, then the standing orders set out what results can be arrived at by the Committee; they regulate the procedure and powers of the Committee, and they then go on to say that, whenever the Committee reports, a message shall be sent to the House of Representatives. Now, where is the hiatus? There is a complete sequence.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The whole thing is a jumble.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—The whole thing is not a jumble. It is all very well for Senator Symon to make assertions, but assertions are not proof. The whole thing is not a jumble, but it is absolutely in sequence, and is absolutely logical. There is no hiatus at all. The Senate, when it obtains a report from the Committee, if it is adopted, sends a message to the House of Representatives, and the standing orders as drafted go on to say that all messages received from the House of Representatives which do not completely comply with our request—that is to say, whenever there is not complete agreement—shall be referred to the Committee. Where is the hiatus and the want of sequence?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The hiatus is between Standing Orders 242 and 243.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—That is a matter merely of the numbering of the standing orders.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then why not number them correctly?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—They are numbered correctly. The standing orders first of all state what the powers of the Senate shall be. Then they state what the powers of the Committee shall be; and finally what the procedure of the Committee shall be. And if the numbering needs to be altered, surely it is a small matter, and not worth so much discussion and talk. If it is merely a matter of putting Standing Order 243 where Standing Order 242 now is, and so on, it is a matter of very small importance indeed. But if honorable senators will look at these standing orders as a whole they will see that they follow the same principle as our ordinary standing orders in reference to Bills. That principle is, first of all, to state what the Senate shall do, then to state what the powers of the Committee are, and then to show how the Committee shall proceed. If these standing orders had been divided into three parts, and at the head of each there had appeared the words—"Procedure in the Senate," "Power of the Committee," "Procedure in Committee," these remarks, which are really uncalled for, would probably never have been made. I strongly object to criticisms of this sort, which have no substance at all, and which ought not to be made.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is quite refreshing to have the President of the Chamber talking about criticisms having no substance at all, and about the time being wasted when we find the honorable and learned senator occupying ten minutes in a long dissertation exactly in opposition to the view he expressed when Senator Pearce suggested that the clauses should be re-numbered. Senator Baker then assured us that they did not require to be re-numbered at all. The honorable and learned senator was then perfectly clear that the numbers were all right. Now we find that he is quite convinced that they should be re-arranged.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I did not say so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Any honorable senator who looks at them will see that they are absolutely unintelligible, in the sequence in which they stand. The question we have to deal with is, whether these standing orders give adequate provision for the purpose contemplated under the Constitution, and whether they give it with sufficient consideration for the rights of the other branch of the Legislature. However, the proposal made is that these standing orders shall be postponed to give Senator Baker an opportunity of sleeping upon the matter, and of reconsidering, not only their arrangement, but their substance also.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—If Senator Symon thinks that he is to do all the talking, and that I shall remain silent, I can assure him that he is very much mistaken. I again ask honorable senators not to attach any undue importance to these criticisms which are not founded upon substance at all.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why repeat this offensive language?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Why should Senator Symon have repeated himself half-a-dozen times in the course of this debate? I admit that I am repeating myself, but I am only answering repetitions from the other side. I do not think it is at all wise to continue this debate seeing that these standing orders are to be postponed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then do set some kind of an example.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—But I can assure Senator Symon that he is wrong if he thinks he will prevail by the repetition over and over again of sentences which do not carry any weight.

Motion agreed to.

Standing Orders 242 to 250 postponed.

Standing Order 251—

The quorum in Committee of the whole shall consist of the same number of senators (exclusive of the Chairman) as shall be requisite to form a quorum of the Senate.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—I think this standing order requires to be altered by the omission of the words "exclusive of the Chairman."

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I was just going to call attention to that, because under the Constitution the quorum is fixed at twelve, until Parliament otherwise provides.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to.

That the words "exclusive of the Chairman," lines 2 and 3, be omitted.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Order 252—

A Committee of the whole shall be appointed by a resolution "That the Senate shall resolve itself into a Committee of the whole," either immediately or on a future day.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—In this standing order there seems to me to be an hiatus, if I may be forgiven for using that expression. I hope I may be allowed to say that the standing order is incomplete. Standing Order 252,

I think, follows Standing Order 380 of our present standing orders, and adopts the whole of it. Of course, it is awkward to say "either immediately or on a future day." If the Committee is fixed for a future day under an order of the day, the matter is thus provided for in the next Standing Order 253.

Whenever an order of the day is read for the Senate to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, the President leaves the Chair without putting any question * * *

But if it is proposed to go into Committee of the whole immediately, then we ought to provide for that as we do under our existing Standing Order 381, which says—

When such a resolution has been agreed to—
That is a resolution to go into Committee of the whole.

the Speaker shall put the question, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair," which being agreed to, he shall leave the Chair accordingly.

Otherwise there is no order that he shall leave the Chair. I therefore move—

That the following words be added, "and if immediately," then the President shall put the question: "That the President do now leave the Chair," which being agreed to, he shall leave the Chair accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 253 to 266 agreed to with verbal amendments.

Standing Order 267—

If no notice be taken, or it appears upon a division in Committee that a quorum of senators is not present, the Chairman shall leave the Chair of the Committee, and inform the President thereof, but make no further report. No decision of the Committee shall be considered to have been arrived at by such division.

Amendment (by Senator DRAKE) agreed to—

That all the words after "taken," line 1, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words, "of the absence of a quorum in Committee the Chairman shall count the Committee and, if after the bell has been rung for two minutes, a quorum be not formed, or if it appears on a division, by which division no decision shall be considered to be arrived at, that a quorum is not present, he shall leave the Chair of the Committee and the President shall resume the Chair."

Standing Order, as amended, agreed to.

Standing Orders 268 to 272 agreed to.

Standing Order 273—

"Motions.—That the Committee do now divide" shall be moved without discussion, and be immediately put and determined

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—We have heard a great deal about the standing orders of South Australia, and there is no doubt a great deal to admire in those rules and in that State and its people. But a very great flaw can be observed in this standing order.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is one of the wisest of standing orders.

Senator DRAKE.—It has worked very well here.

Senator HIGGS.—The standing order has worked very well here, for the reason that there has been no very contentious legislation before us. The standing orders are framed for the protection of the minority, and it should not be in the power of a simple majority to close a debate.

Senator DRAKE.—On one occasion Senator Higgs closed the Government.

Senator HIGGS.—I do not remember the circumstances; I must have been suffering from a slight aberration at the time. This standing order is prompted by a consideration of the conditions of the British House of Commons, where there are some 678 members, and where there are at times scenes of great disorder; and if we had a similar number of members I could quite understand a provision of this kind being necessary. I can imagine that a lot of trouble might be caused by even a moderate multiplication of the cantankerous element of this Senate; but, in my opinion, such a standing order was never intended for a deliberative body such as this. It should be remembered that this Senate is composed of six representatives from each State, and though, according to the Constitution, the smaller States have an equal voice with the larger States, it is now proposed to curtail the powers of the former. When the Commonwealth grows, and new States are added, a small State might send six senators with a mandate to advocate certain legislation; and under the standing order it would be possible for the representatives of the largely-populated States to combine to crush such legislation. That could easily be done by one of the more powerful senators jumping up as soon as opportunity offered and moving that a division be taken immediately, and no opportunity would be afforded of showing why a division should not be taken at that time. The calm and judicial way in which, generally speaking, we have conducted our deliberations, entitles senators from the smaller States to ask that such a motion should be carried by a reasonable majority. Let us provide for something more than a bare majority. I feel inclined to ask the Committee to provide for a majority of two-thirds of the senators then present. I believe that the standing order found its way into our code because it was feared by certain honorable senators that some senators from Queensland might endeavour to impress their extraordinary views on the Senate at inordinate length. It will be remembered that in the first code of standing orders distributed certain pages were pasted over with more drastic provisions. For what reason? To meet the case of the senators from Queensland who had been given a bad reputation by those of our opponents who witnessed the Commonwealth celebrations and the opening of this Parliament, and who, of course, did not fail to describe us in what they considered to be our true colours. A feeling of consternation was created, and then certain honorable senators said—"We will fix them by the standing orders." I hope the Committee will recognise that a provision of this kind is only intended for use in a large body such as the House of Commons, which, owing to the large number of its members, cannot in ordinary times, when there is no opposition, conduct its business with reasonable speed. In the Senate, as a rule, not more than 24 senators are present. We are being asked to prepare a standing order for a time of trouble which will never arise here. I appeal to Senator Playford, who is liberal minded, and represents a numerically small State, not to pass this standing order without requiring the vote of a reasonable majority. With a view to testing the feeling of the Committee on the point, I move—

That the word "Motions" be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "A motion."

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia).—Senator Higgs must be very hard up for arguments when he appeals to the representatives of the small States. I could understand an appeal being made to the members who represent small States in another place, because while one State is represented by only six members in that House, another State is represented by 23 or 24 members. In the Senate, however, the small State has equal representation with the large State. It is a poor foundation upon which my honorable friend has rested his superstructure. This rule has not been taken as he indicates from the standing orders of the House of Commons. The right to apply the closure is not vested in either a bare majority or a two-thirds majority, but in the Speaker of that House. The rule is taken from the South Australian code. I believe it was not enforced on one occasion last session.

Senator DRAKE.—Once, on the motion of Senator Higgs against the Government.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I never knew this form of the closure to be put in force in South Australia until the temper of the House had been raised to a high pitch by the great waste of time which had gone on. It has only been put in force by the House in self-defence. There must be a rule of that sort in every deliberative Assembly, large or small, unless a minority is to be allowed to "stone-wall" to such an extent as to become a nuisance to every member who attends to his duties properly and fairly. The rule has never been abused in South Australia. I feel sure that it will never work harshly in the Senate, and that it will only be applied when it is richly deserved. It will be sufficient to provide for its application by the vote of an absolute majority.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I support the amendment, because I think that the vote of more than a bare majority should be required when the closure is applied. Last session I suffered from the existence of this rule in our code. I submitted a motion to the effect that the editor of a newspaper in this city should be brought to the bar for printing a scurrilous article on royalty. Not being a person who parades his loyalty very often, I was surprised to find so many honorable senators who had received favours from His Majesty taking up the opposite position and applying the closure. The exercise of this power should not be placed in the hands of a bare majority. In the case of my motion, only two honorable senators had spoken, and the matter had not been nearly sufficiently ventilated. But because it was not a palatable one to a number of honorable senators the gag was applied. Just as it operated against me on that occasion, it may operate against those honorable senators on another occasion, although not with my support. It may happen that only the representatives of one State are interested in the ventilation of a grievance, and, of course, the application of the gag in that case would be a much more grievous affair than it was in the case in which I was interested. I hope it will not be applied here again, except by the vote of a fair majority.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think we cannot do better than pass the standing order as it is framed. Of course, it is the "closure," and that is an expression which, especially when it is converted into the word "gag," immediately suggests some improper attempt to put a stop to free discussion. It has been the most successful, and it is the fairest method of putting an end to a debate which has lasted long enough, or to the discussion of a subject which has been discussed enough, whether by one speech, or by two or three speeches. Its application does not depend on the President, the Chairman of Committees, or the leader of the Government, but on the sense of justice and fair play of the Chamber. During the whole of the time I had personal experience of this rule I never knew it to be abused. In a moment of excitement—perhaps in a fit of indignation—the application of the closure has been moved; but an appeal by two or three members always availed to have the motion withdrawn. It cannot be moved in the middle of a speech. If a member is ready to speak, and that fact is indicated to the mover of the motion, it is always withdrawn. But the great safeguard is the sense of fair play and justice to the House itself.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—In the light of past experience I agree with those who are in favour of the standing order. But still I think that Senator Higgs is quite right in suggesting that the vote of a substantial majority should be required. I have noticed in other Parliaments that when party feeling was running very high, and the majority was very narrow, they were prepared on every occasion to take advantage of the weakness of the minority, and to stifle further arguments. The result was that there was not a fair discussion. In cases of this kind a two-thirds majority is necessary. Probably the same amount of dissatisfaction would not be left on the minds of those who took part in such debates if a two-thirds majority had to operate. Senator Playford has said that he does not mind whether the majority is an absolute or a two-thirds majority. It would be better for us to adopt a two-thirds majority of those present than to provide that an absolute majority of the Senate shall settle the matter.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I never said an absolute majority of the Senate.

Senator MCGREGOR. — Probably the honorable senator meant an absolute majority of those present. To safeguard the honour of the Senate—because there are times of excitement when a very small majority might be tempted to do an injustice to a minority—we ought to adopt the suggestion which I am supporting. If a set of senators were making themselves obnoxious, there would be no trouble in inducing a two-thirds majority to restrain them; but to say that half-a-dozen members shall be silenced by a majority of one against them is absolutely unfair.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland). — I may state at the outset that I intend to support Senator Higgs' amendment. It is all very nice for Senator Symon to use sweet-sounding phrases, as he is in the habit of doing, in advocacy of the line of action that he recommends. He has been in the happy and fortunate position of living all his life in a calm political atmosphere. From my experience of political life, I am not prepared to leave my rights as a member of this Senate to the "keen sense of justice" of any majority of it. Our standing orders are a printed document, which enables honorable senators to know exactly what are their rights and privileges. They stand there in black and white. Any senator has as much right under them as any other, whether sitting behind the Government or in opposition. It ought not to be left in the power of any majority at any time, whether they have a "keen sense of justice" or a desire to do injustice, to rob any senator of his rights and privileges. Surely the Postmaster-General has not yet allowed to die out of his memory what a "keen sense of justice" means in a heated political atmosphere. If this standing order is passed, in all probability I shall take advantage of it at some time to apply the closure to some particular member, though I shall not require it to be applied to me. If other people are going to use it, I shall be justified in using it upon others, though I certainly think we can do better without it. When Senator Drake was sitting in opposition in the Queensland Parliament, together with my honorable friend Senator Glassey and myself, we did not discover any "keen sense of justice" in the mere majority opposed to us. We found that every standing order that could be twisted and stretched in any way whatever to deprive us of our right of expressing our opinions on the floor of the House was used by the Chairman and carried out by the majority, because we were in a minority. It is not fair to ask us to depend on the good-will and charity of a majority of the Senate. By allowing the closure to operate in this way, a simple majority of one, even though the attendance might be only one above a bare quorum, might be able to punish any group of senators who had not offended in any way whatever. Take a case that occurred only to-day. We had a discussion on these very standing orders consisting largely of a duel between members of the happy family from South Australia. It resulted in a drawn battle. I believe both the combatants drew blood. It might easily happen that some senators or a majority of those present might lose patience with such a duel and might use the closure. With what result? That every other honorable senator, although not offending in the slightest degree might be deprived of the right of expressing any opinion on the merits of the case at issue. Once the closure motion is carried the question is decided, and the mouths of the whole of the members of the Senate are closed. I object to being subjected to a drastic punishment when I am not an offender. Senator Playford has given a case in justification of this proposal. He tells us that on one occasion, in the South Australian Parliament, Senator McGregor set to work to adduce a number of reasons why he intended to oppose a particular measure. He numbered those reasons, and after two hours he was still engaged in stating number one and had not approached number two. God only knows how long he would have been before he got to number five! Therefore it was wise, argued Senator Playford, to have a rule of this kind to stop senators, like Senator McGregor, from getting as far as reason number five. It might be wise on such an occasion to punish Senator McGregor for wilfully wasting time and obstructing public business, but there is no reason whatever why unoffending senators should be punished for his offence. It is also to be remarked that the offending senator who calls down this drastic provision is not effectively punished at all, because it is impossible to move the closure until the offending senator has completed his offence. Therefore the guilty escapes and the innocent are punished.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—You save others from following the offending senator's example.

Senator DAWSON.—You punish the innocent because the innocent may be tempted to offend. That is a reason advanced by an honorable and learned senator who asks us to depend upon the fairness of the majority of the Senate! These are good and sufficient reasons against this particular provision. If we want to prevent what Senator Playford has complained about, we can provide that a motion may be submitted that a particular senator be no further heard. Then the offender will be punished, whilst the innocent will escape. I see no reason for this standing order.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I cannot conceive of any reason why any honorable senator should be afraid of the majority of the Senate. It appears to me that any one who puts himself in that position has a guilty conscience. Those who are afraid of a majority will, I suppose, object to being turned out at the next election, unless there is a two-thirds majority against them. That would be a splendid idea! Next time they would want to increase the majority to nine-tenths, and after that I suppose they would wish to provide that they should represent the minority. There is no common sense about the idea. I cannot conceive that any honorable senator is on sound ground in objecting to a decision by the majority. I trust that the Senate will adopt the standing order.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—Like Senator Fraser, I am astonished that our democratic and radical members in the labour corner refuse to bow to a majority in the Senate. Almost everything we do is done by a majority, even though it may be only a majority of one, and our honorable friends opposite are quite inconsistent in insisting that a two-thirds majority shall be necessary to carry the question, "That the Committee do now divide." A question, "That the Chairman report progress," or "That the Chairman leave the chair," is carried by a majority of one, and yet it may have the effect of blocking the whole policy of a Government, and may make and unmake a Government. If honorable senators are sick of listening to matter which is not practical politics, we are told that a majority of one is not to be sufficient to stop the continued waste of time. The Senate should have absolute control over its own business. We hear many references to the "gag," but my experience is that if the "gag" could be put upon each of us to some extent, it would be better for the conduct of parliamentary business. If ever the parliamentary machine collapses and does not do justice, it will probably be on account of the excessive amount of talking indulged in. If I had my way I should limit the speeches of honorable senators, and also of Ministers. I should be pleased to consent to a limitation myself, because I believe I should then deliver more condensed speeches, and speeches with more in them. I think we should retain absolute power by majority to say as a Senate that we have had enough discussion upon a particular question. And if honorable senators will bring forward extraneous subjects we should be able to say in the same way that we do not desire to discuss certain subjects.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—During last session there was an average attendance of 24 senators, and I point out that under those circumstances, if Senator Higgs' proposal is agreed to, sixteen senators will be able to close a debate. Surely, if there is a gross abuse of the privileges of debate, we shall be able to find sixteen senators willing to prevent it! What will happen in the other case? Thirteen senators will be able to effectually block eleven other senators.

Senator DOBSON.—If a majority of one can throw out a Customs Bill, why should not a majority of one prevent an honorable senator gossiping too much?

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Dobson must see the distinction—that in one case we are legislating, and in the other we are deciding upon our legislation. Is it advisable that thirteen senators shall be able to say to eleven others, "We shall at once close the debate upon this subject"?

Senator DRAKE.—That is just what honorable senators lost last session.

Senator PEARCE.—I suppose I shall be as ready as any other honorable senator to take advantage of this proposal, but I think that the proposal made by Senator Higgs will give ample power to stop any debate which is a gross abuse of privilege.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—I hope the standing order will be agreed to as printed. I have had a good deal of experience of a similar standing order, and I found it work exceedingly well. I was for ten years in a House with a membership of 24, and even there debates were sometimes continued without any useful purpose in view. It is a proper thing for those elected to transact the business of the country to be placed in a position to stop obstruction of that character. I have known the motion, "That the House do now divide," to be put and subsequently withdrawn when it has been found that one or two members have been especially anxious to speak. But where there is a deliberate purpose to prolong a debate unnecessarily we are perfectly justified in adopting the best means to prevent it.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—Senator Fraser seems to be under the impression that this world is governed by majority, and that a majority can do anything it pleases. The honorable senator is entirely mistaken. Majorities cannot do as they like. There is a restriction, and in every well-governed community the rights of the minority are preserved, and if the majority encroaches upon those rights there is a tribunal to punish them. I am contending that the rights of a minority in the Senate should not be at the tender mercy of the temper which the majority may be in at any particular time. Honorable senators speak of other honorable senators as having guilty consciences, and as being afraid to trust the justice and fair play of their fellow senators. I have already said that I have proved what the sense of justice of fellow members of Parliament is worth by a personal experience, which has been a lengthy, and, to some extent, a painful one. The veriest child in the community who sticks his hand into the fire and gets it burned, learns by experience not to put his hand in the fire again. Possibly Senator Fraser has always been in the happy position of being with the majority, and has never been called upon to suffer. The honorable senator represents absolutely the wrong class to have ever been subjected to the injustice this standing order provides for. I have been astonished that Senator Drake, who has been through precisely the same experience as Senator Glassey and myself, has not raised his voice with those of the colleagues with whom he was associated in the Queensland Parliament. From my experience in the Queensland Parliament, I would as soon trust myself alone at midnight with a gang of burglars as trust to the sense of fair play and justice of certain members of that Parliament. We found that they were capable of torturing and twisting every standing order, not only to gag us, but to put us outside the House, and if our election had had to be determined by their interpretation of standing orders their keen sense of fair play and justice would have prevented even our nomination for election. When there is a keen difference between political parties the sense of fairness and justice in either party is never very keen. Senator Dobson has said that it would be a good thing if honorable senators all round could be prevented from talking so much or so loosely upon every subject that comes up for discussion. With that I absolutely agree. But this standing order is intended to apply only to the minority, and it never can apply to the majority. So long as Senator Dobson continues to sit with the majority he will only have the pleasure of applying the gag, and will never have to undergo the discomfort of having it fitted on himself. As the Senate is constituted it might very well happen that a combination of honorable senators representing two of the States could absolutely close the mouths of the representatives of any one State on which they might have some design. That is a kind of thing for which we certainly should not specially provide in our standing orders. We should stand as a minority in relation to our standing orders as any citizen of the Commonwealth stands in relation to the law governing the country.

Senator DRAKE.—Senator Dawson has mentioned my name particularly, and has taken us back a long time to what happened in the Queensland Parliament. But the recollection of what happened here last session is fresher in my mind. During last session we had this standing order in force in the Senate, and it was used I think only twice, and first by Senator McGregor.

Senator PEARCE.—No; it was first used by the late Senator Sargood against Senator De Largie.

Senator DRAKE.—Then it must have been used more frequently than twice. On the first occasion I remember Senator McGregor moved the motion immediately after Senator Neild had spoken. Then I have a very vivid recollection of another time when it was used against the Government, and certainly not because members supporting the Government had been doing too much talking. It was used not for the purpose of preventing them speaking, but for the purpose of taking a division in a thin House. Late at night there were twelve honorable senators present in the Chamber who wished to go to a division, and there were eleven on the Government side who were not prepared to go to a division. The motion that the Senate do now divide was then moved and carried on division by twelve against eleven.

Senator DAWSON.—Did the honorable and learned senator think that fair at the time?

Senator DRAKE.—I did not, and I was surprised that honorable senators opposite should have done it. Having done that it seems rather surprising that they should express so much indignation at what is regarded as a base and brutal majority overriding the rights of the minority. Surely the minority of eleven on that occasion had some rights as against the majority of twelve; but those gentlemen, no doubt, considered that they were discharging a public duty in using this particular weapon.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Because it was at their hands.

Senator DRAKE.—Those honorable senators do not desire that weapon to be used at the present time, nor do they anticipate that they will desire to use it in the future. I do not blame them for the action they are taking, but it seems rather unnecessary to draw public attention to myself and my own particular case, seeing that recently, on the most prominent occasion on which the closure was used, I, as the representative of the Government, was the special victim.

Senator CHARLESTON (South Australia).—Senator Dawson seems to be under the impression that, under this standing order, the vote has always gone against the member who was anxious to speak, but I have known it go in the contrary direction many times.

Senator DAWSON.—I say that the standing order can apply only to the minority, and never to the majority.

Senator CHARLESTON.—I have known, when a motion of the kind has been submitted, one or more honorable members, who also desired to speak, cross the floor in order to give a majority to the member against whom it was sought to exercise the standing order.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I have known cases in which no such generosity was shown.

Senator CHARLESTON.—So have I; and in every such case the closure has been the right thing. In all the years I have worked under a similar standing order I have never known it abused.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—Senator Drake has said that this particular provision was applied last session against the Government, and has asserted that honorable senators who sit in the same corner as myself did not at that time manifest the indignation we are manifesting now. But we are now framing permanent standing orders, and if we do not now object to what we deem objectionable we must for ever after hold our peace. We should then have no right to protest when the standing order was applied. Last session we adopted temporary standing orders, and it was not then considered wise to discuss the rules, but to accept them on trust. We have worked under those standing orders for one session, and have found this provision at any rate objectionable. Senator Drake, in response to an interjection from me, said he considered the exercise of this standing order last session as grossly unfair; and in doing that he admitted that the exercise of a standing order of the kind leads to unfairness, otherwise injustice. Senator Drake, however, is now in favour of the standing order, not because he believes in its justice, but because it was used against him last session; and now in a spirit of retaliation he seeks to make it permanent.

Senator DRAKE.—No, No!

Senator DAWSON.—I can attach no other meaning to the words of the honorable senator, who offers no justification beyond the incident of last session.

Senator Drake.—I merely wished to show the use which was then made of the standing order.

Senator DAWSON.—I then pointed out that the standing order itself was objectionable, but said that if it were allowed to remain, we, in common with other senators, would probably use it. It must be distinctly understood that we are not contending that the Senate should not have some power to curtail debate, but that that power should not be placed in the hands of one senator. There ought to be a provision similar to that found in other Legislatures, so that when the closure is applied it shall be with the consent of at least two-thirds of the senators present. Indeed, I would go further, and say that the two-thirds should not be less than one-third of the whole Senate. Surely it is not too much to ask those who are great sticklers for the standing order, to show some reason for it, and if they cannot, to let it go by the board. On our side, we have clearly shown very good reason why such a power should not be exercised by one senator.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am sorry so many are opposed to the amendment, and if it be the intention of the majority present to defeat it, I hope they will reconsider the matter and postpone the standing order until there is a reasonable number of senators in the Chamber. There are now only 19 out of the 36 senators present, and yet we are laying down rules of procedure to last for a great number of years.

Senator FRASER.—The standing orders can always be altered.

Senator HIGGS.—There will not be much alteration if many are of the same mind as the honorable senator. It is true, as Senator Playford said, that the small States have equal representation with the large States; but that only applies to the present Senate. Under section 7 of the Constitution new States may be created, and the Senate has the power to increase or decrease the number of representatives, providing that the original States each retain six. Under that section a small State may be created with only three representatives; and we may easily imagine what could happen then. If, as Senator Playford says, the whole Senate gets thoroughly sick of a discussion, surely it would be possible, with, say, eighteen senators present, to get thirteen to agree to a motion under this standing order. The same honorable senator said that it does not much matter either way.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I said that there is no question of justice in the matter.

Senator HIGGS.—There is certainly a great question of justice. Senator Fraser talks about minorities having no rights.

Senator FRASER.—I said that a minority may be often right and a majority often wrong, but that a minority has to submit.

Senator HIGGS.—The majority must rule, and we always take that view at election times. But the majority rule is then applied only after full and adequate discussion of the programmes of the candidates, and there is no application of the "gag." This standing order, although it merely refers to a division in Committee, deserves all the opprobrious epithets that can be applied to it. When I was saying something about the reputation of the Queensland Legislature, it was suggested that I was romancing, and ought to be able to write a book; but is it not a fact that honorable senators, since the standing orders were first produced, have received a page of the most drastic provisions ever submitted in a Legislature, dealing with infringements of the order and privileges of the Senate? On this point I refer honorable senators to Standing Order 428 and those following it, which are provisions originally introduced in the House of Commons to meet such occasions as that on which Colonel Sanderson, M.P., and other honorable members indulged in a free fight, and generally upset the equilibrium of the Chamber. These standing orders are introduced here because honorable senators have an idea that at some time I, or other senators of similar disposition to myself, may make things uncomfortable. Senator Drake's reason, as representative of the Government, for supporting this standing order is that at one time we in this part of the Senate, after giving most unswerving support to the Government, found it desirable to once disagree with them and carry a motion under the rule. Because we did that, Senator Drake is going to apply the "gag" to us for all time.

Senator DRAKE.—I did not say anything of the kind.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Drake forgets all about the experience of the Opposition in the Queensland Parliament—an experience never suffered in any Parliament of Australia—and only has an unhappy remembrance of what occurred here last session. The honorable senator, who has a many-sided character, objects to us in this corner, because we are not a lot of Nazarenes who turn the other cheek when struck. This standing order was exercised against us at a very early period, by either a strong supporter of the Government or a member of the Opposition, and when we found the weapon used, we thought we would give others a taste of the same treatment, in order that we might at some future time receive support in our endeavour to alter the provision. We have all along said that we object to the closure, and while there is a hope that honorable senators will give way and take the same view as we do, we have a right to ask for fuller discussion. The majority in favour of the Pacific Island Labourers Bill has been described by Senator Symon as a majority of only one or two.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I said it was not a big majority.

Senator HIGGS.—I appeal to the Committee whether any attempt was made by honorable senators to limit the discussion on that measure? Was not the most ample discussion of its provisions allowed? No one attempted to apply the gag, although it was known that there was a majority in favour of such legislation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nor would they in any other case of equal importance.

Senator HIGGS.—We do not know. A time may come when the Senate may not be composed of broad-minded magnanimous gentlemen, and I am looking ahead. The honorable and learned member has talked about the sense of justice of the Senate. Its sense of justice has been shown during this discussion. Although we are considering an important question affecting the procedure of the Committee for all time, we hear honorable senators interjecting that Senator So-and-So has spoken once, and he has no right to speak again. I believe that if we were to discuss the question all night it would be recognised in the future that we did quite right. I desire to call the attention of honorable senators to a book which, I am sure, they studied when they first entered politics. In Mill's Essay on Liberty these words occur—

If all mankind minus one, were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind. Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons, or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion still more than those who hold it.

I am very sorry that honorable senators are not paying sufficient attention to the words of one of the great teachers of the human race. This is one of the most serious rules that we have had to consider, and it is well worthy of full discussion. No less than seventeen honorable senators are absent. I am satisfied that if they had anticipated that the Committee would have reached Standing Order 273 to-night they would have made an effort to be present.

Senator DONSON.—Surely we can recommend the standing order.

Senator HIGGS.—I do not believe in postponing the consideration of an important question of this kind.

Senator CLEMENS.—It will not hurt the honorable senator.

Senator HIGGS.—It may hurt me. I am reminded of what occurred when we were considering the Tariff Bill. My action was not approved by several honorable senators. On one occasion I was discussing at some length a proposition, and when I appealed to Senator Playford to stay and listen to some of the important arguments I had to offer, he said that he had had enough of the discussion, and he went away. He thought it was absurd on my part to proceed in that way, but I feel sure that honorable senators will now admit that if we had allowed Senator Symon and his followers to take their own course with the schedule they would have attempted to alter the duty on almost every item. It was only because a few honorable senators freely discussed the items that they said—"We will not bother about a number of the items with which we originally intended to deal. We shall allow them to go as they are," and instead of about 175 requests for amendments being sent to the other House, only about 100 were sent. I consider that I fulfilled a public duty in occupying the attention of the Committee as I did, even though some honorable senators deprecated what they considered to be a waste of time. A time may come when similar legislation will be brought forward.

Senator DRAKE.—If the honorable senator will resume his seat, I will ask the Committee to report progress.

Senator HIGGS.—I shall be very pleased to resume my seat.

Senator DRAKE.—As we have not made quite as much progress to-night with the standing orders as I anticipated we shall go on with their consideration on Wednesday.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—To-morrow.

Senator DRAKE.—I doubted whether we should be able to get a quorum to-morrow. I shall be glad if honorable senators will make a House to-morrow.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland—Postmaster-General).—I move—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will give me an opportunity on Wednesday or Thursday next to discuss my notice of motion relating to the action of the Governor of Victoria.

Senator DRAKE.—I cannot consent to put aside Government business for that purpose. The only private members' business on the paper for to-morrow is a notice of motion in the name of Senator McGregor, and after it is disposed of, or after the lapse of the time which is allowed for private members' business, we shall go on with the standing orders.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 10 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 11 June, 1903.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPER.

Sir EDMUND BARTON laid on the table—

Interim reports of Engineers-in-Chief upon the proposed transcontinental railway from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta.

ST. LOUIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. O'MALLEY.—As all the countries and nations of the world, with the exception of Australia, are being represented at the World's Exposition at St. Louis, will the Prime Minister reconsider his decision regarding the representation of the Commonwealth there, seeing that the United States authorities have offered adequate space free of all charge?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Consul-General for the United States has lately written to this Government, inviting us to reconsider the decision that the Commonwealth cannot as such be represented at the St. Louis Exposition, and in his communication he offers, on behalf of his Government, to provide abundant space in one of the buildings for Commonwealth exhibits.

Upon receipt of that letter I felt it my duty to communicate with the Premiers of the States, in order to ascertain their feelings upon the question of co-operating in a general representation. To my mind the representation of the Commonwealth is not likely to be successful unless such co-operation is secured, and the obtaining of it depends upon the answers which will be received from the Premiers of the States.

SUGAR EXCISE DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—I wish to know from the Treasurer if it is a fact that revenue from the excise duties on sugar, which should have been paid to some of the States, has been retained by the Government in anticipation of legislation authorizing its distribution on a per capita basis?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Under the provisions of the Excise Tariff Act and the regulations framed in accordance with them, it was necessary to pay the rebates immediately; but as we could not at once provide for the distribution of the excise, the whole amount was, at my direction, placed to the credit of a trust fund, and rebates were paid out of that fund up to about the end of December last. In the meantime I ascertained from the returns which were coming in that it would not be right to continue to follow the plan originally suggested, and I then withheld the distribution until I could obtain a decision from Parliament upon a proposed alteration of it. Immediately Parliament has dealt with the matter the whole amount will be distributed. But as the State of Queensland was anxious to have money paid to her, I advanced £25,000 to that State, and had any other State desired to be paid any portion of the amount I should have made a similar advance, keeping well within the sum which I thought she was entitled to.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—The right honorable gentleman does not propose to make the Bill retrospective?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Yes. It will take effect from the beginning of this year. That is the reason for the retention of the money.

VICTORIAN INCOME TAX.

Mr. MAHON.—Seeing how destructive the practice is to friendly Federal feeling, I wish to know from the Attorney-General if he intends to request the Government of Victoria to restrain its Commissioner of Taxes from harassing honorable members of this Parliament who represent other States with illegal demands for income tax assessed upon their salaries, and with threats of punishment for the non-payment of the tax?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not know that that is a matter upon which we can officially approach the State of Victoria, but I am still hoping to receive from the Premier the intimation, unasked, that members of this Parliament representing constituencies outside Victoria will be excluded from the operation of the local Income Tax Act.

TELEPHONE GUARANTEES.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What is the amount of the losses on the telephonic guarantee lines in New South Wales?
2. How long was this amount accumulating?
3. What was the value and yearly average of the total telephonic business during the same period?
4. What was the average yearly amount of the bad debts?
5. What was the average yearly proportion of bad debts to total business?

Sir EDMUND BARTON. — A report has been obtained from the Deputy Postmaster-General, Sydney, to the following effect:—

Information prior to 1893 cannot be given. A statement of the particulars required since that date is being prepared, but will take two days to complete. The questions will be replied to, as far as practicable, when the report is received.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. MAHON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Were public tenders called for the conveyance of a mail between Mount Magnet and Black Range, Western Australia?
2. In what manner were tenders invited, and when?
3. Will the Postmaster-General direct that, in future, all mail contracts, even of an emergency nature, shall be advertised either in the Commonwealth Gazette or in a newspaper published in the district concerned, or both?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The necessary inquiries are being made, and a reply will be given in due course.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. THOMSON asked the Minister representing the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether the Postmaster-General has received a communication from the Pacific Cable Board suggesting that steps should be taken to bring the advantages of the Pacific Cable before the public?

2. If so, what steps has the Postmaster-General taken, or does he intend to take?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. The Postmaster-General has received a communication from the Pacific Cable Board asking him to employ, on behalf of the Board, suitable persons to canvass for business in the States of New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland, for a period of three months.

2. He has employed a canvasser in Victoria, and has instructed the Deputy Postmaster-General in New South Wales and Queensland to take the necessary action to obtain suitable persons to canvass in those States.

TARCOOLA TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. MAHON asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

1. What is the contract price of the telegraph line to Tarcoola, South Australia, and the distance under construction?

2. What is the present estimated revenue that will be earned by the line?

3. Did the Government demand the guarantee usual in such cases, and was it obtained?

4. If not, are other applications for telegraph and telephone extensions to more promising centres refused unless accompanied by a cash guarantee; and, if so, why?

5. Is the money spent on constructing this line "new" expenditure, and will any loss in working and maintenance be chargeable solely to South Australia?

6. How much does the Treasurer propose to allocate next year from revenue for telegraph and telephone extension in Western Australia?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1. There is no contract price, as the line is being constructed by the Department. The amount provided on the Estimates is £14,000.

2. No estimate has been made.

3. It is not usual to require guarantees in all cases. Provision is being made for an additional line from Perth to Eucla at an estimated cost of £20,000 without guarantee, and also for an additional line to Yardea, in South Australia, to provide better and more adequate means of communication with Western Australia, without guarantee.

4. The Department is not aware of any extensions to more promising centres which have been refused unless accompanied by cash guarantees.

5. The cost of construction is at present charged against the State, but ultimately will be dealt with in the same manner as transferred properties. Any loss in working and maintenance is charged against South Australia.

6. A considerable sum will be provided for this purpose on the forthcoming Estimates, but the actual amount has not yet been settled.

TELEGRAPH LINE REPAIRERS.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—In reference to the question asked last night by the honorable member for South Australia, Mr. Batchelor, as to the position under the Public Service Act of men in the line-repairing branch of the Postal Department, I have been furnished from the Department of the Minister for Home Affairs with the following information—

The Public Service Commissioner has called for a return from all the States, showing every line repairer employed, the nature of his work, his length of service, and other particulars, with the object of considering their claims for being brought into the permanent service before the 30th instant, when the present exemptions will expire.

Until these returns are all received and thoroughly investigated, it is not possible to say what number of line repairers would be drafted into the permanent service, but the Commissioner is of opinion that a very large number of them will have the exemptions removed at the termination of the date named.

Every effort has been made to get the whole matter completed before the due date, viz., 30th June.

SUGAR BONUS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Honorable members will recollect that, in pursuance of the policy which was adopted by Parliament almost unanimously, in order to create a white Australia, certain legislation was passed providing for the payment of rebates of excise upon sugar grown by white labour, to compensate the growers for the extra expense they might be put to in employing white instead of coloured labour. The schedule to the Excise Tariff Act provides that the duty upon manufactured sugar shall be 3s. per cwt.—

until the 1st January, 1907, less, from 1st July, 1902, a rebate to the grower of sugar-cane and beet. The rebate in the case of sugar-cane to be 4s. per ton on all sugar-cane delivered for manufacture, and in the production of which sugar-cane white labour only has been employed after 28th February, 1902. The rebate is calculated on cane giving 10 per cent. of sugar, and is to be increased or reduced proportionately, according to any variation from this standard. A similar rebate to be allowed in respect of sugar-beet—the rebate to be allowed at the rate of £2 per ton on the sugar-giving contents of the beet. All rebates to be allowed at the time of delivery of the cane or beet on the ascertainment in manner prescribed of the sugar-giving contents, and so that it may be prescribed that the average sugar-giving contents of the cane or beet in any particular district shall be taken to be the sugar-giving contents of each lot of cane or beet in such district.

That provision has been carried into effect, and has worked well, except so far as the charging of the amount of rebate is concerned. The Bill which is now before honorable members does not in any way alter the practice. We shall still carry out the principles already laid down, and for which we have power to make necessary regulations from time to time. What we ask honorable members to consider is whether it would be better to divide the amount to be paid for rebate among the people of all the States, or to charge it according to the quantity of sugar grown by white labour consumed in each State. When the provision which I have read was agreed to, I was under the impression that the arrangement for which it provides would be an equitable one, and that the amount of sugar upon which excise was paid used in each State would probably be somewhat in proportion to the population of that State. But experience has shown, as I will demonstrate to honorable members by giving them the actual figures, that that does not occur, and that if we are to continue the practice of charging to each State the £2 per ton allowed as rebate on the amount of sugar grown by white labour consumed in that State, some of the States will pay practically nothing, while Queensland, and, in particular, New South Wales, will have to bear almost the whole burden. This occurred in consequence of large imports of foreign sugar into Victoria and South Australia, the amount of excise sugar consumed in those States having been very small indeed. In these two States very considerable revenue has been derived from the import duty of £6 per ton, whilst the States which have consumed the white-grown Australian sugar have practically borne the whole burden of the charge.

Mr. V. L. SOLOMON.—Have they not been credited as the States in which the sugar has been consumed?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I shall deal with that point presently. The amount of the rebate has to be paid immediately the cane is delivered at the mill, and the £2 per ton rebate, as it is called, is then paid. I am perfectly sure that had honorable members known at the time the Act was passed of the effects that would follow from the mode proposed for the payment of the rebate, they would never have agreed to it, because it is quite certain that as a white Australia was designed for the benefit of the Commonwealth, whatever sacrifices have to be made must be shared by the whole of the people. I confess that the returns which have come in with regard to the consumption of sugar have astonished me, and have, after full consideration, led me to the conclusion that it would be very unfair and unjust to take any other course than to distribute, according to our population, the burden of the sugar rebates for the past year, as well as for the years over which the rebate provisions extend. There has been some misconception in Queensland and New South Wales as to the effect of carrying out our original proposal. It was thought that the whole of the rebate would be charged to the State in which it was paid. That is that New South Wales or Queensland, which produced white sugar, and sent it away to Western Australia or Tasmania, would be charged the whole of the rebate. That was never intended, because it would be monstrously unfair. The mode we intended to adopt was to use the Inter-State adjustments and credit to each particular State the amount of duty collected on the sugar consumed in that State. That would resolve itself into crediting £1 per ton upon white-grown sugar, and £3 per ton upon black-grown sugar, and, therefore, Queensland and New South Wales would not have been called to pay upon anything more than for the quantity of white-grown sugar actually consumed in those States. That was the utmost extent to which we intended to go, but, as experience has shown, that system would operate very unfairly indeed. I have circulated for the information of honorable members certain tables, which I will explain, in order to facilitate an understanding of what is indeed a very difficult and complicated subject. It is really extraordinary how some of the sugar gets mixed up. Some is exported to other States direct, and some of the Queensland sugar is imported into New South Wales and becomes mixed with the black-grown and white-grown sugar produced in that State, and is ultimately re-exported to some of the other States. The figures I have adopted in the returns referred to are not absolutely correct, because I cannot arrive at the exact amounts until after the 30th June. I am satisfied, however, that they are approximately correct—sufficiently so to enable honorable members to judge of the effect of the two alternative courses we have to consider, and between which we have to choose. New South Wales produced 21,000 tons of sugar, of which 18,000 tons was grown by means of white labour, and 3,000 tons by the employment of black labour; or in the proportion of .85 white and .15 black. I am following the figures given in the return, although later information leads me to believe that there will probably be a little over 19,000 tons of white-grown sugar, and a little less than 2,000 tons of black-grown sugar. It will be seen from these figures that in New South Wales practically the whole of the sugar produced is white grown, whereas quite the reverse is the case in Queensland at present—although we all hope that the quantity of white-grown sugar in that State will largely increase. So far as the past year was concerned the white-grown sugar in Queensland amounted to 12,000 tons, and the black-grown sugar to 66,000 tons, or a total of 78,000 tons; in the proportion of .15 white and .85 black.

Sir George Turner.

MR. CONROY.—Are there any later figures in regard to Queensland?

SIR GEORGE TURNER.—No; the figures given in the return are practically correct. Taking the two States together, 12,000 tons of white-grown sugar in Queensland, and 18,000 tons similarly produced in New South Wales give us a total of 30,000 tons of white-grown sugar. Queensland produces 66,000 tons of black-grown sugar, and New South Wales 3,000 tons, making a total of 69,000 tons of black-grown product, or a gross total of 99,000 tons as the year's production. I now desire to give honorable members a few figures which are not in the printed document. I wish to show them what has become of the Queensland production. Queensland yields 78,000 tons altogether. Of that quantity 6,000 tons is refined in Queensland and goes into New South Wales for consumption there direct; 41,000 tons of unrefined sugar is sent to New South Wales, and is there mixed with the white and black-grown sugar of that State during the process of refining; 8,000 tons of unrefined sugar is sent to Victoria. Of course, honorable members will understand that when the refining takes place no distinction is or can be made between the white and the black-grown sugar, as both classes of product are refined together, and, therefore, if we charge the States upon a consumption basis we shall have to ascertain as nearly as we can what proportion of white-grown and black-grown sugar is used. We know the proportions of white to black-grown sugar in Queensland, and also the proportions of the two classes of product in New South Wales. We know, further, that certain quantities go direct from Queensland to New South Wales, and that a large quantity is sent there unrefined, and is mixed with New South Wales sugar. The result of this is shown in the next table. The quantity of Australian sugar dealt with in New South Wales—not necessarily consumed—is made up as follows:—The New South Wales production is 18,000 tons of white-grown and 3,000 tons of black, or a total of 21,000 tons. The quantity sent direct to New South Wales from Queensland is 950 tons of white and 5,050 tons of black-grown sugar, making a total of 6,000 tons. The proportion in the latter case is arrived at, in view of the knowledge that the white-grown sugar of Queensland bears the proportion of .15 per cent. to .85 per cent. grown by black labour. That is how we arrive at the proportion of the white-grown sugar that goes direct to New South Wales. Then we have 6,250 tons of white-grown sugar, and 34,750 tons of black-grown sugar, or a total of 41,000 tons sent from Queensland unrefined to New South Wales. The home-produced sugar in New South Wales and the Queensland unrefined sugar, mixed together, give us the proportion of .39 of white-grown sugar, as against .61 black-grown sugar, or practically two-fifths as against three-fifths, and we may base our calculations with regard to it upon these figures. Honorable members will see that these figures give about the fair proportion of the white-grown as against the black-grown sugar in Queensland and New South Wales taken together. In Queensland the white-grown sugar represents .15 per cent., and in New South Wales .85 per cent., so that when the New South Wales and Queensland sugars are mixed we arrive at the proportion which we have to deal with so far as sugar refined in New South Wales is concerned—whether it is used there or sent to other States. The sugar which goes direct from Queensland to New South Wales bears the same proportion in regard to white and black-grown sugar as that which is sent to the latter State in an unrefined condition. By adding together the figures which I have mentioned we arrive at a total of 68,000 tons. Of that quantity 8,000 tons appear to be sent to other States, the proportions being—Western Australia, 1,200 tons white-grown and 1,800 tons black-grown, or a total of 3,000 tons; Tasmania, 1,800 tons white-grown and 2,700 tons black-grown, or a total of 4,500; and South Australia, 500 tons. As the figures for the last-named State are so small, I have not attempted to divide the quantity into its proper proportions of white and black-grown sugar. Therefore, that leaves New South Wales with 60,000 tons of sugar for her own consumption, of which 22,200 tons is white-grown and 37,800 tons is black-grown. I have endeavoured to show the proportions in which the black and white-grown sugar would be consumed by the various States. I do not say this would all be consumed during the present financial year, because there would be a certain quantity—about 7,500 tons—which would have to be carried forward to next year; but as the rebate has to be paid as soon as the sugarcane is delivered at the mill, it is only fair that, in calculating the proportion of rebate, we should take the whole quantity produced for the season, whether it be consumed this year or in the earlier part of next year. I have shown honorable members the proportions of the 60,000 tons consumed in New South Wales. Victoria imports practically the whole of her Australian sugar from Queensland in the proportion of 1,250 tons of white-grown and 6,750 tons of black-grown. Queensland uses 23,000 tons herself, and sends to South Australia 500 tons. Western Australia receives 3,000 tons from New South Wales, and Tasmania receives 4,500 tons also from New South Wales. Therefore, we find that out of the 99,000 tons of sugar produced in Australia, about 30,000 tons may be taken to be white-grown, and 69,000 as black-grown, distributed in the proportions shown in the figures I have laid before honorable members. The approximate amount of the rebate paid is £60,000. This sum may be increased by £500 when we have the complete figures. £36,000 is paid to the growers of New South Wales in respect to 18,000 tons, and £24,000 to the growers of Queensland in respect to 12,000 tons. The money has actually been paid in those States, but would be distributed if we were to adopt the consumption basis in a certain manner which I have pointed out, and in a somewhat different manner if we were to choose the population basis. I now propose to show the effect of the two distributions, so that we can judge from a financial stand-point, leaving out the Australian point of view, what will be the result in each particular State.

Mr. EWING.—Has the Treasurer fairly set down the quantity which each State actually consumes?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I shall supply the information later on. The figures I have given show the rateable consumption of the total quantity produced this year, and I propose later on to show the actual amount consumed in each State. If honorable members will look at the next table they will see figures set out showing the amount that will be charged to each State on a consumption basis, and also upon a population basis. I do not wish to weary honorable members by giving details. If we adopt the basis which we regard as fairest to the States, namely, that of a population basis, New South Wales would get £22,758 more than on a consumption basis, and Tasmania would gain £894. These two amounts, totalling £23,652, would be made up by contributions of £16,286 from Victoria, £862 from Queensland, £5,658 from South Australia, and £846 from Western Australia. But whether the burden be distributed upon the basis of consumption or of population, I think that at the end of the financial year, speaking roundly, the amount, so far as Tasmania, Queensland, and Western Australia are concerned, would be just about the same, and that South Australia and Victoria would each apparently lose considerable sums, which would go to New South Wales. I say "apparently" lose, because we cannot declare that these sums really represent a loss. It has been the good fortune of these two States to receive a very large amount of revenue from imported sugar—an amount far more than I anticipated, and much in excess of that which will probably be derived from the same source in ordinary years. A considerable sum has been paid by way of excise in Queensland and New South Wales during the past year. Queensland sends her sugar supplies principally to New South Wales and Victoria, whilst New South Wales exports pretty largely to Tasmania and Western Australia. I have already informed honorable members of the proportion in which the mixed sugars would work out. Possibly some of the representatives of South Australia or Victoria, or even the Governments of those States, may think it is hard that they should be called upon to repay this money. It may be so for this particular year, but it is only an act of simple justice to the other States that the burden imposed upon the Commonwealth by the adoption of the policy of a white Australia shall be equitably distributed amongst the different States. It is only fair and logical that the expenditure incurred in this connexion should be based upon the population of the States rather than upon their consumption of sugar, which may vary from year to year. These two States have received very large revenues from imported sugar—very much more than could possibly have been estimated at the beginning of the year. At the same time we must not forget that the distribution of foreign-grown sugar is entirely in the hands of the importers, and practically under the control of one company. It is just possible that this year it may have suited that company to send its imported sugar to Victoria and South Australia, whilst next year its purpose may be served by sending it to New South Wales, Western Australia, or Tasmania. If we are to deal with the question upon a consumption basis, honorable members will see that the more foreign sugar is imported into any particular State, the less will be the quantity of excise sugar used, and the less the rebate paid.

Mr. GLYNN. — Practically all the sugar previously consumed in South Australia was imported.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — South Australia appears to import direct. It may suit the company to which I have referred to send a certain portion of its imported sugar to South Australia. But that is looking at this question simply from a provincial stand-point, and I ask honorable members not to regard it in that light. We ought rather to remember that, when we declared in favour of a white Australia, we distinctly affirmed that the adoption of that policy must not be at the

of any particular State or States. Australia has no cause to grumble so the receipts are concerned, because duty formerly imposed upon sugar in State was only £3 per ton. In Queensland it will be seen that it makes very little difference this year in which way the amount of rebate is distributed, but as the production of sugar by white labour increases so the total rebate, which has to be borne by the cane cultivators, will increase. The difficulty in the way of distributing payment upon a consumption basis in Victoria, by importing direct from Queensland, gets only 15 of white-grown sugar, and consequently will pay on that quantity only, whereas Tasmania and Western Australia, which obtain 40, will pay on that quantity. As between these States, it can hardly be said to be a fair advantage. But if we look forward to the year 1906-7, we shall be forced to the conclusion that those who have sugar will not wait back till after 1st January, 1907, in order to avoid paying excise, whilst in the meantime the rebate will probably have increased to much more than it represents at present. It would be manifestly unfair to expect the two States which grow the cane to pay the rebate and to obtain no benefit whatever. But that is what would happen if we did not adopt a different method from that which now obtains.

Mr. CAMERON.—They are getting the benefit of it.

Mr. GEORGE TURNER.—It is true that the growers get the benefit of the money expended there, if honorable members would regard this question purely from a grower's point of view. But I think that the House will decline to adopt that course, seeing that for the benefit of the cane of the Commonwealth we have decided in favour of a white Australia.

Mr. E. EWING.—The cane growers have to substitute white labour for black labour and they obtain any rebate.

Mr. GEORGE TURNER.—In my opening remarks I pointed out that this rebate was given to the growers to enable them to bear the burden imposed on them by the employment of white instead of black labour.

Mr. GLYNN.—In New South Wales sugar was previously produced by white labour.

Mr. GEORGE TURNER.—That is so, but New South Wales will derive a benefit from that. But we have no means of discriminating between New South Wales and Queensland, or any other State. In the course of a few years I trust that Victoria will be producing beet sugar, and I am perfectly certain that the people of this State would consider themselves very harshly treated if they were then called upon to pay the whole of the rebate of £2 per ton upon their production, because the beet was grown by white instead of coloured labour. What applies to New South Wales at the present time, may possibly apply to the other States later on.

Mr. GLYNN.—South Australia is sacrificing about £100,000 a year for the purpose of carrying out the policy, and for that she receives no return.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—South Australia is not giving up much at the present time. Eventually, of course, all the States will have to make a sacrifice.

Mr. GLYNN.—It represents about £700,000 a year upon the basis of the figures produced.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—That is on the assumption that Australia produces all the sugar required for its own use. If honorable members will look at the last table, they will see one startling effect which the present year has disclosed. In New South Wales 11,000 tons of sugar were imported, from which a revenue of £66,000 was derived; in Victoria 47,000 tons were imported upon which £282,000 was collected. In Queensland the imports of sugar totalled 1,000 tons, the revenue from which was £6,000; in South Australia 16,000 tons were imported, the receipts from this source aggregating £96,000. Western Australia imported 7,000 tons, upon which she collected £42,000; whilst Tasmania imported 3,500 tons, representing a revenue of £21,000. Honorable members will, therefore, see that Victoria and South Australia—the two States which, under this proposal, will have to contribute a certain sum to assist in carrying out the white Australia policy—have received very large sums of revenue from imported sugar. Turning to the next column, honorable members will find that New South Wales consumed 56,000 tons of sugar, upon which an excise duty at the full rate of £3 per ton was charged, thereby collecting £168,000, whereas Victoria consumed only 8,000 tons, has derived a revenue of £24,000. South Australia practically is not affected, and the two other States of Western Australia and Tasmania received fair amounts both from excise and import duties. These figures show the varying proportions in which the various States consume Australian sugar and imported sugar. It is clear, therefore, that it would be unreasonable to make a distribution in the manner which was originally proposed. The time has now arrived when, in the light of the experience of the past twelve months, we ought to consider whether we did not make a mistake—as I believe we did—and whether we should not remedy that mistake by providing that the distribution from a national point of view shall be upon a population basis. Judged by the way in which the revenue is now coming in, the hope which has been expressed that eventually we may be able to abolish the excise duty upon sugar may yet be realized. The excise was imposed for the purpose of assisting the white Australia movement, and because some of the States could not afford to forego the duty. If we could possibly have avoided it, we should not have imposed an excise duty upon sugar any more than upon Australian wine. Had it not been for the financial difficulties of the States, Parliament would have been very glad to enact that no excise should be charged in regard to Australian sugar.

Mr. GLYNN.—We are surrendering about £800,000 a year in revenue.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—My honorable and learned friend desires to open up a discussion in regard to the wisdom of the adoption of the policy of a white Australia—a question which has been already decided. That matter has been settled by this House, according to the mandate received from the people, and no good purpose will be served by re-opening it. If any loss is occasioned to the Commonwealth by the adoption of that policy, the States have to make it good.

Mr. GLYNN.—I voted for the proposal, but we are paying too much for it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order; the discussion of that question is not in order.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The revenue derived from Australian sugar this year will be about £274,000, whilst that from imported sugar represents £513,000, making a total of £787,000, which is a very large sum to obtain from that article.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Was there no beet sugar imported?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I do not think so. If any beet sugar was imported, it represents only a small quantity, which would not appreciably affect the question of distribution. Whilst temporarily undertaking the duties of Minister for Trades and Customs, my attention was called to the question of whether beet sugar was not being imported in lieu of cane sugar, but subsequent investigation proved that there was no foundation for the surmise. The Commonwealth consumes about 177,000 tons of sugar during the year. The consumption of the locally-grown article and that of imported sugar is almost equal, the former last year representing 95,100 tons, and the latter 82,000 tons. I hope that the day is not far distant when the Commonwealth will consume only Australian grown sugar. We shall probably lose a certain amount of revenue in consequence thereof, but we are all hopeful that the progression which will take place as we believe during the next few years will give us additional revenue from other articles, and so enable us to give up the excise on sugar at the end of the period named. I have endeavoured in my speech to place before honorable members as clearly as I can the figures relating to this matter, and I have also circulated them so that they may have an opportunity before the debate on the second reading of the Bill is resumed to dissect them and give the House the value of their criticisms. I have put forward all the information at my command, so that honorable members may have as full a knowledge as I possess in relation to these figures.

Mr. EWING.—Can the right honorable gentleman say what will happen if the sugar held over is the Australian and not the imported article.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I cannot do that exactly. When I spoke of the 7,500 tons, I was dealing only with Australian sugar. That was one of the most difficult elements in the calculation that I had to make, because I found at the beginning of the year that a certain quantity of mixed sugar, both the imported and the Australian article, was held in stock. No doubt, a certain quantity—perhaps a little more or a little less than last year—will remain in stock at the end of the present year. I have ascertained that the production of Australian sugar for the year amounted to 99,000 tons.

Mr. CONROY.—Why has the production been so low this year; it is a good deal below the average?

GEORGE TURNER.—Yes. I believe that last year, or the year before, some 100 tons of sugar were produced; but, as it is possible at this period to obtain a nation, this year's crop will not be very much from last season's returns. Of course, there may be an improvement, with a really good year we might produce 125,000 or 150,000 tons. In that case, as I have already pointed out, the burden upon the producing States would be no more oppressive than before, if we decided they should continue to bear it, as at present. That is one condition which has led me strongly to the conclusion that, if we do do justice all round and make Australia pay for Australia's wish, we shall be able to distribute the burden upon a population rather than a consumption basis.

MR. FISHER.—That argument rests on the assumption that white labour will be employed to cultivate sugar in Queensland and New South Wales.

GEORGE TURNER.—Yes. We must assume that the extent of white labour employed in the cultivation of sugar will increase; and that it will do so is shown by the number of applications we have received for permission to participate in the cultivation granted in respect of white grown sugar. The extent of acreage under sugar cultivation this year is, I believe, about 25 per cent. greater than it was last year. I trust that as time goes on, and as the workers gain in experience, their output will largely increase, and that at the end of the period named, Queensland and New South Wales will be able to produce sufficient sugar to meet the requirements of the Commonwealth, even if they are unable to produce sufficient to allow an inter-trade to be opened up.

MR. FISHER.—By white labour?

GEORGE TURNER.—Certainly. It is our desire that it shall be produced by the labour that induces us to ask the aid of Victoria and South Australia to contribute, at all events for the present, and give up revenue to which they are otherwise entitled. But while the demand is made upon them we have to remember that they also may have to make an appeal to the patriotism of the other colonies a year or two hence. The variations in trade may be such that imported sugar may be consumed largely in those States which now use the local article, while the sugar on which excise is paid may be used more largely in States which now consume the imported article.

MR. THOMSON.—The Queensland sugar-growers will seek the nearest market until the production becomes so great as to compel them to go into distant ones.

SIR GEORGE TURNER.—It might suit New South Wales to send the Australian-grown sugar in much larger quantities than at present to the other States, and to consume a good deal more of the imported sugar. If we insist upon the continuance of the present practice, and if it is found that the people of that State have to pay a much higher rate than we are called upon to pay, that event may occur. There is a large firm operating there, and it may consider such a course desirable. We cannot say what changes may arise, and it is quite possible that the States which are now reaping the benefit of the revenue obtained from imported sugar will not obtain so much from it a few years hence. It is not my wish, however, that honorable members should consider this subject solely from that point of view. I have placed the matter before them so that they may clearly see how the proposal will affect the individual States. We must not deal with this question from any provincial point of view; but we should remember that as the policy of a white Australia was adopted for the benefit of the whole Continent, the whole Continent should contribute rateably towards the cost of carrying out that policy.

Debate (on motion by Mr. THOMSON) adjourned.

SUGAR REBATE ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

SIR GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time. I need not weary honorable members by dealing at length with the provisions of this measure. It follows as a necessary corollary of the Bill the principles of which I have just explained. It simply takes away the provisions for rebate in the Excise Act, so that if we pass it we shall have no power to grant it. If the Sugar Bonus Bill be passed into law, however, we shall be able to grant bonuses.

Debate (on motion by Mr. CONROY) adjourned.

JUDICIARY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 10th June (vide page 746), on motion by Mr. DEAKIN—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—The first question which the House has to consider in dealing with this matter is whether any measure of this or any other kind is necessary for the establishment of a High Court. To that I think but one answer can be returned. Throughout all Australia a proposal for the establishment of a court of some kind or other is expected, and the question before us is whether the Bill under consideration is the one that should have been brought forward. I assert that it is not the Bill that Australia requires. What was demanded by the people of Australia was a very short measure, consisting at most of four or five clauses, giving power for all actions or claims against the Commonwealth to be decided in the Courts which at present exist throughout Australia, and, at the same time, giving the power to grant mandamuses and prohibitions to the various Courts exercising the other jurisdiction. It is clear that, under our Constitution, we have power to confer Federal jurisdiction upon the various States Courts, and in that respect it differs greatly from that of the United States of America. The honorable and learned member for Indi referred last night to the analogy of the American Constitution, and said that the word "shall," which appeared in that Constitution, was considered mandatory. In support of that assertion he read the opinion given by Mr. Justice Story, but he failed to mention that the very same Judge pointed out that, so far as the Congress of America was concerned, the provision in the Constitution for a Federal Supreme Court was mandatory upon it, inasmuch as it had no power whatever to vest any of the States Courts with original jurisdiction. The difference between the United States Constitution and our own in that respect is so marked that honorable members with a legal turn of mind will readily understand it. Under our Constitution, we are able to confer on any courts which we choose to select, both original and appellate jurisdiction. So great is the difference between our Constitution and that of the United States, that what was obligatory in the case of the United States is not obligatory upon us. Even if it had been obligatory upon us to create a High Court, we should clearly have had the power to create a court at very much less expense than the one proposed in this Bill will involve. It would have been open to us to select the various Judges of the States Courts, and, merely as the result of being invested with Federal jurisdiction, they would have had to resolve themselves into a body to determine questions of law coming before them. The Attorney-General admitted that we could invest the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, but he said a serious objection to the adoption of that course was that we might obtain decisions from a State Court of weak Judges. But can it be contended that all the Judges of the Bench which he proposes to create will be of the same mental strength: that their minds will be cast in exactly the same mould, and that consequently every case that comes before them will be decided in the same way? If that is the Attorney-General's view he makes a very erroneous estimate of human nature, and one that he cannot expect to realize. Even if we might obtain under such a system a decision from a weak State Court, the same result might be expected from one or other of the Judges who are likely to be appointed under this Bill. We have the right of appeal to the Privy Council from any of the States Courts, and that is a fact which should be borne in mind. I was also surprised to hear the honorable and learned member for Indi speak of the Privy Council, not as it exists to-day, but as it existed over twenty years ago. He totally ignored the fact that nearly twenty years ago four professional Justices were appointed to that tribunal, and that the great bulk of the cases which come before it are now decided by them. Therefore, instead of having a body of men not conversant with all the questions that come before them for determination, we have at least four members of the Privy Council who sit for the express purpose of hearing and determining the various appeals which arise. Therefore, the value of the decisions given by them cannot be over-estimated. From my point of view, however, it is not necessary for us to dwell upon that fact, because only 223 cases have been carried to the Privy Council during the last twenty years, an average of 8 1/4 cases

Mr. Are we, therefore, to form a Judiciary which in all probability will have to deal with only eleven cases a year? But we may not be able to prevent at least the number of appeals that arise going direct to the Privy Council, not even attempted to do so in the past. The Attorney-General has not attacked it, because he clearly recognises that he has not the power. However desirable it might be to have that power, we must deal with the matter as we can in the position in which we are placed, and must remember that we cannot override the provisions of the Constitution by trying to pre-empt appeals to the Privy Council. Both the Attorney-General and the honorable member for Indi spoke strongly against the necessity for appointing Federal Judges who would be likely, not to interfere with the Constitution, but to strain its provisions according to the preconceived notions of the Ministry as to what they should be. If the statements of those honorable and learned gentlemen amounted to anything, they amounted to this, that we should not appoint a Federal Judiciary to alter the Constitution. Is the Attorney-General in that contention? Does he see the limits of his position? On his showing we are to have a Judiciary which will set itself above the law, and, instead of performing the proper functions of such a body in construing the Constitution, will take it upon itself to alter its provisions. That is not an idea to set before honorable members. We have never believed that Judges should make the laws, and since I have been a member of Parliament I am still more strongly of that opinion. It is the duty of the Government to legislate for the people, after due consideration of all the circumstances involved. If an amendment of the Constitution is required, the proper course to take is to amend it as provided in the instrument under which it is necessary that resolutions embodying the required alterations be passed by both Houses of Parliament, and then submitted to the vote of the people throughout the States for their approval. The Judges of the Federal Bench are to be men of political experience and presence, I presume that none of those who have served upon the Judicial Benches of the States will be eligible for appointment. Therefore we are to trust the interpretation of cases arising under the Constitution to an untrained Judiciary.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member does not suggest that the appointments will be political?

Mr. CONROY.—I will allow that the appointments are to be made with the greatest care and attention; but a certain bias of mind is hoped for by the Attorney-General. What we want is a Judiciary which will hold the balance between the Federal Government on the one side and the States on the other. We want to have the Constitution interpreted exactly according to its meaning, not to have it altered according to the whim of its framers, or to satisfy any opinion as to the possibility of improving it. If the Government had proposed to provide only for an Appellate Court, their position would have been much stronger than it is now. But the Bill goes further than that, inasmuch as it does not invest the various States Courts with the Federal jurisdiction necessary to bring justice in Federal matters within the reach of all. If the States Courts are not invested with Federal jurisdiction, it will be necessary to appoint Federal Courts of similarly limited jurisdiction. Otherwise we shall be practically denying justice to the great bulk of the people. This is a matter to which I particularly call the attention of the democratic members of the House. One of the things which all true law reformers fight against is the present expense of litigation. They wish to bring justice as far as possible within the reach of all. But the Bill not only does not do that, but it prevents justice being done in hundreds of cases. We must not forget that the great bulk of the civil cases which are brought forward for legal settlement are tried in the magistrates' courts, because those courts provide the most economical method which has yet been devised for giving justice to the people. I should like to see the criminal and civil jurisdictions of these courts separated, and in referring to them I shall term them police courts in regard to their criminal jurisdiction, and magistrates' courts in regard to their jurisdiction in civil proceedings. The great bulk of the people go into the magistrates' courts because they cannot afford to take their cases elsewhere, and those who are animated by the desire to see justice properly administered would be strongly opposed to their abolition. But if Federal jurisdiction is not granted to them—limited, of course, in much the same way as their State jurisdiction is limited—in an immense number of cases it will be impossible for people to obtain justice. Then above the magistrates' courts are the County or District Courts. Are we to allow them no jurisdiction in Federal matters? If we do not, we shall be taking an extraordinary course, because we shall either be denying justice to many, or will have to appoint a large body of Federal Judges to travel through the States to bring justice within easy reach of the people. The District Courts of the States, and the practice of the Supreme Courts in going on circuit, are part of a system for the cheapening of law to the people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But in proportion as we cheapen it to the litigant we increase the cost of administration.

Mr. CONROY.—I do not doubt that that is so. Sometimes objection is taken to the number of Judges, and to the cost of appointing any additional Judge. But it must be remembered that if the number of Judges is not sufficient for the work to be done, litigants are put to a great deal of expense, and the ends of justice are often defeated. Where the Judges are too few, it sometimes happens that witnesses are kept in waiting for a week, and even for two or three weeks, at immense expense to the parties to the suit. Such a state of things justifies an increase in the cost of administration. If we do not grant jurisdiction to the District Courts and to the Supreme Courts, we must appoint more than five Judges to the Federal Bench. How could five men do the judicial work for all Australia, when it takes seven men to get through the judicial work arising in the higher courts of New South Wales? If the Bill is passed as it stands, within a year the Ministry will have to bring in another measure to provide for the appointment of another five Judges, and we shall be bound to agree to it. No other course would be open to us, since it would be absolutely necessary, in order to give justice to the people, to make the sittings of the Court more frequent, and to enable its Judges to visit more places than five Judges could visit. But the Government do not propose to give Federal jurisdiction in civil proceedings to the States Courts. The Government allow the States Courts to have Federal jurisdiction in criminal matters in which the liberties of the people are affected, but they refuse to grant them jurisdiction in civil cases. I understand the difficulty of their position. They say—"If we gave the States Courts Federal jurisdiction in civil matters there would be appeals from them to the Privy Council, and we want, so far as we can, to stop the practice of appealing to the Privy Council." But the proper way to do that is to obtain an amendment of the Constitution. I have not the slightest doubt that if the people voted for such an amendment it would not be difficult to obtain the consent of the Imperial Parliament. We should not attempt to bring about that result by a side wind, but we should be straightforward and clear, and let every one know exactly what our object is. If we confer only appellate jurisdiction upon the High Court, and give various other courts original jurisdiction, as I submit we must, the Appellate Court may be passed by. Judging from the example of America, there would not be more than two appeals upon constitutional questions every year. It may be that honorable members think we ought to create the court even to deal with these questions, but if so, let it be a Bench of three Judges only. If, on the other hand, the High Court is to have original jurisdiction, and is to have exclusive power of dealing with all claims against the Commonwealth, the most serious delays will take place, and the people will be deprived of reasonable opportunities of obtaining justice. Trifling claims brought against the Postmaster-General or some other representative of the Commonwealth, involving £2 or £3 for wages, may have to be decided in the High Court. The result of this will be that as the High Court cannot sit in any given place more than probably once in twelve months, persons having perfectly good claims against the Commonwealth may have to wait for six months or more before they can obtain the hearing of their suit. Of course, it will be argued that provision will be made for that, and that the necessities of the case will be met by the Claims Against the Commonwealth Act. But I submit that if the Bill is passed as it stands the States Courts vested with Federal jurisdiction will refuse to exercise their powers. The Bill confers certain rights of removal from States Courts to the Federal High Court, and the former tribunals will naturally be indisposed to deal with cases which may be removed from their control, perhaps just when they are about to give a decision.

are told that the expense of maintaining the High Court will not exceed from £000 to £30,000 a year. If it were not for me that the establishment of the Court was necessary, I should not hesitate to expend that sum, or even twice that amount, because I realize that we must not neglect the cost of administering justice. I do not, however, place any reliance upon the estimate of the Attorney-General. We do not have five Judges, whose salaries, together with those of their associates, will represent a total of about £18,000 per annum. Besides this we shall have to provide the ordinary paraphernalia of courts, which cannot be altogether dispensed with. I could ask how this estimate can be justified, but it is considered that the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of New South Wales total £19,000 per annum, and £60,000 in addition is required to meet other expenses connected with the maintenance of the court.

Mr. PAGE.—The Attorney-General told me that the States officials would be used for the High Court.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes, no doubt; but we can only be relied upon to a certain extent. No provision has been made for juries or for the interest on the cost of proceedings in which the courts are to sit; and it is manifestly absurd to suppose that all the incidental expenses other than those incurred in paying the Judges and their associates will be met by the Attorney-General's estimate. The Judges of the High Court will have to do infinitely more travelling than any Judges connected with the States Supreme Courts, and, further, they will be subject to all the disadvantages arising from having no settled seats, such as exist in the States. How can it, therefore, be assumed that the expenses will be kept down to such a low level as is represented by the Attorney-General's estimate? Does the honorable learned member mean to assert that if here the Attorney-General of New South Wales were to-morrow, he could reduce the expenses of the Supreme Court by something like £45,000 per annum? I venture to say he would not attempt anything of the kind.

Not one farthing has been allowed for the expenses connected with juries, and it is to be supposed that the Judges are to carry on their work unless they have a library provided for them? I do not believe that five Judges will be anything more than enough to bring justice within reach of the people, and if the Bill is read a second time, I shall certainly—unless the Court is made merely appellate—propose the appointment of five additional Judges in order to increase the strength of the Bench, and allow of a much more satisfactory itinerary than can be supplied by a Bench such as is proposed.

Mr. PAGE.—Will the honorable and learned member favour the elevation of laymen to the Bench?

Mr. CONROY.—If the honorable member could show me that laymen would administer justice in such a way that litigants would not be involved in still greater expense than at present, I should willingly support the appointment of laymen to the Bench. Sensible laymen, however, know that owing to their being unacquainted with the law, they might not be able to administer justice with much success, and therefore they refuse to rush in where angels fear to tread.

Mr. PAGE.—Common sense is not always law.

Mr. CONROY.—The law ought to be common sense, and it is only when there is a departure from common sense on the part of the Legislature that the law fails to reflect that quality. The laws cannot be any better than the sense of those who frame them. In support of my remarks with reference to the unreliability of the estimate of cost furnished by the Attorney-General, I need only point out that there are 590 clauses in the High Court Procedure Bill. This should give honorable members some idea of the complicated machinery which will be brought into existence when the Bill now before us and the measure to which I have just referred are passed. If we confer original jurisdiction upon the High Court, we must take care to appoint a sufficient number of Judges to go through the country and deal without undue delay with all matters which require to be brought before them. If we make it a purely appellate court we are met with the consideration that as appeals can be taken direct from the States Supreme Courts to the Privy Council, there may be little or nothing for the High Court to do. If we confer original jurisdiction upon it the five Judges will not be sufficiently numerous, and the expenses will probably reach £80,000 or £100,000 per annum. Even in New South Wales the expense incurred in providing the paraphernalia of the Supreme Court is very great.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We intend to have a court without paraphernalia.

Mr. CONROY.—The Ministry are perfectly aware that if all the offices which will have to be constituted under this Bill were enumerated the people of Australia would stand aghast. They would be heard crying out—"We want something which will bring justice within the reach of all in the most inexpensive manner possible." If army after army of lawyers is to be fastened upon the community, where shall we end? I could not help being impressed by the speech of the honorable member for West Sydney, who, despite the great disadvantages under which he labours, has for several years past studied the great principles of law in order to better qualify him for the work of legislation. Yet in spite of his natural predilection as a lawyer he appealed to all those possessed of democratic tendencies to vote against this Bill. The responsibility, therefore, which rests upon those honorable members who pride themselves upon representing only a class—

Mr. PAGE.—Who pride themselves upon what?

Mr. CONROY.—I repeat that the responsibility resting upon the representatives of a great class of the people is a very serious one. I shall be very much staggered indeed if, in the face of the opinions expressed by the honorable member for West Sydney, his serious judgment upon this matter is set aside by members of the party with which he is associated. I would further point out that apart from the members of the Ministry, more than three-fourths of the lawyers in this House have spoken against the measure as an entirely unnecessary one. I submit that the expense contemplated under it is altogether concealed from the people.

Mr. PAGE.—What causes all the lawyers to be against it?

Mr. CONROY.—For once we are alive to the necessities of the people, and we regret that some honorable members who fought with us against the Bonus Bill are entirely opposed to us upon a question of this sort.

Mr. TUDOR.—Is this a Bonus Bill?

Mr. CONROY.—It is a Bonus Bill for lawyers. If the measure passes, the honorable member has described it in exact terms. It is against that bonus that I protest. It is not my intention to labour this matter further. I merely ask honorable members to recognise that if we agree to the second reading of the Bill it will practically be beyond our power to remodel it. I have no hesitation in declaring that if two or three short clauses had been inserted in the Claims Against the Commonwealth Act when that measure was before Parliament last session, all that is required in the way of providing a proper tribunal, to which the humblest citizen could appeal, would have been accomplished. Holding these views, I must necessarily vote against the second reading of the measure, and in Committee I shall endeavour to have it shorn of its most objectionable provisions.

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—Had it been possible for us to go to a division last night, so anxious am I to see the business of the session proceed that I should have foregone my right of speech upon this question. But as I hope we shall come to a division to-day, seeing that the opportunity of yesterday was lost, I feel that I am called upon to say something regarding this Bill, but not to deal with mere details. I hope to establish what I have to say on this question upon the old and well-sanctioned principle that the second reading of a Bill depends upon the principles contained in it, and that the details may be left to the Committee stage. What, therefore, to my mind is vital to this Bill, and to my support of its clauses, I shall leave to the Committee stage. Whilst my remarks may not be very brief, I shall, by adopting this method, be enabled to curtail them somewhat. I hope to establish four propositions which I mean to set up. One of these is that a High Court, not only to interpret but to guard the Constitution, is a necessary element in any Federal Constitution. The next is that our Constitution contains a mandate for the erection of a High Court as soon as parliamentary exigencies allow. My third proposition is that this mandate will not be fulfilled by any of the suggestions put forward; and my fourth, that, apart from the constitutional aspect, the court is now and will become more and more a practical necessity. As to the first proposition, I hold that the position in a Federal State is altogether different from that in a unitary State, or in a State not of the Federal character. The great principles of the Federal form of government are two in number. The first is the supremacy of the Constitution—a principle which may exist elsewhere, but which in Constitutions more upon the British form depends upon the enactments or declarations of a sovereign Legislature, whilst in written Constitutions, especially of a Federal character, it is necessary that every piece of legislation should be within the limits which the people have set for themselves in the Constitution which they have adopted. The supremacy of the Constitution is, then, the first matter. The next is that the Constitution shall distribute between bodies with limited and co-ordinate authority, such as the Federal and States Governments, the whole of the powers of government. How are these principles to be maintained? They can be maintained in only one way—that adopted by the Americans in framing their Constitution. They can be maintained only by the establishment of a court which derives its authority from the Constitution itself, which can prevent action by any of the constituent bodies of the Federal system involving a breach of the Constitution, or trenching upon the powers accorded by that Constitution. That is to say, that the first function of a High Court, such as it is proposed to establish under this Bill, is to maintain intact the principles which underlie the Federal system. This is admitted by every federalist writer with whom I am acquainted, and is proved by the whole experience of the United States. But it is said that the case of America provides for us no analogy—that we have a Privy Council to which we can appeal to interpret and guard our Federal Constitution. It is true that we have a Privy Council to which we can go in certain cases; but that is an argument, I venture to say, which should not be used by any one who has regard for the self-governing powers of Australia. The Constitution was intended to extend those powers. In support of that proposition I will quote from the report of the proceedings of the Convention which sat at Adelaide—the first of a series of three Conventions which formulated the Constitution. The work which was done by that Convention then, so far as it relates to the Judiciary, stands almost letter for letter with the Constitution of to-day, except in respect of section 74, which deals with the relations of the High Court to the Privy Council. What were the objects expressed in the Constitution which the Convention hoped to adopt?

At the request of that Convention on the 23rd March, 1897, I brought down certain resolutions, setting forth the grounds upon which it was considered desirable to create a Federal Government, and those resolutions were unanimously adopted. The first of the purposes declared in them was that in order to “enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia,” a Federal Government should be created to “exercise authority throughout the federated colonies,” subject to certain principal conditions which were therein laid down. The resolutions provided that—

Subject to the carrying out of these and such other conditions as may be hereafter deemed necessary, this Convention approves of the framing of a Federal Constitution for the establishment of three things—a Parliament, an Executive, and a Federal Supreme Court, which should also be “a High Court of Appeal for each colony in the Federation.” There was laid down the necessity which exists under any Federal Constitution for the three branches that one naturally associates with the very idea of a federation: an Executive, a Parliament, and a Judiciary—a Judiciary not confined to the ordinary work of an appeal court, but one which was described in the resolution as a “Federal Supreme Court,” which, in addition to discharging those functions which generally appertain to an appeal court, should also be the guardian and the arbiter of the Constitution. In order to strengthen the argument put forward by the honorable and learned member for Indi in the masterly speech which he delivered last night, let us see whether it was intended at the beginning to establish a High Court as an integral part of the Constitution rather than as an institution which might be blown up or down at the mere caprice of any Parliament. What was it that we were to establish under these resolutions? What was it that the Convention, consisting of representatives elected in equal numbers from each State without any plural voting, determined should be created? It was to be a Federal Constitution which “shall” establish a Parliament, an Executive, and a Supreme Federal Court. The Constitution was to establish the High Court, and, as pointed out so well by the honorable and learned member for Indi, that court was to be regarded, not only as an institution for the creation of which there was a mandate, but as an institution which was, as far as possible, to be an element and a factor in the Constitution itself. It was not to be a thing to be created according to the whim of any party, or even according to the number of cases that might be expected to come before it. It was to be a part of a Constitution which, without it, would not be the Constitution intended. I contend, therefore, that the argument with regard to the Privy Council is not one to be used by an Australian who has regard for the enlargement of our self-governing powers, because it was declared, not only by the Convention, but subsequently by the whole of the people of this country, that a Constitution fulfilling and carrying out the principles embodied in these resolutions was the Constitution they desired. The Constitution was designed to extend these self-governing powers, and to possess this element, without which it would not have been complete. To that end the resolutions provided that there should be this Parliament, this Executive, and this Supreme Court. It is true that we can appeal to the Privy Council to interpret our Constitution. This Constitution, however, was intended to be, in its very essence, a complete grant of self-governing rights, and yet it is suggested that we should leave one of the most important branches of self-government to the Privy Council, which, however respectable—and I use that term with all respect—is still outside that instrument. I do not propose to say anything that would defame the Judges of any existing Court of Australia, or the men of great learning and eminence who constitute the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But what was it that was provided in the Constitution as framed by a Convention of elected representatives of the people—elected for that one work alone—and indorsed by the people themselves at the referendum? This was the original clause 74—

No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council in any matter involving the interpretation of this Constitution, or of the Constitution of a State, unless the public interests of some part of Her Majesty's dominions, other than the Commonwealth or a State, are involved.

That is what the people desired.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But they did not secure it.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—They did not obtain all that they wanted. The clause continued—

Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen

may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal Prerogative to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. But the Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked.

It is true, as the honorable member for Moira has said, that we did not obtain all that we desired. But it is in this respect alone that we did not. We may take it that practically the decision carried into statutory effect by the British Parliament gave all else that we demanded, and it was a great and magnificent indorsement of the demand made by the people of this country for their own Constitution. But if we did not obtain all that we asked, which is unfortunately true, that is surely the worst of all reasons to be urged as showing that we should not make the best use of that which we have? That is the position set up. It is argued that because the people of Australia demanded to be made the expositors of their own Constitution through their own Judges—subject only to cases in which public interests in other parts of the Empire were involved—and did not secure all that they asked, that, therefore, so much as is now granted should not be exercised. It is urged that because the Constitution has one of its members maimed to a certain extent, even that injured arm should not be exercised. What logical reason can there be for such a suggestion?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Did not the delegation make an amendment?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The Imperial Parliament amended the Constitution. The delegation which went to England to expedite the passage of the Constitution through the Imperial Parliament consisted of five of the original members of this Government, and we took all that we could get.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What about patching up the injured arm? Could not the people amend the Constitution if they so desired?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I shall come presently to the question of restoring that arm of the Constitution. The five members of the delegation happened to be members of this Government as originally formed, but one of them, unhappily, is now deceased. That delegation was sent to London to work, if possible, for the passing into law word by word, and letter by letter, of the Constitution which the people of this

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Unless there is a constitutional amendment at some future time, the appeals will be limited as they are in this section, with the further condition, which I have just added, that laws passed by this Parliament to limit the matters in which special leave to appeal may be asked, shall be reserved for the pleasure of the King. That is the difference between the original clause and the section as it now stands, between the clause which received the sanction of the Australian people in every State and the provision which, at peril of the more drastic amendment of the Bill, had to be accepted before the measure could pass the Parliament of the United Kingdom. I admit that in my judgment even that alteration should not have been made. In the relations which exist between us and the United Kingdom, happy and permanent as I hope they may be, it would have been better if we had had conceded to us all that we asked—the right to decide these cases for ourselves, and to say what our Constitution meant, however the matter arose, so long as we did not interfere with the public interests of other parts of the Empire. I was of the opinion, and so were my colleagues, that the phrase, “people of other parts of the Empire,” was sufficiently intelligible and definite. That, however, was not the opinion which prevailed at Westminster, and the result was that the further definition which exists in the Constitution was imposed. We reluctantly accepted that amendment, but we experienced keen joy in the knowledge that we were able to leave the scene of our labour with the assurance that the seal which would make it permanent law would be placed upon the Constitution which our people had adopted. If the original position which we went home to defend in respect of this matter is a good one, there is no one who thinks so who should not help us to take all the advantage we can of what is left to us of the position. I think that, that is the attitude which must be taken, except by those who think that what is left in the Constitution is not sufficient for the foundation of a High Court of wide jurisdiction, and entitled to the respect of Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—There is practically very little withheld from the court.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The diminution of its powers—which, as I have said, was not what I wanted to see—still leaves it a high and competent tribunal, a court whose decisions on certain constitutional questions cannot be controverted by any other judiciary, except at its own will, and which must therefore be effective as the actual balance of the Federal Constitution. To confine that Court to appellate jurisdiction would be one of the worst sins we could commit against the desire of the people who framed it, because their intention evidently was that the Constitution should be complete in all its aspects. While they were not called upon to vote on a third referendum in order that they might express an opinion upon the alterations in the 74th clause, I take it that the alteration was made practically by the common consent of the Imperial Parliament and the people of Australia. Although the two parties held a diverse opinion upon the question at issue, it was not thought sufficient to require the taking of a third referendum. That being so, it may fairly be argued that the alteration did not, in the opinion of our people, take away from the High Court the standing and value, as an essential factor in the Constitution, which they themselves wanted to give it. The alteration might make the Court less valuable, but it did not entirely remove its value. So after our determinations at Adelaide, after our labours during the various sessions of the Convention, and after the popular indorsement of our work, it may be taken that the Constitution was pared down in the particulars to which I have referred with the consent of the people. But I decline to listen to any one who says that, so far as the just attributes of the Court are maintained in the Constitution, the people do not wish it to continue. This is the first time that it can be said, with a sense of pride and glory, that the founders of the Constitution are the people. Even the Constitution of the United States of America received no final popular indorsement. Ours is the only case in which such an indorsement was given. We cannot get away from the position that a Constitution without such a High Court as is not only asked for, but ordered, would not be the same as the Constitution which we now have, and would be a different instrument to work under from that which the people designed. That is the position which I wish to take up. It is no doubt a high one, but it is justified in reason and by our sense of responsibility to the people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—An absolutely technical point.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—My position is in no sense absolutely technical, unless I am to be told that to insist upon carrying out that which the people for the first time in history have had an opportunity to order is a technical position. To my mind if there is a broad reason for taking up the position which we have taken up in introducing the Bill, it is that a High Court is part of the Constitution as designed by the people. It is, therefore, a matter in regard to which we should not refine and quibble. We should not say, "Wait until another day," or complain that the establishment of a High Court will cost too much—supposing the proposed cost to be fair and reasonable. What we should say is that this is what we were told to do, and that there shall be no unnecessary delay in doing it. It has been argued that, owing to the form in which the Constitution now stands, the High Court will not be its guardian and interpreter; but I venture to say that that will not be found to be so. The safeguards provided in the 74th section will enable the High Court to give such decisions in interpreting the Constitution as will be the just and, in almost every case, the final arbitrament of disputes between State and State, or between State and Commonwealth. If it is found that it is not so much the effective guardian and arbiter as we hope, what is the duty of Australians? To decline the court, or to sweep it away? No; to exercise the powers which the Constitution gives us. It is our duty to use those powers in amending the Constitution so that, without any authority withstanding us, we shall be able to give the High Court the whole of its attributes, and thus dispose of the arguments of those who say that because it is not big enough it ought not to be established. In any case, under section 74 we have the power to limit appeals, and there is nothing to prevent us from exercising that power at any time. So much for the position which I venture to submit, that the High Court is a necessary element of the Constitution for the purpose of interpreting and guarding its provisions. I come now to the next question, which has been much debated, and that is whether the Constitution contains a mandate for the creation of the High Court. That proposition I venture to affirm. Moreover, I say that the mandate has peculiar force, from the fact that the Constitution has come direct from the people.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—There is no mandate as to the time.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I shall deal with the question of time later on. In interpreting the Constitution, as we have to do for ourselves to-night, to determine whether the High Court is necessary, and whether the creation of it is a duty imposed upon us by the Constitution, we must take not only the lawyer's view, to be arrived at by the construction which is to be extracted from the meaning of the words used, but a broader view—perhaps a broader view than a Judge upon the Bench would be empowered to take. That view springs from this consideration: Take the Constitutions of the States. They are in one sense like ours, inasmuch as they have been sanctioned by Acts of the Imperial Parliament. In the case of the Canadian Constitution there is the same similarity. Acts of the Imperial Parliament were necessary to give all these Constitutions the force of law. But let us now look at the point of difference. Was the Convention which framed the resolutions—because there was no Bill until those resolutions reached England—upon which the Canadian Constitution was founded, elected by popular vote? In no sense. Was the framing of the Constitution of any one of the States the act of a convention of representatives chosen by popular election? In no sense, and in no case. Was the indorsement of the people given to the Constitutions of either Canada or of any of the Australian States? Not in any instance; nor, as the Attorney-General reminds me, was such an indorsement given in the case of the Constitution of the United States. But in regard to the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, not only did every elector record his vote for or against its acceptance, but he voted with a printed copy of it in his hands. No man went to the polls in any of the States to vote on that question without having had an opportunity to read the very words of the Constitution, which had been framed by those whom he had himself elected. Therefore, there is a great difference in origin between our Constitution and every other Constitution that we know of, since in our case an educated people, knowing what it provided, and without doubt as to its meaning, voted for its acceptance. Never was a Constitution approved of which more clearly expressed its intention in its words. There are difficulties in the interpretation of other Constitutions, and there always will be difficulties which will invoke the wisdom and learning of our Courts of Justice, but anything plainer than our own Constitution was never placed in the hands of the electors. Now, let us reflect upon the position we occupy in considering anything that may be construed as a mandate, if it be one, which comes from those who appointed the men to draft it, and afterwards took it in their own hands and learnt to understand it, and then approved of it. Surely we cannot compare that case, so far as the origin and meaning of the words is concerned, with the ordinary conditions in which a Constitution is merely framed as an Act of Parliament. All the elements are different. In how many cases is Parliament elected for one purpose only? I defy any honorable member to direct attention to any such instance. But the Convention at which the Constitution was adopted was elected for one purpose only. Parliament does not submit its constitutional work for popular approval; Parliament has not done so. But this Constitution was submitted to the approval of the same people who met and elected the members of the Convention by which it was adopted.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Parliaments are always amenable to popular opinion.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes; and I am sorry to have to say that there are a great many persons—not of course in this Parliament—who mistake newspaper articles for the expression of popular opinion. When we come to the question of the construction of this Constitution, must we not bear in mind the facts relating to its origin and the meaning of those who indorsed it? Coming to the Constitution itself, I can, with the greatest confidence, indorse the construction placed by the honorable and learned member for Indi upon section 71. Those who, like many of us on the Ministerial benches, went through all the strife and the turmoil attendant upon the making of that Constitution—through the many sittings of the Convention, through the two referenda, and finally through the work of endeavouring to obtain the entire acceptance of the Constitution in the United Kingdom—can, without arrogance, and without any feeling but that of humility, claim that being so intimately acquainted with the conditions under which the instrument was framed, they are entitled to speak as to the words used to convey the intentions of the framers. What could be more plain than this?

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia.

That is certain, but what follows is not certain.

And in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with Federal jurisdiction.

Without relying too much on the word "and," which is significant in this connexion, it is certain that the creation of the Federal Supreme Court is imperative whilst the addition to the Federal High Court of other Federal Courts or Courts of Federal Jurisdiction is made, in the terms of the Act, discretionary with the Federal Parliament. We have therefore a distinction between the imperative mandate regarding the Federal Supreme Court and the discretionary power with reference to other Courts.

Mr. THOMSON.—Is anything said as to the order in which the Courts shall be established?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I shall deal with that point presently. It is true, as is argued by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, that this mandate cannot be enforced by injunction, but should that consideration weigh with statesmen or with this Chamber? Is there no debt of honour in statecraft? Are there no duties except legal duties? Is a Member of Parliament to say that he stands as a member of a body which will not do its duty because there is no court above it to issue an injunction compelling it? Is there not a moral responsibility as well as a legal responsibility? If there is no tribunal above us—and we cannot be enjoined by a High Court which is not created—to make us do our duty, are we relieved of it? The question has been raised as to whether this mandate has to be carried out at any particular time or not. The honorable and learned member for Indi quoted from the report of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Martin v. Hunter. His quotation was a most valuable one, and is to be found in Quick and Garran's Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. There are some further words in that very judgment which seem to be so interesting, and to apply so directly to the matter now before us, that I shall take the opportunity to quote them now. Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the judgment, is an eminent jurist, and has written a collection of legal treatises perhaps not surpassed by the work of any other jurist in the world. I ask honorable members to consider the words which I am about to quote, because they are not contained in the argument of an advocate, or even in the argument of a politician standing here in support of or in opposition to a measure, but are the calm words of judicial interpretation. Mr. Justice Story says—

The same expression—"shall be vested"—occurs in other parts of the Constitution, in defining the powers of the other co-ordinate branches of the Government. The first article declares that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States."

And this has an important bearing upon the meaning of the words "shall be vested."

Will it be contended that the legislative power is not absolutely vested; that the words merely refer to some future act, and mean only that the legislative power may hereafter be vested? The second article declares that "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." Could Congress vest it in any other person; or is it to await their good pleasure, whether it is to vest at all? It is apparent that such a construction, in either case, would be utterly inadmissible. Why, then, is it entitled to a better support in reference to the judicial department?

These are clear words, fair and conclusive as a matter of argument, but what do they lead to? They are an express denial of the statement that the mandate in the Constitution is one that can be paltered and trifled with, and that it was intended that the Constitution should be maimed in one of its arms at the will of Parliament. It is in controlling transgressions beyond the Constitution, either by this Parliament or by the Parliaments of the States, that the work of the High Court will in a large measure lie. Clashes between the authorities that are created will arise as often as weak humanity overrides its powers, either in the Federal or in the States Parliaments. In the heat of debate, and in the turmoil of party, excesses of power will inevitably be committed, as they have been committed in the United States. We want a tribunal composed of men who understand the people, who live amongst them, who understand the history of and the reasons for our Constitution, and who are not dependent for their knowledge upon casual readings. We require a judicial body which will be able to tell us what our Constitution means, and whether those outside the calm and judicial arena, who have passed laws, have exceeded their powers or have remained within them. How can we have this unless we provide for the establishment of the third arm of the Constitution? It is said that the Constitution does not specify the time within which the High Court is to be created.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BARTON.—I am happy to hear any remark from my right honorable friend, but I recollect that one of the chief arguments of his right honorable leader, in his recent indictment against the Government, was that the High Court should have been provided for at the outset of our Federal career, and that the Government was to blame for not having constituted it long ago. I suppose that where doctors disagree the patient may be expected to die.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Every one on the Government side of the House is now supporting the leader of the Opposition.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Every one on this side of the Chamber is supporting the leader of this side and his colleague, who is responsible for the introduction of the Bill. I venture to say that the Constitution does not specify a time within which the High Court shall be created, because the words relating to it are of an immediately imperative character; it was regarded by the framers of the Constitution as beyond doubt that the courts would be established as soon, at any rate, as parliamentary exigencies permitted. What I mean by parliamentary exigencies are the exigencies of parliamentary business. I do not forget that the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, in one of his speeches in connexion with this very matter, pointed out the limitation of two years in regard to the passing of the Tariff. The honorable and learned member advocated a make-shift amendment of the Judiciary Bill of last session, because he said the time of Parliament would be taken up for the first two years in framing the Tariff. That is what happened. The greater part of two years was taken up in passing the Tariff, and anxious as we were to pass the Judiciary Bill, the opposition to it in those days was greater than it is now. Experience has since shown the necessity of the Court, and the delay has given us greater assurance of the attainment of our object.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Could not the Government have succeeded in passing the Bill through last year?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—It would have been harder to pass it through last session than it will prove now. If honorable members believe that it would have been more difficult last session than at the present to pass the Bill, they must give us credit for having exercised good judgment in not pressing it on a former occasion. I believe that the sense of the people has been awakened to the necessity for the establishment of the Court to a much greater degree than was the case when the Bill was previously before us.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—What about the exigencies of finance?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I have been speaking of parliamentary exigencies, and I am going to establish my proposition. My right honorable friend is so eager, in his youthful impetuosity, that he will not allow an argument to be carried to its proper conclusion. The only delay that can find any sanction under the terms of the Constitution is that which must necessarily arise out of the facts of the case. Before there could be a Parliament—and it is admitted that the institution of the Parliament was an urgent and prime work, to be performed without unnecessary delay—there must be an Executive. The Executive is founded on equally imperative words—words which in themselves vest the executive powers of the Commonwealth in the Governor-General and the Executive Council. Their intervention was necessary before Parliament could be elected or summoned, and, therefore, the words of the section must be read in the light of necessity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They should be read in the light of common sense.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I am reading them in the light of common sense. The Executive must precede the Parliament, because, without an Executive, there could be no Parliament. Then Parliament came under the mandate that it must be elected within six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth. I admit that this mandate contains a condition as to time which was not inserted until the second session of the Convention. Then we find that the Judiciary is provided for.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Without any limit as to time.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There was no time limit with regard to the creation of the Executive, but the necessity of the occasion required that they should be at once summoned. There need not have been any time limit imposed with regard to Parliament, because a Parliament whose election had been unnecessarily postponed would have wreaked summary vengeance upon the Executive which postponed it. The provision could not be made for the establishment of the High Court before the election of Parliament, because the fixing of its component parts must necessarily be a matter for the Legislature. Does the fact that the mandate of the Constitution had regard to the inherent necessities of the case, and did not impose any limit as to time, afford justification for the indefinite postponement of the establishment of the Federal Judiciary? The Executive first, the Parliament second, and the High Court third, is the natural and necessary order. No delay beyond this necessary sequence was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. The whole argument for delay, I venture to say, is an afterthought, because throughout the Convention debates, and the hundreds of meetings which preceded the taking of each referendum, there was no attempt made by any one taking a prominent part in them, as, in any sense, a leader of the people, to postpone the creation of the High Court—no thought of relegating it to any position inferior to that of one of the three co-ordinate arms of the Constitution, without the full existence of which that instrument of Government must be more or less maimed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Are not two arms sufficient for any one?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No; I do not think so. They are certainly not enough for a monkey. The honorable member has forgotten the quadrupeds in the animal kingdom. I have referred to the natural and necessary order, and no delay was contemplated for a moment. The question was put before the electors prior to the referendum being taken. The matter was so much in the minds of the people that, whilst the Convention was sitting, an estimate was made of the cost of establishing this tribunal. That cost was set down at £23,700. The whole question was thoroughly thrashed out in the various debates. With what result? This brings me to my next proposition, that the mandate of the Constitution will not be fulfilled by any of the suggestions that have been made. But before dealing with that matter I wish to refer to this portion of the Constitution. Section 75 prescribes that the High Court shall have original jurisdiction—

In all matters—

1. Arising under any treaty.
2. Affecting Consuls or other representatives of other countries.
3. In which the Commonwealth or a person suing, or being sued, on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party.
4. Between States, or between residents of different States, or between a State and a resident of another State.
5. In which a writ of mandamus, or prohibition, or injunction, is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth.

In one of the cases in which a writ of mandamus was sought, the Full Court of one State has decided that it cannot issue such a writ, and that no tribunal save the High Court can.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Government could give them the necessary power if they wished.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We could, if we chose to make the courts of all the States the arbiters of the Constitution. So much for the category of matters in which the High Court is to have original jurisdiction. If it is conceded that it is imperative that that tribunal shall be endowed with such jurisdiction, what an extraordinary position it is to argue that its creation is not equally imperative? I come now to the proposition that the mandate of the Constitution will not be fulfilled by any of the suggestions which have been made. I wish, first, to refer to the suggestion of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. I find that in the Adelaide Convention this question was raised during the debate upon certain resolutions, a portion of which I have read. Without wearying honorable members upon this subject, I think I may quote a few words which I ventured to use on that occasion, in respect of the suggestion which has been made that the Court should consist of the Chief Justices of the several States. They are as follow :—

I should like to make a short reference to one argument that has been used with regard to the Federal Judiciary. It has been suggested that the Federal Judicature should consist of the Chief Justices of the various colonies. I beg to say that so far as I am advised, I entirely dissent from that proposal. I think that that would be a provision which would make totally against the value of the Federal Judiciary for the work which it has to perform. One of the smallest objections is that in these colonies—if they are there anywhere it is not a provision of law—the strong feeling prevails that no Judge should sit on appeal from his own decision, and it is a very plain provision in New South Wales.

Mr. PEACOCK.—And in Victoria.

Mr. BARTON.—I am glad to hear that, because I had a strong suspicion that it was so. Whether or not, it is in all the colonies a provision of law that no Judge shall sit on appeal from his own decision, it ought very speedily, under the powers given by the Constitution, to be a provision of law for the Commonwealth, and if it once becomes so I should like to know what capacity, what adequacy, for this work will be left amongst the half-dozen Chief Justices who will at their sittings have to decide on appeals from half-a-dozen States.

It would be a case of alternately walking into the court and out of it. The report of my remarks upon this subject proceeds—

And when we bear in mind that in every appeal from a State the Chief Justice of that particular State must not take part in the hearing, there would be still less chance of forming a court that would be as acceptable or satisfactory as a Federal Court of final appeal.

If it is contended that the Federal High Court will not possess any more knowledge of the laws of the individual States than does the Privy Council—and that has been contended during the course of this debate—we are placed in this position : if we enact that the Chief Justices of the States shall be the components of the High Court and that none of them shall sit in appeal from his own decision, we shall find—seeing that all the Chief Justices are parties to the principal decisions of the States Supreme Courts—that in the very instances in which an acquaintance with the laws of a particular State is required to arm the High Court with the necessary knowledge, the man who could best furnish it will be ineligible to sit upon the Bench. I went on to say—

There is another strong objection. If this is to be a Federal Court it must not spring from any provincial origin. If the object of the court is Federal, and if it is to be made an arbiter between State and State and between State and Commonwealth, if it is right that it should be a Federal instrument—and clearly it must be so, because it is one of the essentials of a Federal Constitution—well, then it must be equally clear that it must not owe its origin to provincial appointments.

Later on I said—

If such a provision were carried into effect the Federal Executive would not have a chance of deliberating upon the question, but must take the Judge provided, even though the results attending his appointment were not such as were expected.

So that if the proposals submitted by the honorable member for South Australia had been carried the Federal Executive, which ought to have the responsibility of making the very best choice of Judges for this Court, and who should suffer if its responsibility is not honestly exercised, would be freed from that responsibility, and Judges, because they were the States Chief Justices, without reference to the question of whether or not they were uniformly successful as Judges, would be placed upon the Bench to determine Federal affairs. That would be about as unconstitutional an anomaly as could possibly be created—unconstitutional, not only in the sense that it is a breach of this written Constitution, but in the sense that it is opposed to every known principle of British constitutional law. I was going to say that that proposal got no further than the end of that debate, but I find that it did, as was mentioned by the honorable and learned member for Indi last night. On page 265 of the record of the proceedings of the Convention in Melbourne, I find that, under the name of the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, there is an amendment, which reads—

The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and, until Parliament otherwise provides—

That, it will be seen, is merely a temporary provision—

—the Chief Justices of the States. In the case of the illness or death of the Chief Justice, the powers of the Supreme Court may be exercised by the other Justices, being not less than three.

In the speech delivered by my honorable friend upon that occasion, he said—

It is extremely probable that during the first two years of the Federal Parliament legislation will be confined to such a question as the arrangement of uniform customs duties.

That proposal was opposed by various members of the Convention, and a concise statement of the points in opposition to it was made by a very able member in the person of Senator Symon, who used these words—

I think honorable members will agree with me that a more nondescript tribunal could not very well be constituted than that which he proposes. He wants to strike out all the words after "and" in the fifth line, and to add "until Parliament otherwise provides the Chief Justices of the different States in the Federation." The effect of that would be that we should have a Federal Chief Justice, and that the Chief Justice in each separate State would become, immediately he crossed the border of his own State into Federal territory, a puisne Judge of the higher Court. We should then have this extraordinary sort of alla podrida, a Federal Chief Justice owing his position, his emoluments, and his Judicial allegiance to the Federal Parliament, and four puisne Judges in one sense under him who are Chief Justices in their own Court, and who owe their Judicial allegiance and their emoluments to the separate States.

After replying to an interjection by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, the speaker proceeded:

But then as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) interposed a moment ago, with an exceedingly pregnant suggestion, they will all owe their tenure of office—not only their judicial allegiance and emoluments, but their tenure of office—to the State. Then see what an extraordinary position these Judges would occupy in a High Court so constituted. I could understand the suggestion although I think it would not be one which would meet with the approval of any reflecting man, that the Judges of the different State Courts or a selection of them, should constitute the High Court of Justice; but to say that you should have a Federal Chief Justice appointed by the Federal authority, and as I say, owing undivided allegiance, if I may use such an expression in relation to Judicial affairs, to the national Government in its highest sense, is a position of matters which I am sure could not possibly commend itself to any one. I certainly did not hear any argument that was at all convincing on the question of the desirability of making such a change as this, but my honorable friend must also have noticed that by so altering the clause you are limiting the choice of the Federal Executive in the selection of its Judges.

The remaining portion of the argument that I wish to cite reads thus:—

At any rate there is nothing to prevent the Federal Executive from having the benefit of the experience, the wisdom, and the learning of the existing occupants of the judgment seat in Australia if they so choose. But if you introduce this into the Constitution, you are limiting the power of selection by the Federal authority, limiting their choice, and binding them down to the selection of one Judge—the Chief Justice—from the whole of the judicial power of Australia, whether on the Bench or off it; and as to the other Judges—whether the number is two or four, is, as Mr. Barton said, a matter of minor importance—limiting their choice to the existing Benches. I think it cannot be too strongly emphasized that such a state of things would be extremely unsatisfactory.

The result of that debate was that the amendment submitted by Mr. Glynn was defeated by 29 votes to 9, and I find that amongst the majority was the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. To adopt the suggestion which has been brought forward during this discussion, would be to go back upon the decision of the Convention. That is not a task which this Parliament need hesitate to perform, if it is of opinion that the Convention was wrong. But it is in consequence of that decision that the constitution of the Court itself is in the form in which it is now presented to Parliament, and in the form laid down in the Constitution. The rejection of that amendment had this result; that not only did the honorable and learned member for South Australia fail to alter the text of the Constitution in the direction which he desired, but in that respect it remained in its original form, and in that form was adopted by the people. To adopt the suggestion which has now been put forward, would be not only to go back upon the decision of the Convention, which, in itself, might be a less important matter, but to deliberately set at naught the intention of the Constitution itself. Although it might not be technically unconstitutional, certainly it is morally so. I shall not travel over the ground which was traversed by the honorable and learned member for Indi in order to prove that such a proposal is unconstitutional in essence; but it is clear that unless the Chief Justices of the several States were removed altogether from the States Benches, they would occupy a dual position, and, irrespective of the volition of the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament, they would be entitled to sit on that Bench for life, apart from any question of misbehaviour, misconduct, or inability to do their work. It is about as unconstitutional a proposition as was ever brought forward even with the object of saving money. In addition to that, I venture to say that to give the powers of the Constitution, and those which in any event must be wielded under a High Court Bill, to gentlemen appointed under such circumstances would lead to consequences which could not be included in any description of a wielding of this Constitution as it was framed. In view of the immense importance of the functions of this Court, would it be right that it should be practically under the control of the States Executives? If the Judges who from time to time may be made Chief Justices by the Executives of the States are to be the constituents of this Court, it must be clear that it will be at the will of the States Executives that the Federal Court will be appointed. Did any one contemplate such a thing in setting up this Constitution? Was it contemplated by any one who voted for the creation of the Convention? Did any member of the Convention, or any one voting for the adoption of the Constitution, contemplate putting the powers of the High Court into the hands of any authority chosen by the Executives of the States and not by the Executive of the Commonwealth? If such a provision had been contained in the Constitution Bill, would it not have provoked an outcry? If it would have done so—and I believe that would have been the result—how can we adopt such a proposal now? This Court may, and probably will, have to decide upon the validity of Commonwealth legislation, and I wish to know whether the function of deciding upon the validity of the legislation of the Commonwealth is to be intrusted to a body appointed by the States Executives? Concede, if you like, that every State Judge we have ever had has been a model of fairness and impartiality—concede everything that you can for the sake of argument—but is it right that those who in the ultimate resort are responsible to States Parliaments that fix the terms of their selection, and who owe their position to the States Executives, should be placed on the judgment seat as the final judges of the validity of our legislation? The proposition has only to be stated in order to show that it is one which no well-balanced mind should accept.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Why not state the converse position? If States Judges are not fit to deal with Commonwealth laws, how can Commonwealth Judges be fit to deal with States laws?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The honorable and learned member has already defeated his own argument, because he has said that if a litigant does not desire to go to the High Court, he can go to the Privy Council. He has told us, further, that he would advise a litigant to do so, notwithstanding the vote which he gave in the Convention on the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is not an answer to my question.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I contend that it is. We expect consistency from those who put questions to us. It is clear, at any rate, that where the purpose of a Constitution is national, where its design is to perpetuate cohesion among States, any tendency, if there is a tendency, arising from the origin of appointments to the Bench so created, should be, if anything, a tendency in favour of the purpose of the Constitution, which is the preservation of the national element. We may say what we please as to all these converse responsibilities; as to the fitness of Judges of the Federal Court, and Judges of the States Courts, but we must face the one position, that we are here for the purpose of guarding and carrying out the Constitution of the Commonwealth—that we are to take that course which, at any rate, best secures its permanence and solidity.

Mr. WILKS.—Is there any danger?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—To provide against danger is the function of every sane, far-seeing legislator.

Mr. WILKS.—Is there any sign of danger?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not wish to discuss that point. There are always dangers in a Federal Constitution. It is not because they are free from danger, but because, in their balance, they provide a greater safety, that they are adopted. Every Constitution, whether Federal or not, must be full of dangers. The Federal Judges should do this work, not because they will be biased in favour of the Federation, but because, being responsible to the national Parliament, they will take the national view. This does not mean the obliteration of States rights, and, in touching upon that point, I wish to ask the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne to give me his special attention while I quote from an article written by an American Judge. In the March number of Scribner's Magazine, I find a valuable article by Mr. Justice Brewer, Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, dealing with that Court and its history, and I propose to quote shortly from it. It is a valuable article, but I can give only a little of it, and it is very pregnant in its application to this part of the argument which has been waged on both sides. He says, at page 275—

Its decisions—

That is, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—have always been in harmony with and sustaining the proposition that this Republic is a nation acting directly upon all its citizens with the attributes of authority of a nation, and not a mere league or confederacy of States. The importance of this cannot be over-estimated, and will be appreciated by all who compare the weakness of the old confederacy with the strength and vigour of the Republic under the present Constitution. A brief reference to some of these decisions is deserving.

I shall quote only a few of those references. Mr. Justice Brewer refers to the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, in which it was held that—

Congress may pass any Act which, not forbidden by the Constitution, is reasonably appropriate and helpful in carrying into execution the powers expressly conferred.

In Brown v. Maryland the Court ruled that—

The control of commerce with foreign nations was wholly in the general Government, and thus no State could directly or indirectly place any restrictions thereon, even to the extent of imposing a licence upon an importer for selling goods in the package in which they were imported.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, one of the leading cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, the decision was—

That the nation had supreme authority over all navigable waters of the Republic, and that no State could give exclusive rights to any such waters, although wholly within its territory.

In Ableman v. Booth it was decided that—

One in custody of the United States officers could not be discharged therefrom by process of a State Court; while in Martin v. Hunter, to which I have already made reference, it was held that—

A party to a litigation in a State Court denied a right claimed by him under the national Constitution could take his case from the State to the United States Supreme Court, and have his claim of right there determined.

Mr. Justice Brewer points out that—

These are merely illustrations. To them might be added many other cases of similar import, extending to the present day. The court has uniformly upheld the nationality of the Republic, and accorded to it all the rights which attend nationality.

In the light of our marvellous development and the wondrous growth of this Republic to the first place in the family of nations, one may well pause to consider what would have been our history if the decisions of the Supreme Court had been adverse to this rule of nationality. Suppose that the Court had held that, because the Constitution did not in terms grant the power to charter corporations, Congress could not charter a national bank, where would have been our great financial system? Suppose it had ruled that a State might impose a licence on every importer from foreign nations; that it had supreme authority over all the navigable waters within its limits; that its courts could take from the custody of the United States officials any person arrested for an alleged violation of Federal law, and that there was no power in the Supreme Court to review the judgments of State Courts adverse to rights claimed under the Federal Constitution (and the questions presented in these cases were, under the strict language of the Constitution, debatable), where would have been the vigour and strength which exist in our national government, and which have been among the strongest supports of national progress? Reflections such as these will give some idea of how much the Supreme Court has, by its decisions, affected the life of the Republic.

I crave attention to the remaining portion of this quotation—

It must not be supposed that, because it has constantly affirmed our nationality, the Court has been steadily undermining and destroying the legitimate power of the States. On the contrary, it has always ruled so as to uphold full governmental action on the part of the States unembarrassed by Federal power. Thus, it held that the nation could not levy an income tax on a salary paid by a State to its officials. (Collector v. Day, 11 Wall., 113.)

I do not quote that passage with relation to any present-day fact—

It has upheld the police power of the States in a multitude of instances. It affirmed the right of a State to grant special privileges, even when the grant resulted (as shown in the slaughter-house cases coming from Louisiana) in creating a burdensome monopoly.

It would be an easy and a pleasant task to point out how in many other ways the Court has, by its decisions, affected the life of the Republic, but the limits of my paper forbid. This must do for the past. As admitted by all careful students of history, the Supreme Court, whose organization and powers constitute the most striking and distinguishing feature of the Constitution, has been a most potent factor in shaping the course of national events. It stands to-day a quiet but confessedly mighty power, whose action all wait for, and whose decisions all abide. Turning to the future, every thoughtful man wonders what is coming to the Republic, and many inquire what the Supreme Court will do in shaping that future, and how its decisions may affect the national life.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does that quotation show that the High Court should be established at once?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—As I am reminded, those who are in a difficulty usually sit from point to point. I had not made up my mind to use this quotation because of the time that I knew I must necessarily take up in dealing with other phases of the question. It was really suggested to me by the action of my honorable and learned friend in challenging the question whether there ought not to be a national court with a tendency to the consolidation of the powers of the nation. It was in answer to that question, really, that

I quoted this extract; now he asks me something totally different.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The quotation shows that the Court should be appointed at once. It does so because it illustrates the fact that in every hour of its life the Supreme Court of the United States has been the necessary guardian of the Constitution of that union and the liberties of its people, protecting them against any encroachment, whether from outside or from a State within, that tended to endanger the national life of the community.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the right honorable gentleman say that a High Court could assume that function better than a State Court?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The quotation which I have just read is a sufficient warrant for me to contend, not only from the argument in the article in itself, but from the citations which it makes of decided cases, that there is a necessity for a tribunal which is in its essence national; and that tribunal can never be secured by resort to resources which are confessedly provincial.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable gentleman begs the whole question.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That is the invariable plea of the man who cannot sustain his argument. My honorable and learned friend is always courteous in his interruptions, but those who interject in a manner which shows that they are flying from place to place of their position in an endeavour to maintain it show the weakness of their contention. I need not mention further that the recent decision of the United States Court with regard to the lottery tickets establishes a position, in the protection of the whole Republic against monopolies and trusts, which will be seen in the future to be of the highest advantage to the liberties of every citizen of that great country. It should be understood, further, what is the meaning of this proposal to import the Chief Justices of the several States to form a High Court. It means handing over the judicial power to the States Executives indefinitely, because under the Constitution the Judges of the High Court must be appointed for life, unless they commit one of the offences for which they are removable. Assuming, as I think I may, that I have given a definite, intelligible, and argumentative answer to my honorable and learned friends, the only alternative to our proposal is practically to leave things as they are, which I think is the arrangement favoured by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne—investing the States Courts with Federal jurisdiction, and looking to the Privy Council as a court of appeal.

Mr. GLYNN.—Hear, hear; for the present. That is the general inclination.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Let us see how that arrangement would work. At any moment a judgment might be given by any one of the Supreme Courts of the six States—and in some of the States a final judgment might be given by a single Judge. Such a judgment might decide a question of the highest constitutional import, and might paralyze the administration of affairs by the Commonwealth for the year or two which, according to the law of averages upon which my honorable and learned friend the Attorney-General has descanted, would elapse before the decision of the Privy Council could be obtained. Until such a judgment was upset or reversed, it would probably be followed by the lower courts in the State in which it was delivered, and possibly by the courts of the other States. What wisdom there is, then, in the proposal! What a substitute it provides for a national Court!

Mr. O'MALLEY.—It would be a good thing for the lawyers.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Undoubtedly it would; because if there is anything which increases litigation it is the conflicting decisions of several courts. But I am tired of hearing the cry that something may be good or bad for the lawyers. If lawyers are intrusted with the confidence of the people, and are sent here to represent them, their arguments are entitled to as much weight as are those of other men, and to such additional weight as their experience in legal matters may give them. The legal members of the House who have spoken against this measure are therefore to be listened to with great care, and without the smallest suggestion that they are influenced by improper motives. But while I concede so much to them, I may, and do, fairly claim as much for myself. A decision is given, perhaps by a single Judge in one State, or it may be by the Full Court, from which there can be no appeal except to the Privy Council; and, if that decision is adverse to the Government, administration is paralyzed.

More than that, the question must arise whether, the decision having been given in one State, and having force only in that State, the Government shall follow it in one State and defy it in the other States, or follow it in all the States? Which would honorable members advise us to do? Would not any sane man suggest that a decision of the Courts, whether right or wrong, should apply to the whole Commonwealth, and that, instead of having a system under which decisions given in one State might be followed in that State and disputed in the rest, until there could be an appeal to the Privy Council, it would be better to grasp the opportunity to establish a Court of national jurisdiction which, as it justifies its existence by the purity and clearness of its interpretations, will the more commend itself to the approbation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Government have not found any inconvenience to arise yet from conflicting decisions.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That may be true; but we are only at the beginning of things. My argument for the establishment of a High Court is not founded upon the contention that there is now a huge list of cases awaiting decision, but upon the duty of this Parliament to set that Court in motion at once, because, so long as we are deliberately without it, we are preventing the attainment of the full Constitution for which the people voted. Now, let us imagine a decision in regard to which there is no conflict—a decision in one State. Should the Commonwealth Government follow it in the other five States, or defy it there? Is not the embarrassment created by such a position a sufficient reason for the creation of a Court with a national instead of a truncated jurisdiction?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But at the present time there is no embarrassment and no wrong doing.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—There is embarrassment. The decision was given by the Supreme Court of New South Wales that the importations of the Government of that State are not liable to duty, although they are not exempted in the Tariff. What are we to do under that decision? Unless a court with immediate jurisdiction to hear an appeal is established, we shall have to go to the Privy Council, and wait as long as suitors have to wait in such cases. The only case before the Privy Council in which we have been concerned up to the present is an appeal case brought against us, and that case has been pending for a couple of years.

Mr. THOMSON.—Its hearing was delayed because of the death of the appellant.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—That need not cause any great delay, because there are means for getting over a difficulty of that sort very speedily. Our lawyers have been on the point of moving for the dismissal of the suit for want of prosecution. But the point I wish to make is that there has been delay in that case, as there might have been delay through the unwillingness of one of the parties, or for some other reason; though, as the case is sub judice, I do not wish to refer to it. But the decision in regard to the freedom of State imports from duty affects only the State of New South Wales, because the Supreme Court of that State has no jurisdiction to make rules which are binding beyond its borders. Their decision, therefore, is of limited application, and the question arises: Are we to follow it in New South Wales and disregard it in the other States, or shall we follow it in the other States, and say, "This is declared to be the law of New South Wales. That law does not bind people living out of New South Wales, but we intend to make it binding on the people of the other States"? Do not honorable members see the dilemma which is caused, not only when there is a conflict of decisions, but where there is a conflict in jurisdictions? Does not the position justify us in saying that some corrective tribunal must be established on the spot, which will be invested with jurisdiction over the whole Commonwealth?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—There has been no appeal to the Privy Council against the decision of the New South Wales Bench?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No, because the decision was given only the other day.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Has the same point arisen in any other State?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No, and duty is being collected upon the importations of the other States. But let me bring the matter back, for a moment, to the question of self-government. When we, or our fathers, came to Australia, we brought with us the rights of British subjects, as they have been made effective in the United Kingdom by the declarations of its Parliament and people. Among those rights is the right of self-government. Now, an inherent part of that right is, that if a community is allowed to make a Constitution for itself, it should be allowed to say what that Constitution means. It is not self-government if we have to say, "We bow to somebody else as to the meaning of what we said." What we should say is, "We are men of British origin; we know what we meant when we made this law. Our Judges, acting for us, have declared our meaning, and we do not wish to see the question carried any further."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the theory, but only the theory, of the Government under which we live.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Let us put the other theory by way of contrast. Imagine the case of a man whose son is leaving England to settle in one of the colonies where the British institutions, of which we are so proud, exist. Let us imagine him saying to his son, "You are going out to New South Wales, to a place where there are British institutions, a place where there is popular Government, and where the people have their own way. You will become one of them, and will be able to vote for the election of a representative in Parliament, and to say who shall make your laws, and what laws shall be made. I shall not interfere with that. But when you have made your laws, I, who remain at home, shall be the authority to declare to you what they mean." Is the whole principle of self-government wrapt up in a Constitution which leaves matters in that position? I admit that my argument carries me to this length, that even the existence of a Privy Council as a controlling power leaves us something of full self-government to be desired.

Mr. THOMSON.—Would the right honorable gentleman then remove the Imperial veto?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—If I had my own way I would have no appeals to the Privy Council. But I can see that it will be many years before that will come about. In the meantime, I should like to see one great Court of Appeal to which all citizens of the Empire might have access established in place of the present system, under which we have the Privy Council as a court of appeal for people residing abroad, and the House of Lords for those who remain at home. That is an arrangement which is spoken of as giving equality of British citizenship; but there is no such equality under it. Whatever we may say of the purity and the learning of its Judges, the Privy Council has not acquired the same credit for its decisions as has the House of Lords. Whether we like it or not, the authority of the House of Lords is looked upon as superior to that of the Privy Council. Therefore, if there is to be a change, I hope that it will be in the direction of some such fusion of these two tribunals as will give the same rights to all citizens of the Empire. But a better thing would be to allow each community to decide for itself what its Constitution means. More than that, I hope, as time goes on, to see that power is given to us to say what our laws mean.

Mr. THOMSON.—Would the right honorable gentleman take away the power of veto from the Crown?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—The power of veto does not affect the interpretation of our laws, but our ability to pass certain legislation. On that question I say that while we remain a part of the British Empire, the prerogative of veto is an attribute of the Crown which we cannot deny. I do not think we should venture to object to the power of disallowance in, at least, that class of cases in which our legislation is shown to impinge upon the legal rights of other parts of the Empire. To that extent the Imperial Parliament and the Government of the United Kingdom are trustees for the whole Empire, and their advice to the Crown guides His Majesty in the exercise of his veto. I trust that there will be no abuse of that right, and I do not apprehend any, because we know that kingly vetoes are gradually falling into misuse. The fact that I am prepared, for the purpose of maintaining the Empire unimpaired, to agree that there should be some central authority which may in extreme cases prevent one part of the Empire from encroaching upon the legal rights of another, affords no reason why I should not contend that, with regard to matters where our Constitution and laws are concerned, we should be our own interpreters. Where other parts of the Empire are involved, I am content that the right of veto should exist; in fact that was the very wording of the proposal with which we went to England. I wish to safeguard that principle, because as long as we are a united Empire, as I believe we now are, the right of veto must be reposed in some authority or tribunal, which should decide whether the interests of any parts of the Empire are wrongfully or injuriously affected. I have never pretended to advocate any finality that would prevent that exercise of right, but I have urged that we should have finality consistent with that right, and subject to no other earthly consideration whatever. I desire to again refer to the question of decisions in the States Courts. I was saying that in the States Courts we might have decisions either of the Full Court, subject to appeal to the Privy Council, but only operative within the limits of the State, or that we might have the judgment of one Judge operating only within the limits of the State. Take the case of Stephens v. Abrahams. Under the law of the State of Victoria the judgment delivered by Chief Justice Madden was final, and could not be set aside without an appeal to the Privy Council. If that judgment had been allowed to stand, it would have brought about an absolute paralysis of business. But for the fortunate accident that another case involving exactly the same point was ready for submission to the Supreme Court, the Customs prosecutions in inferior courts would have been blocked indefinitely.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The necessary jurisdiction might be conferred upon the Full Court.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—Yes, I know, but I think that that would be a poor and meagre supply of food to a Constitution that requires the vigour of its life's blood. In the very nature of the case, how is it to be expected that the States Courts should be left without the supervision of some national Australian Court? Are the States Courts to have jurisdiction in suits between the States? Does it appear to be a small matter to permit a State Court to decide issues between those who are residing in the State in which the tribunal is situated and the citizens of another State? Would it not be incongruous to permit this? Yet we must either give the States Courts power to settle issues of that kind, or we must establish the High Court. We must either establish a Federal Supreme Court, such as is now contemplated, or, by way of a makeshift, arrange for jurisdiction to be exercised by the States Courts. If we adopt the latter alternative, and we do not subject the decisions of the States Courts to the correction of an Australian Appellate Court, we shall find cases going to the Privy Council, confused by all the very troubles which my honorable and learned friend has suggested, and particularly by this trouble—that a set of Judges who only understand ex hypothesi the laws of one State, are deciding between the rights of citizens of that State and the rights of citizens of another, or between the Government of that State and the Government of another. If the hypothesis is correct that the necessary amount of local knowledge is to be found only in those who form the local tribunals, then there will be great danger of injustice to those States or citizens who have to submit in the first place to the jurisdiction of Courts in other States, subject only to an appeal to the Privy Council. I admit that arguments such as these must not, however, be pushed too far. There is a certain refinement at the bottom of every one of them, but arguments of the kind which I have been answering may fairly be met by others equally relevant, and only so far as there is too much refinement in the arguments which have been used against the Bill are my statements upon this head an answer to them. Now, I come to the practical necessity for the High Court, this being the fourth proposition which I took leave at the outset to indicate to the House. I put it to honorable members that it is wrong to argue from actual present conditions as to the practical necessity for this court. In the first place, to a large extent that inquiry is immaterial, because if it is proved that the creation of the High Court is necessary as a part of the Constitution—that it is a mandate from those who made it, and that the Constitution is not complete without it—it is not necessary for me to go further than to argue in support of the three propositions with which I have already dealt. There our duty lies clear, but as the point of practical necessity has been raised, I desire to say a few words upon it. Those who determined in favour of the creation of this court, and, as I venture to contend, its creation at the earliest possible time compatible with the necessary business of Parliament, were judging according to the conditions which existed at that day, and of which they knew. If these conditions have been altered at all, they can only have become changed in so far as the facts of every day have demonstrated the greater degree of the necessity. If the necessity existed when the Constitution was framed—and upon that point the judgment of its framers is beyond cavil—and if there is greater necessity to-day, as I think there is, the fact only goes to strengthen arguments which really need no strengthening. The Constitution has brought into existence new relations between the States, and between individuals, as well as between the Commonwealth and the various States and individuals. These relationships were not existent as enforceable rights before the Constitution was made; and whatever moral rights may exist, the enforcement of them can only become possible when the mandate of the Constitution regarding the Federal Judiciary is complied with. Those who framed the Constitution knew that. We have no right—and I use the word, of course, in no offensive or arrogant sense—to interfere with the judgment of those who, in specific terms, ordered the creation of the High Court. They ordered it because they forecasted the existence of these correlative rights between the States and the Commonwealth, and between individuals and the States and the Commonwealth, and knew that they must produce litigation which could only be satisfactorily determined by a tribunal in essence national. It is not reasonable to conclude that the public will ever be satisfied to commit the determination of these matters, arising as they do from the creation of the national structure, to the States tribunals, which do not breathe, and cannot be expected to fully breathe, the national spirit. It is easy to say that the Judges of the States Courts will be impartial. I know they will. But the outlook from which men view these matters may be consistent with the most self-sacrificing impartiality, and yet may be such as not to lead to a correct decision. I say this with the most perfect respect for the Judges before whom many of us have practised, and whose integrity and learning I cheerfully admit. I am merely stating in other words that they are human. The States Judges are, in common with others, subject to the weaknesses of humanity, and if we have to determine between a State tribunal and one framed upon purely national lines, let us choose that which is likely to breathe the spirit of, and also to give body to, our highest aspirations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will it be impossible for the Judges of the High Court to do any wrong?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. They will make mistakes, just as other Judges do. Those who know the difficulties attached to judicial decisions must be surprised that the mistakes made are not more numerous. The work is very difficult, and requires much training and experience and the exercise of great discrimination. Of course there will be mistakes, but if you create a structure, and you wish to maintain its national character, you must, when a selection has to be made between a tribunal which in its direction and its essence is national and one which in its direction and its essence is local, choose that the tendency of which is national. How could it be contended that local tribunals would be the best expositors of the national sentiment? Was it ever contended before? Could it ever be contended except in this debate?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister has set up the opposite contention.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I know that the honorable member for Parramatta has followed me very closely, but I really must say that I have not done any such thing, as he will find upon reference to the Hansard report. The honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, know from experience that all commercial prosperity means an increase in litigation. That increase we must expect in the Commonwealth if higher prosperity as a nation is to come and continue. Where a new system of rights, duties, and relations is brought into existence, difficulties and doubts must arise, which can be solved only in a court of law. That is part of the price which we have to pay for our political origin, and upon the whole it is a very small price. It is even permitted to a lawyer to ask whether it should not be considered a necessary price, because quarrels between States might, in the course of time, lead not only to their drifting apart, but to their actually drawing the sword against each other. The substitution of a peaceful tribunal for the solution of their differences is surely a boon and a benefit, which can be conferred by only a national court, and which, if bought at twice the price that is talked of, would be a cheap purchase for the new Commonwealth. All my remarks have been directed to the first function of the Court—its original jurisdiction. It has, besides, an appellate jurisdiction. But it is of more concern to me to show that, apart from its necessity as an Appellate Court, it is required as a Federal Court to determine national questions in the light of the Constitution, giving due weight to all those instruments of Government which regulate the doings of States, and which must be looked at side by side with this Constitution. The existence of this Court as an Appellate Court will depend upon its repute, and its power to attract appeals to itself. Upon that I need say very little. The framers of the Constitution thought that we could erect a Court which, by reason of its repute, would attract to itself in the main the appeals of Australia. That is what the late Sir Henry Parkes believed, as was shown by the honorable and learned member for Illawarra last night when he read the resolutions proposed by that statesman in 1891. The honorable and learned member properly pointed out that the Court which was then dealt with was purely an Appellate Court. Since that time we have progressed; thus in March, 1897, we declared that this Court should discharge functions as a Federal as well as an Appellate Court. It is upon that aspect of the case that I have dwelt, although I believe there is no reason why it should not be a most successful Court without any extravagance being indulged in. As an Appellate Court it will depend upon the same conditions which will, or will not, guarantee its success as a Federal Court. Its success will be measured by the wisdom and learning of the decisions which it gives. I am not one of those who are so craven as to think that whilst we are constantly asserting for ourselves an ability to conduct our political affairs as well as can any other people—and I do claim that—we lack the ability to form a competent judicial tribunal. I do not agree with those who attack the Courts of the States. For the sphere in which their work lies undoubtedly they have been most learned and successful Courts. I give full weight to any arguments based upon their history, but I venture to say that if the field of selection be extended to cover all Australia, instead of that of any particular State, there must be constituted under this Bill a stronger tribunal than is to be found in any State Judiciary. I make that statement without desiring to say one word of disparagement of any State Judge to-day, without contending for a moment that there are not some occupants of the States Judicial Benches who are eminently fitted to occupy seats upon the High Court Bench. But I do contend that if the field covered by the whole of Australia be open—be it the judicial field alone, apart from the Bench and Bar, which would give us a field wider still—instead of, as hitherto, only a part of the Commonwealth, we shall be able to insure the creation of a court, which, from the wider range of our choice, must necessarily be a stronger and better tribunal than any of which we have had experience. Why do I use that argument? Because, if that is the result, this Court will attract to itself the appeals from the various States. In the infinitely more difficult field of constitutional judgment—in the interpretation not only of this Constitution, but of others, and particularly of those of the States—infinitely greater demands will be made upon the reason, judgment, and self-containment of this Court than can be made upon them in ordinary appeal cases between mere party and party. There is no higher field of legal arbitration than constitutional law unless it be the vague and disturbed field of international law. The work for which this court is primarily constituted—that of being a Federal tribunal, an arbiter—is one which makes the highest demands upon it. If it can satisfy those demands, it can a fortiori satisfy all demands as an appellate court. If, then, we are confident, as we ought to be, of our ability to constitute a court which will be the final interpreter of the Constitution, we need have no doubt of its success in matters which, however grave, are not so arduous, and do not demand the same extent of research and learning. I know that I have occupied a long time. I felt that I was discussing a problem of the gravest importance—one upon which none of us should feel cocksure, but one which all are called upon to debate if they have anything to say which is worth putting before the House. I hope that repetitions in which I have perhaps indulged from a characteristic failing will be forgiven. We are all apt to drive home our points a second time in order that we may feel assured that they have got there. I am not, I believe, a great sinner in that respect; but this is a matter for close consideration. A Bill of this character demands very close argument, and one, therefore, needs to be satisfied that he has thoroughly explained his views to his hearers. It is in that endeavour that I have, perhaps, occupied too much time.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—There is one point that the Prime Minister promised to clear up. I refer to the order in which the courts mentioned in section 71 of the Constitution are to be appointed.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I will deal with that before sitting down. Those courts are mentioned in a particular order, and if we see no reason why that order should be disturbed, we ought not to disturb it. The intention of section 71 seems to be that first the supreme duty should be performed of creating the High Court. That must be our first act, but it is within the discretion of Parliament to create other Federal Courts as the necessity arises, and also to invest States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. It is within the discretion of Parliament to say that it will create only the High Court at present, but will vest certain States Courts with Federal jurisdiction. It has complete discretion regarding the establishment of other Federal Courts and the investment of State tribunals with Federal jurisdiction, but the establishment of the High Court is an absolute duty created by the Constitution.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.—Is that a condition precedent to the others?

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—I do not say it is a condition precedent, except in the sense that nobody can bind any Parliament if it chooses to misuse its discretion and betray its trust. To that extent I admit the position, but those who have witnessed the making of this Constitution, and are familiar with its source, know that the intention of its framers was that, without delay, the Federal arbiter was to take its place side by side with the Executive and Parliament. If there was to be delay, it was only such as was inevitable in the very nature of things. There was not to be delay upon the miserable plea that the Court was not needed yet, or that its creation would be too expensive. It comes with ill-grace from us, whose parliamentary inheritance in a very large measure has been an extravagance for which we are all responsible, and who have sanctioned public undertakings which have produced no beneficial results, to say that we will not give effect to an Act not only of the Imperial Parliament, but of our own people, in which we are told that a certain thing is our duty, and that we are to discharge it—that we will not incur the expense—not an extravagant expense, but whatever may be reasonably necessary to render the performance of the trust committed to us effective—that we will not carry out the mandate of the Constitution and establish a Federal Judiciary. If the Government has culpably postponed that duty—and I venture to say it has not—no similar sin ought to be condoned on that ground. It is no argument to say that because we have delayed this matter too long—and if it had been possible this Bill would have been presented before now—it may now be indefinitely postponed. If the mandate contained in the Constitution has not been strictly followed, that is no reason why the dignity of those who gave it should be further offended. I ask that this Bill may be passed—and this Court, and the other necessary tribunals which will follow its creation, established—not so much in a sense of cringing obedience, which I do not wish to enforce upon any one, but as an indication of loyal affection to the people who caused the making of federation, and who indorsed the work of the Convention. There is one question which should possess all our minds now that we come to the supreme decision of this matter. Do we intend for the sake of saving what is a very small sum, having regard to the many other expenses that may be incurred under the Federation, to postpone indefinitely the performance of an act which ought to be one of our first duties? Let us consider that in discharging that duty we shall be relieving the Constitution from a difficulty; that it was intended that it should consist of these three great limbs—if I am not allowed to term them arms; that one of those limbs has been to a certain extent injured, but that that is no reason why as much vigour as it can be made to exercise should not be applied to the maintenance of the other parts of the body. We ought to be determined to carry out the intentions and the demands of the Constitution by making it complete, and not to plead, because the completion of the organ has necessarily been delayed, that the body is more healthy when it works with a withered arm.

Sir Edmund Barton.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I think we have just listened to one of the most powerful appeals that has been heard in the Federal Parliament. The Prime Minister always excels in dealing with constitutional questions, and in the elaborate speech which he has just delivered he has given us an exhibition of his powers, the like of which he seldom favours us with. The appeal which he has just made is equal to the best efforts of the great federalist of four years ago. We find him to-night, as Prime Minister of Australia, defending this Bill in the spirit in which he defended the Constitution as put before the electors. The speeches made in the defence of the Bill from the Government side of the House have been couched in language which suggests that the Constitution is being attacked. The Constitution, however, is not on its trial. No attack has been made upon it. No one has said that he is opposed to the creation of the High Court, but there is simply a difference of opinion as to the method which should be adopted in its establishment. The Prime Minister, however, described those who opposed the Bill just as he described the opponents of the Constitution Bill, and declared that they were anti-federalists.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—No. I have not said anything like that to-night.

Mr. WILKS.—That was the attitude taken up by the right honorable gentleman in his enthusiasm for the adoption of the Constitution. To-night he has tried to place the House in a similar position. I have listened to this debate as a layman and as one of the great mass of the people who will never have any occasion to use the High Court, but will always have the privilege of paying for it. I have no training as a lawyer to help me in placing my views on this Bill before the House, nor do I advance them from any particular attachment to the mercantile classes. I speak rather as one who is endeavouring to represent the opinions of the people of his own class, and who follow similar walks in life. The Prime Minister made passing reference to the suggestion that this Bill is being treated as a party measure. But he must see that it is not so. The honorable and learned member for Bendigo, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and the honorable member for Gippsland have spoken most vigorously against this measure; they have even invited us to vote with them against the motion for the second reading. If they are treating it as a party matter I can only say that some honorable members who have hitherto been the most enthusiastic supporters of the Government are now deserting it. Another suggestion has been made—that those who oppose the Bill are influenced by press opinions. The Prime Minister said that he did not trust to the newspapers to direct honorable members in the discharge of their duty. The leading newspapers of New South Wales, however, are vigorously advocating the creation of the High Court, while representatives of New South Wales in this House are, for reasons which they are giving, fighting against this measure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member say that the two leading journals in New South Wales are supporting this Bill?

Mr. WILKS.—I am told that they are. I usually read both journals, but I have not had an opportunity of perusing the articles said to have been published in support of the High Court. We all appreciate a speech of the character of that delivered by the Prime Minister; but when he insinuates that honorable members who oppose this Bill are influenced by the opinions of the press of the States they represent, he suggests what is entirely wrong. The opposition offered to this measure is by no means a party one. The Prime Minister said that the High Court was essential for four reasons. He urged, first of all, that it was necessary that we should have it to interpret our Constitution. I believe that when it is necessary to interpret and guard the Constitution every provision should be made for the performance of that work. But the Prime Minister said that we should establish the Court, not only for that reason, but because of the mandate in the Constitution that it should be created. I for one, however, am not going to regard the Constitution as a Joss, and fall down and worship it whenever I am called upon to do so.

Sir EDMUND BARTON.—We must either follow it or amend it.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not opposed to the passage of a Bill for the creation of a High Court, but I shall show that such a Bill should not be passed at the present time. The Attorney-General sneers at me.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly not.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and others, have intimated to the Attorney-General that they feel that it is a strain upon their friendship, but that, nevertheless, they are compelled to vote against the second reading of this Bill. I have yet to learn that considerations of personal friendship should guide us in the discharge of our duty in this House. The honorable member for Gippsland, with tremulous voice and with tears in his eyes, has intimated that he feels constrained to vote against this measure, while there are others who say they do not care to vote against the Government, and will therefore support the second reading of the Bill, but that they will support certain amendments when the measure gets into Committee. Is the Bill to be so mutilated in Committee that when it is passed no one will be able to recognise in it the measure now before us? It seems that it is, and that there are only one or two vital clauses which, according to the Attorney-General, will be defended. If that attitude is adopted by the Government, it will say very little for their appreciation of the High Court. The Prime Minister has admitted that the Government would have difficulty in getting this Bill passed into law, and said that he was afraid that if they had persisted in pressing it forward some time ago they might not have succeeded. If there was opposition to the measure then there must have been some reason for it, and if a hard struggle is now to be experienced in passing the Bill into law, would it not be well for the Government to withdraw it until a more convenient season presents itself? In the meantime honorable members could be educated up to the necessity for the Court. I, for one, am willing to be educated in regard to this matter.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Did not the honorable member, in a speech at Balmain, blame the Government for having failed to push on with the High Court Bill last session?

Mr. WILKS.—No; the Prime Minister said that the people in Australia accepted the Constitution with the provision in it for a Federal Judiciary. But did the people vote for the Constitution Bill because of that provision? If the right honorable gentleman can show that the people of any State voted for the Constitution Bill because it provided for the creation of a High Court, his argument will be a strong one. The magnificent speech which the Premier has just addressed not only to this Chamber, but to Australia, will cause those who heard it to wonder why the Government have hesitated so long about introducing the measure. Had they taken a similar attitude last session, and had the Bill then introduced been as vigorously defended as this Bill has been defended by the right honorable gentleman, we might not be engaged in the present struggle, but might be enjoying the benefits and advantages of a High Court in full working order. The honorable members who have addressed you on this subject, Mr. Speaker, and especially those who are versed in the law, evidently gave a good deal of time to the preparation of their elaborate attacks upon or defence of the measure. Most of us, however, are not accustomed to the atmosphere of courts. My own acquaintance with the administration of law is fortunately very small, and I hope it will remain so, although I have a great admiration for those who have studied its technicalities, and whose practice in the courts earns them, if not a well deserved, a good income. Ordinary people must look at this matter from what the Prime Minister may term a miserable point of view, but from one from which they have to regard many other matters which come before them for consideration; that is, from a financial stand-point. The Prime Minister had no right to suggest that those of us who have opposed the Bill do so because we are governed by exterior influences. Even if we were all the miserable creatures of the daily newspapers of the various cities of Australia, it must not be forgotten that the press is a great factor in moulding public opinion, and in presenting the views of the people upon public questions. In Victoria, the Argus and the Age are both opposed to the measure. Can they, because they are of the opinion that the immediate establishment of a High Court is not one of the requirements of the people, fairly be called bitter and violent enemies of the Constitution? But while in Melbourne the press is opposed to the Bill, in New South Wales, I am told, it is in favour of it. Inasmuch, however, as almost all the representatives of New South Wales in this House are opposed to it, that disposes of the imputation of the Prime Minister. The right honorable gentleman made a long defence—first of the Constitution, and then of the High Court, and in his concluding remarks he devoted a few minutes to the advocacy of this measure upon the ground of its practical necessity. That is a phrase which the ordinary man can understand, but which we must take for what it is worth. We have been told that the Constitution is in danger, but when I very innocently asked the Prime Minister what danger he apprehended, I failed to obtain an answer, and when I asked what were the signs of danger, the only reply I received was that the people had marched to the ballot with copies of the Constitution Bill in their hands, and that their reason for voting for its acceptance was because it provided for the establishment of a Federal Judiciary.

Mr. McDONALD.—Probably ninety-nine out of every hundred knew little or nothing of the judicial provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. WILKS.—Exactly. It is the bounden duty of the Government to do all they can to win the popular respect for federation, so that the States may be encouraged to confer still greater powers upon us. That is the ground upon which many of us argue for the consideration of questions of economy in regard to this matter. We are anxious that the Federation shall prove a success, so that the people may enjoy, not only the pleasure of hearing fine phrases, but the advantages of personal benefit in the more systematic and economical administration of their affairs. The economical aspect is no doubt a prosaic one to take of a question like this, but if we wish to secure the good will of the people we must not lose sight of their demand for economy. We remember the great skill and ability shown by the Prime Minister in passing the Constitution through the Convention, and we admire him for his connexion with it. But that does not prevent us from differing from many of the conclusions which he has since enunciated in regard to its provisions. For him to say that those who oppose the immediate creation of a High Court are opposed to the provisions in the Constitution which provide for a High Court is as absurd as to say that those who opposed the Constitution Bill were opposed to federation. Even the Attorney-General has admitted during this debate that he would like to see the Constitution amended in some points, and experience has shown that many of its provisions require amendment. When I wanted to know from the Prime Minister if he saw any sign of an interference with our popular liberties, he dwelt at length upon the fact that the Constitution is the safeguard of our self-governing powers. We all admit that, and we all hope that there will be no infringement of our autonomous rights. But such a statement is of little assistance to us in the consideration of the measure now before the House. The Bill has not been criticised in any party spirit. Lawyers of repute, such as the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who was once a Minister of the Crown in Victoria, and the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, have all opposed it. We find, too, that that level-headed gentleman from the land of cakes, the honorable member for Gippsland, who has no pretensions to any extraordinary knowledge of constitutional law and legal practice, also opposed it, because he does not admit that there is any immediate necessity for the establishment of the High Court. I do not wish to traverse the arguments which have been raised in regard to the mandatory character of the provisions of the Constitution in respect to the establishment of a High Court. I frankly admit that the Constitution is mandatory in that respect, just as it is mandatory in respect to the establishment of a capital. But it rests with the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled to determine the urgency of both these matters. Those who are in charge of the Bill have failed to show that the establishment of a High Court is urgent. If they had shown that the people of any one of the States had voted for the Bill because of its judicial provisions, the establishment of the High Court would be in the same position as the establishment of the Federal capital, and I should feel constrained to vote for the Bill. But they cannot do that. Neither can they say that because the Constitution was accepted by the people, therefore every provision in it must have immediate effect, because matters such as the establishment of the High Court are left to the discretion of Parliament, and each representative is responsible to his electors for the attitude which he takes in regard to them. Personally, I am quite prepared to take the responsibility of opposing this measure. I think that it would be prudent for the Attorney-General to withdraw it, because supporters of the Government, who are grieved in their inmost hearts to oppose them, have declared that they cannot vote for it, while others, who are willing to vote for it, say that it must be seriously amended in Committee. The Attorney-General did not make his second-reading speech on the Bill introduced last session until nearly a year after its first reading, and then the Government was content, although there had been no expression of hostility on the part of the House, to withdraw it altogether. Now it has been brought before us again, and due publicity has been given to its provisions, both by the press and by the members of this House, and the honorable and learned gentleman has reason to believe, from the criticism which has been directed at it, that he cannot pass it in any but a mutilated condition, with provisions which he has admitted will not do what he requires. Now that honorable members have been relieved from party ties, I ask them to consider this question fairly and squarely. Who are the three strongest advocates of this measure? First we have the Attorney-General, who introduced the Bill; secondly, the Prime Minister; and thirdly, the honorable and learned member for Indi. The Prime Minister was bound to defend the measure, but he qualified his support by saying that there were two or three provisions in the Bill that might require some alteration in Committee. The Attorney-General, on the other hand, told us that any attempt to deprive the High Court of any of the powers proposed to be conferred upon it, would be attended by the most unfortunate results. The honorable and learned member for Indi delivered a very able speech, but he traversed much ground over which I am not prepared to follow him. He especially impressed upon us the solemnity of the undertaking in which we were now engaged, but I think we may dismiss any consideration of that kind in view of the more practical issues with which we find ourselves face to face. The Government evidently anticipate that they will have a very hard struggle before they are able to pass the Bill into law. It is apparent from the tone of the debate that the Bill will simply squeeze through, and that some honorable members will be prompted to support it only by their attachment to the Prime Minister, by their affection for the Attorney-General, or by their unswerving party loyalty. It is not right that party considerations or motives of personal friendship should sway honorable members in a matter of this kind. Under all the circumstances, and in view of the prospect of the measure being very considerably mutilated, I ask the Attorney-General whether he will be prepared to accept it in a radically amended form?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will answer that question in detail when the Bill is in Committee.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not content to wait until that stage is reached, and I shall record my vote against the second reading. We have been told that we require a High Court, the members of which have had parliamentary experience, and we may reasonably infer from this that the first appointments to the Court will be of a purely political character. This will not specially recommend the proposal to the public, because most people will find it difficult to see any reason why the High Court should necessarily be constituted of those who have had a hand in the framing of the Constitution. There is not the slightest justification for the slurs which have been cast upon the Supreme Courts of the States. If there is anything of which Australia has reason to feel proud, it is the purity of its Judiciary, and the integrity and ability of its Judges. It is desirable that we should have the Constitution guarded in every way, but Parliament should not surrender its powers to any Bench of Judges, however lofty or able they might be. Although the people are no doubt very much attached to their leading politicians, there is no reason why they should be called upon to provide a refuge for them by creating a High Court for which no need exists. It has been conceded by the honorable and learned member for Indi, that there is no occasion to give the High Court such jurisdiction as will cause it to trench upon the business properly belonging to the States Courts. He also said that there was no need for any distrust of, or want of confidence in, the States Courts. The Prime Minister, on the other hand, told us that he wished to have questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution removed from the purely provincial atmosphere of those Courts. He also stated that there was a practical necessity for the High Court, but he did not establish his proposition. Only twenty appeal cases have occurred in all the States since the establishment of the Commonwealth, and this in spite of the fact that we might have expected a very large proportion of cases to arise out of the administration of the new Customs Act, which has caused such a large amount of irritation amongst members of the mercantile community. I do not see how there can be any large volume of important business to engage the attention of the High Court, and yet we are told that it is proposed to appoint five Judges, and that it may be necessary later on to increase this number. Some honorable members have declared that unless the jurisdiction of the Court is to be very much restricted, it will be necessary to appoint more than five Judges immediately, and, if so, the estimate which has been given by the Attorney-General will prove altogether insufficient. It has been represented by the advocates of the Bill, that according to the Constitution it is imperative that the High Court should be established without delay. If, however, it is imperative now, it must have been equally so when the Bill was abandoned last session. I do not realize any of the dangers which the Prime Minister apparently apprehends, and I resent the attitude which he has assumed towards all those who have criticised the measure, because he apparently regards them as political brigands who are engaged in an attempt to destroy the Constitution. The great majority of the people who do not revel in the luxuries of litigation in High Courts or elsewhere will be hard to convince that we are working upon the proper lines in establishing the Federal Judiciary at this stage. This is no time to indulge in sentiment, especially in view of the demand made by the people that every economy shall be exercised. The Attorney-General has attempted to show us that if we establish the Federal Judiciary the States Governments will be able to economize by reducing the cost of the administration of justice within their borders, but on the other hand the Prime Minister says that there are not enough Judges in New South Wales, and that we cannot therefore expect the Federal business to be transacted by the State Courts there. To urge that because this Parliament enacts certain legislation the Governments of the States will exercise economy is ridiculous.

The Attorney-General has declared that the High Court will attract a lot of business ; but, as has been pointed out, the citizens of the Commonwealth will still avail themselves of their right to appeal to the Privy Council. Viewing the matter from every stand-point, I am thoroughly satisfied that the Government would be acting wisely in withdrawing the Bill. I would further point out—because it is right that the country should be informed of the fact—that this measure has been “whipped” for in this House as no other Bill has been. Even in the discussions upon the Tariff the same degree of pressure was not brought to bear upon supporters of the Government that has been exercised upon the present occasion. Apparently the days of scientific whipping have passed, and to-night we behold a Minister passing in and out of the Chamber openly appealing to members to support the Bill. I think that the honorable and learned member for Werriwa did well to remind the House that the honorable member for West Sydney, who by the way has recently qualified himself for practice at the Bar, is a vigorous opponent of this measure. He is fully seized of the fact that the bulk of our constituents will never come before the tribunal which it is now sought to establish. The masses will have no occasion to use the Court. They are simply to be called upon to pay for it. We have been told that the leaders of the three parties in this House are in favour of the measure. That, however, is their concern as representatives, seeing that they have to justify their position before the electors. If other honorable members are sufficiently independent to oppose the Bill, I think it is proof to the people of Australia that the Commonwealth Parliament occupies a higher plane than has been suspected. I have no desire to pursue this matter further. It is refreshing to find the old fiction—that lawyers are always intent upon extracting money from the pockets of the people—has been falsified upon this occasion. We all know that the more Courts that are created the more practice there will be for the legal profession. It is therefore doubly refreshing to find the members of that profession vigorously opposing this measure in the public interest. Is the suggestion to be entertained for a moment that these gentlemen, who are so well versed in legal practice, do not understand the matter about which they are talking, and are we to refuse to be directed by them upon the assumption that they are actuated by a miserable and unworthy motive? I think not. I must oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (South Australia).—We have now reached the third night of this debate, and therefore it is not my intention to go into details or to attempt, with any elaboration, to discuss the matter now under consideration. This has been so well done by the Attorney-General and the supporters of the Bill on one side, and by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn, and the opponents of the measure on the other, that anything of the kind is quite unnecessary. My object in rising is to make the statement that I intend to support the second reading, but that I reserve to myself the right to vote for any amendments I may think desirable when the Bill is in Committee. During the course of the debate on the address in reply, the Attorney-General undertook to show that the cost of the establishment of the High Court would be counterbalanced by economies that could be effected in the law establishments of the different States. But I think he has failed to sustain his position. He points to the fact that there is now one Judge less in Victoria than formerly. That reduction has not been made in view of the creation of the High Court, but because the spirit of economy is abroad. The hopes of the Attorney-General in this particular will not be realized at present. Something may be done when pleasanter relations have been established between the Commonwealth and the various States. I am in agreement with those honorable members who think the High Court is essential to the completion of the Constitution as contemplated by the Commonwealth Act. I know that the people of South Australia voted for the measure with the knowledge that the machinery of the Federation included the High Court, and they were repeatedly told that this Court was needed in the interests of the less populous States. I agree with the Prime Minister and the honorable and learned member for Indi that no satisfactory arrangement could be made to utilize the services of the Chief Justices of the States Courts. I can see that any arrangement of the kind would be surrounded by difficulties, and I am not sure that in the end it would have economy to recommend it. Whilst I say this I have not the faintest intention of reflecting on the States Judicatures. From them a Bench could be created of the highest ability and the most absolute integrity—a Bench that would contain members who would compare in legal knowledge and breadth of view with the famous American Judges whose names have been quoted. In view of all the circumstances, I think it will be wise to call into existence an independent tribunal. I say this, but I express the hope that such a tribunal will be established on the most economical lines possible.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—After the very able and eloquent addresses which have been delivered upon this question, I do not propose to deal with it at length. There are, however, one or two phases which appeal to me, and impel me to publicly avow my attitude towards this Bill. It has been insinuated by the Prime Minister that those Victorian representatives who oppose the measure take their views from the morning newspapers.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Prime Minister said they might mistake the morning newspapers for public opinion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The insinuation was there all the same, and on that account I propose to say a few words upon the attitude which I take up. The Prime Minister commenced his speech this afternoon by declaring that he had formulated four propositions which he intended to establish. The first of these had reference to the mandate embodied in the Constitution for the creation of the High Court forthwith. To the second and third propositions I do not propose to refer. To me the fourth proposition seemed to be the most essential. But after getting into the clouds for a considerable time, where I could not follow him, the right honorable gentleman, in dealing with that proposition, got down to solid earth again without assigning the slightest reason for the creation of the proposed tribunal at the present time. He simply appealed to the sentiments and aspirations of the Australian people. I am not going to say that the national life of Australia is not influenced to a very appreciable extent by sentiment. The right honorable gentleman told us also that the Constitution had the imprimatur of the people of Australia as a whole—that their representatives in the Convention had framed it, and that the electors had subsequently adopted it. I ventured to remark, by way of interjection, that it was not the whole of the principles embodied in the Constitution which induced the people of Australia to accept it, but rather its good qualities. In Victoria, I know that considerable difference of opinion arose regarding the respective merits of the provisions of the Commonwealth Bill. It was during my advocacy of the acceptance of that Bill that my attention was directed particularly to the clauses under which it is now proposed to constitute the High Court. I might refer to the different conditions that existed when those machinery clauses were inserted as compared with the conditions which obtain to-day. My attention was particularly directed to the matter last night when the honorable and learned member for Illawarra quoted from the reports of the Convention debates certain remarks made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne with the view of showing that his opposition to the Bill was inconsistent with the attitude taken up by him at the Adelaide Convention. I pointed out at the time that the position was altogether different. What was the position then? The Convention Bill, as drafted at Adelaide, made provision for a Commonwealth Judiciary that would have satisfied the aspirations and ambitions of the people of Australia. Under those provisions it would have been possible to create an Australian Court of Appeal to determine all Australian matters without encroaching upon the prerogative of the Crown to deal with questions of an international character. At the Adelaide Convention, power was taken for the High Court to deal, not only with appeals involving constitutional or Inter-State questions, but with all appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States, and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was speaking of the Constitution as it then stood, when he then supported the creation of the High Court. In the draft of the Constitution agreed to at the Adelaide Convention, it was provided, under clause 74, that—

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any Court of any State, or from the High Court, or any other Federal Court except that the Queen may in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or of any other part of Her Dominions, are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

We are told by the Prime Minister that it was the Imperial Parliament that whittled down that provision. Nothing of the sort. The Convention, in the first instance, whittled away the whole of the rights of appeal to the High Court in respect of all matters coming within the purview of the States Courts, and decided that they should remain as they were. That fact is clearly shown in the memorandum that was submitted by the delegates sent to England to confer with the Imperial authorities when the Constitution Bill was before the British Parliament. In that memorandum it is set forth that the Constitution, as submitted to Imperial Parliament, provided that—

No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council in any matter involving the interpretation of this Constitution or of the Constitution of a State unless the public interest of some part of Her Majesty's Dominions otherwise than the Commonwealth or a State are involved.

Except as provided in this section this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal prerogative to grant special leave to appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council.

Then the memorandum set forth that—

It does not abolish appeals to the Queen in Council with respect to State Courts, and as there is no enactment elsewhere that appeals from them are to cease, the prerogative remains, and the appellant may take his case either to the High Court or to the Privy Council. But when, and only when, he goes to the High Court in one of the limited class of cases set forth in the first part of clause 74, he must abide by the decision of that Court.

That proves beyond a shadow of doubt that the anxiety which existed for the creation of the High Court according to the Adelaide draft of the Convention Bill—to which the members had given their adherence, had entirely disappeared. The position was entirely different when the Constitution Bill was submitted to the Imperial Parliament. When it was ratified by the Imperial Parliament the powers of the prospective High Court were still further whittled away, and further powers of appeal to the Privy Council were given. We are told that the desire for the creation of this Court was uppermost in the minds of the people when they accepted the Constitution. I admit that it was then the wish of the great majority of the people of Australia that we should have a High Court, provided that the conditions to which the Adelaide Convention had given its support remained. But they do not remain, and therefore the necessity for the creation of the High Court does not now exist to the same extent as before. That view was very much in evidence when I, in common with others, was urging the people of Victoria to accept the Constitution as it then stood, and it was also a prominent one during the first Federal election campaign. I found then that the electors were anxious to know whether it was desirable under the conditions then prevailing to create a High Court. What have we been told by the Prime Minister as to the necessity of establishing this tribunal? We have been told that it may be that the reputation which the Court will make for itself by its learned judgments will attract business to it. But is there any necessity to create a High Court in order that it may make a reputation for itself? The necessity exists only if there is work for the Court to do. Those who have spoken during this debate have not questioned the ability of the States Courts to deal with the matters submitted to them. There can be no bias on the part of those tribunals, and as a matter of fact the few Federal matters with which our States Courts have dealt bear no evidence of any such bias. I quite agree that it is practically impossible for us to requisition the services of the Chief Justices of the several States, and to place them in the position of being the Judges of the High Court.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That proposition has never been made.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It has been suggested.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not think that it has been seriously suggested during this debate. We have a power to create a High Court and other Federal Courts, but I hold that we shall satisfy our present requirements by exercising the right to invest the superior States Courts which now exist with Federal jurisdiction; we have the harmonizing power of the Privy Council to reconcile any conflicting judgments which may arise. That is the view I take of the situation, and I am very much surprised that the Prime Minister did not submit to the House some evidence of what is said to be the absolute necessity for the immediate creation of this Court. Those who oppose this measure may be accused of looking at the matter from a mercenary point of view; but I contend that we should at least regard it from a practical stand-point. Even the Attorney-General urged that the High Court was proposed to be established from motives of economy, but we know that this miniature Court of Appeal, as we may term it, will not meet the necessities of the situation. If the provisions for a Judiciary which were first laid down in the Constitution Bill still remained, I should not hesitate to support to the full the creation of the Court as proposed in this measure. But I am dealing with the situation as it exists, and I do not therefore feel justified in supporting it. I feel that our States Courts, with the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal, will be able to deal with all matters which are likely to arise for a very considerable time. I have heard honorable members say in this House—just as I have heard the statement made in other Legislatures—that they will support the second reading of a certain Bill, and attempt to mould it according to their views in Committee. I have had some experience of what is possible in that direction, and I consider it desirable for one to take the first opportunity of fighting against a principle to which he is opposed, rather than to run any risk of the combinations or many little influences which may subsequently be at work. It is that experience which will impel me to vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I feel it my duty to say a few words in regard to this Bill from a layman's point of view, and to urge reasons for the vote which I am about to give against the motion for the second reading. I speak upon a subject of this kind with the greatest diffidence. Everything has been said in favour of the Bill that could be said for it by the three honorable and learned gentlemen who have been the principal speakers in support of it. We have listened to-night to a very brilliant speech by the Prime Minister, who dealt with the whole range of the Bill, but who, I contend, did not traverse the whole ground opened up by this debate. The speech was conspicuous for what it evaded as well as for what it proposed. Last night another brilliant speech was delivered by the honorable and learned member for Indi, but it was marred, I venture to say, by a very unfortunate sneer at the Privy Council. I was surprised to hear an honorable and learned member of his ability so obviously sneering at a High Court such as the Privy Council undoubtedly is.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not at the Court, but at some of its members.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member for Indi said, with a most contemptuous shrug of his shoulders—"You can get, well—the decision of the Privy Council." No doubt the honorable and learned member's experience of that tribunal is unfortunate. We all know that some time ago he went to England to conduct a very important case before the Privy Council. Doubtless he then met one of those "scratch courts" which he condemns so roundly, and he came back having lost his case. In these circumstances he very naturally will not have a high appreciation of a court whose judgment had such serious consequences for him.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable and learned member has won far more appeals than he has lost.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That may be, but I think there are very few legal men in Australia who would use the language concerning the Privy Council which he employed last night. It was most unfortunate; it was quite gratuitous and unnecessary. I should like to put in opposition to his opinion of the Privy Council the opinions of some of the admittedly best lawyers in Australia—men like Sir Julian Salomons, Mr. Pilcher, and Mr. Want, who have no political ambitions to serve, and who unhesitatingly declare the Privy Council to be the finest law court in the world. I think that their opinion should have as much weight as the oracular utterances of the honorable and learned member for Indi. But, notwithstanding that blot on his speech, it was a brilliant attempt to say all that could be said in favour of the immediate establishment of the High Court. The Prime Minister told us, in quite a pleasant manner at times, that it was most unseemly for the opponents of the Bill to ask for delay, and that it was an offence against the dignity of the people who sent us here, having accepted the Constitution by referendum. He impliedly stated that it was a misuse of our position and a betrayal of our trust to vote against the Bill. He further described the arguments put forward by the opponents of the measure as miserable. But in spite of these unnecessary aspersions upon his opponents, he made a brilliant speech. In my opinion, however, it is the duty of those who believe that the Commonwealth should be governed upon economic lines to vote against the second reading. I want, in the first place, to protest as strongly as I am able against the rigid and plenary and technical reading of the Constitution which has been adopted by both the Prime Minister and the honorable and learned member for Indi. They have gone the length of saying that the whole necessity for the measure rests upon the meaning of one word in the Constitution. The Prime Minister objected over and over again to any reading of that kind when he was trying to get the Constitution Bill adopted by the people. Whenever an opponent suggested that a technical reading of the measure would be used to create difficulties in connexion with the amendment of the Constitution, and in defining the respective powers of the two Houses, he invariably met the objection by the statement that the Constitution would be administered by men of common sense, who would not act upon any technical reading of its provisions. Now, however, when he wants to get this Judiciary Bill passed at all hazards, he tells us that everything depends upon the meaning of one word. It is a pity, if he knew that the provision upon which he relies is of such extreme importance, that he did not dilate upon the subject before the Constitution was accepted by the people. He argues now that the people knew exactly what it contained, and have expressed their unqualified approval of every line and every comma in it. Under other circumstances, however, he would be the first to protest against the rigid and unfair reading which he wants us to adopt. It is a very large assumption to say that the people understood the shade of meaning attaching to every word and to the placing of every comma in the Constitution which they accepted. I, for one, made no pretence of understanding it so thoroughly, and I venture to say that no honorable member in this Chamber would declare himself able to do so.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—The honorable member knew that the Constitution contemplated the establishment of a High Court.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Of course, I knew that. The people, however, believed the statement of the Prime Minister that there would be no technical straining of the Constitution, and that it would be administered on common-sense lines, with a view to securing their interests and welfare. No doubt the Constitution is a sacred instrument, whose aims and whose spirit are to be observed; but there is yet a higher law, namely, the good and welfare of the people, in obedience to which

I am opposing the Bill for the present, and that is the law which necessitates careful and economic administration. I agree with the Prime Minister that the High Court must be created as soon as the exigencies of the situation will permit. But that is a very different statement from the position of the honorable and learned member for Indi, who said that this is not a question of cost or convenience, but of what is right. He told us that it would be immoral, in view of the mandate of the people, to postpone the creation of the Court. But I shall have something to say upon that point a little later. The Prime Minister told us that though we did not get all we wanted in the Constitution, we should make the best of what we have. I have no quarrel with him there. But the question is, what is making the best of the Constitution? From my point of view, it is to postpone the creation of the High Court until a more opportune time. No doubt, it is the right thing to create the High Court, but I would remind honorable gentlemen of the statement in a certain old book, that while all things may be lawful, all things are not expedient. The view I take is that it is not expedient to create a High Court at the present time. The immediate necessity for a High Court has not been made apparent, and until the people have become accustomed to the new condition of things, and can afford the expense of working the Constitution at its ultimate points, it is the highest wisdom to postpone this matter. Honorable members who have supported the Bill have argued the case entirely from the lawyer's stand-point. Every authority they have quoted has been a lawyer. No layman has been quoted as to the beneficial results which have accrued from the strict reading of the American Constitution. Mr. Justice Story, who may or may not be the best judge of the practical relations of the people of America to the Constitution, has been quoted as the authority for determining what is mandatory and what is not mandatory in the instrument. I believe that that Judge interpreted the Constitution nearly 30 years after its acceptance.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That was the first time the question arose.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the Constitution of America worked very well for 30 years, and no ill consequences befell the people of that country for want of this interpretation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They had their Supreme Court during the whole period.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Was the statement of Mr. Justice Story a mere academic performance?

Mr. DEAKIN.—He dealt with the point on the first occasion it was raised.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I suggest that no ill consequences will befall Australia if we do not raise the point now. We can confer Federal jurisdiction upon the States Courts, which makes our position essentially different from that of the United States. The people of Australia were not told that the High Court would be established immediately upon the acceptance of federation, and the strained and technical interpretation which has been given to the Constitution is in contradiction to the common-sense administration which was promised to the people. We are told that if we do not vote for the Bill we may be visited with severe penalties. That is the threat which the Prime Minister holds over us. I am prepared to face any consequences which may follow my action in voting against the Bill. The matter is one which concerns only myself and my constituents, because I am not aware that any other power can visit punishment upon us for daring to do what we believe to be in the interests of the people.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The ill consequences that are feared would befall the people, not necessarily their representatives.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some of us who are opposing the Bill have only recently been before our constituents. I told my electors quite lately that I should vote against the Bill unless it was made clear to me that the cost of establishing the High Court would be very small indeed. The Attorney-General spoke in all for nearly seven hours in advocacy of the provisions of the Bill, and I believe that if he had spoken for seventeen hours we should not have thought his speech too long. But I am afraid that his beautiful words do not carry conviction. He pictured to us what he termed an interesting coincidence when he told us that we were now proposing to take advantage of the third power conveyed in the Constitution and are in the third year of our federal life. What argument is to be based upon those facts, except one which reflects severely upon Ministers for their non-adherence to their stated convictions, I do not know. If they believed that there is a pressing and imperative mandate for the establishment of a High Court, they have been guilty of the gravest political immorality in postponing it so long. They tell us that they could not deal with the matter sooner. But I shall have a few words to say upon that subject presently. Both the Attorney-General and the Prime Minister have pictured the Constitution as standing upon two legs, and requiring a third leg to prevent it from tottering to its fall. Yet they have been prepared to let it totter until their immediate political necessities could be attended to. What were those necessities? Was it a necessity that we should at once proceed to impose a protective Tariff? It was, I admit, a provision of the Constitution that a uniform Tariff should be imposed within two years, but that could have been accomplished in a month. Acknowledging the urgent need for the establishment of a High Court, because the liberties of the people were in danger, and millions of money were at stake, the Government deliberately postponed its establishment until they could force a protective Tariff through both Houses of Parliament. Why did they not rather say to Parliament—"Help us to pass an interim Tariff, which may be done in a fortnight or a month, so that we may prop up the Constitution, and provide for its sound working?" But they did nothing of the kind. They were prepared to allow the Constitution to totter to its fall, in order to take advantage of the opportunity to make their own political calling and election sure. He says that the Government did not proceed with the Bill last session because they had no reasonable hope of passing it. So that we have the spectacle of the Ministry coming down to the House, and saying—"We believe there is a mandate from the people for the immediate institution of this High Court. We believe, further, that serious consequences will ensue if this Court is not established, and that millions of money may be involved." Then, on being reminded of their previous abandonment of the measure, they explain—"We did not press the Bill last session, because we thought that the House would not pass it." This is a view of Ministerial responsibility which, fortunately, is not often taken by those who hold the reins of government. The Constitution has apparently been allowed to stand aside, whilst the necessities of office have been attended to. Now, however, that all has been made secure by the passing of the Tariff, and by the enactment of other legislation, Ministers feel themselves in a position to venture forth and to pay some regard to the Constitution. The question we have to consider is not whether it is technically right that the High Court should be established. I am quite prepared to subscribe to that reading of the Constitution, but I am not prepared to agree that the Court should be created just now. I do not believe that any harm will come to the Constitution, or that any serious consequences will be visited upon the people if we postpone action in this matter. We can give our States Courts jurisdiction beyond that which they already possess, and we can still rely upon the Privy Council as a court of appeal. Supposing that some case involving millions of money to the people of Australia were decided in an unsatisfactory manner in one of the States Courts, we should have the right to appeal to the Privy Council; and I venture to say that that body would read the Constitution as sympathetically, and with as much regard for our aspirations, as would the High Court which it is proposed to establish. We are told that we require to have our Constitution interpreted by Judges amidst Australian surroundings. On the other hand, it is alleged that the States Courts cannot be relied upon to decide Federal questions because of their local knowledge and local prejudices. Which is the right view to take? Is it right that our laws should be interpreted in the light of local knowledge and circumstances, or that they should be construed apart from any such influences? If the former proposition is to hold good, why cannot Judges of the States Courts do our work quite as efficiently as would those of the proposed High Court? On the other hand, why should we not place as full reliance upon the Privy Council, as in a Federal Court, which will be probably less free from the operation of local influences. In order to secure the passage of the Bill, the Government and those who are supporting the measure, profess to be eager to get rid of the Privy Council, because it is too far removed from local influences; then on the other hand the States Courts are incompetent to do Federal work because of them.

But it seems to me that in this connexion we have heard a number of inconsistent utterances. It has been urged, as an argument against vesting the Chief Justices of the States with Federal jurisdiction, that a Judge cannot serve two masters. That is a nice sentiment to come from a legal luminary who has been described by the Attorney-General as a "legal lynx." I was under the impression that a Judge should not serve any master but the law which he has to construe and administer. We pay our Judges high salaries and make them absolutely independent so that they shall have no master, and if they are independent in relation to their ordinary occupation, why should they be less so when they are called upon to perform the higher and more important duty of interpreting our Federal Constitution. The Attorney-General devoted a good deal of attention to the question of the expense that will be involved in the establishment of the High Court, but it is only fair to the Prime Minister, and the honorable and learned member for Indi, to say that they snap their fingers at all considerations of cost. They ask—"Is it right that the High Court should be established?" and having answered that question in the affirmative they say—"It must be created, and that immediately." The Attorney-General said he was going to prove that economy would be served by the establishment of the High Court, but he entirely confounded himself when he started to quote precedents. Every precedent mentioned by the Attorney-General showed that the administration of the law was very costly. In New South Wales, the Supreme Court involves an expense of £79,000 per annum, and in Victoria £43,000 per annum, whilst the total cost of administering justice throughout the Commonwealth, including the police, is stated to be £1,750,000 per annum. Yet the Attorney-General tried to persuade us that the High Court would prove comparatively inexpensive, whereas we have every reason to suppose that it will be equally costly with the Courts which are maintained in the various States. There are 82 pages of printed matter in the High Court Procedure Bill dealing with matters of procedure, and I am perfectly sure that the Federal Judiciary will involve an outlay very much in excess of the amount named by the Attorney-General. The area to be covered is much wider than that of any State Supreme Court, and this must have a great influence upon the cost of administration. If the High Court Judges are to travel over this continent to dispense justice to the people in every State, heavy expense must be incurred. In just such degree as we decrease the cost of litigation to the public we shall add to the outlay upon the Federal Judiciary. Either we must take the Judges to the witnesses, or bring the witnesses over the continent to the Judges, and I am entirely at a loss to understand how the Attorney-General makes up his estimate. The Attorney-General has stated that for the purposes of the Federal Judiciary, we shall be able to obtain the use of State buildings; but I should imagine that his experience would lead him to quite a contrary conclusion. In every case in which we require to use State buildings, the State Governments very rightly expect us to pay a fair rental. In Sydney I know that constant complaints have been made that there is not sufficient accommodation for those who are engaged upon the affairs of the State, and I am sure that no State building in that city will be available for the accommodation of the Federal Judiciary. This will tend to increase the cost of the proposed new Department. Considerations of expense, however, would not weigh with me if we had no alternative method of administering justice with satisfaction to the people. I believe that if we clothe our States Courts with the necessary power to deal with cases involving Federal questions and preserve our right to appeal to the Privy Council, we shall act for the benefit of the general community, and shall find it unnecessary to establish a High Court for a few years. We are told by the Prime Minister that anybody who talks about finance in connexion with the establishment of this Court is a "miserable" individual, but I venture to say that the question of finance will have to be faced by the Government very resolutely in the near future. The payment of the sugar bonus alone will cost the Commonwealth £350,000 a year, an additional £75,000 annually must be added for the maintenance of this Court, whilst the Inter-State Commission, if created, will cost still another £10,000 annually. Then the expense connected with the office of High Commissioner in London will probably represent another £10,000. It is high time, therefore, that we considered this matter of finance, quite regardless of whether, for so doing, we are dubbed "miserable individuals" by the Prime Minister. By that means we shall make the people more contented with the Federation into which they have entered. I openly confess that the time will come when a High Court will be needed. That time, however, is not yet. Questions may arise connected with the riparian rights of the different States, and the Inter-State Commission, but that tribunal has not yet been created. When we have overcome the troubles incidental to the birth throes of our Federal Constitution it will be quite time enough for us to consider the creation of the High Court. That, I submit, is not political immorality; it is simple political expediency. We ought to consider the Constitution from a practical stand-point rather than to strain it in the direction of setting up every arm and attribute which it may eventually require.

Mr. L. E. GROOM (Darling Downs).—I rise to support the Bill in its present form. Unfortunately I have not had the privilege of hearing the speeches which were delivered upon it during the two preceding days, but upon listening to the debate this afternoon, I was struck with the fact that history is repeating itself. One might almost imagine that he was hearing a repetition of the arguments which were advanced at the time of the establishment of the Dominion Court of Canada. The same reasons which are being advanced now were brought forward in that case. It was urged by some that there was no need for the creation of that tribunal, as no important constitutional questions had arisen. Others again contended that the States Courts of the Dominion had done magnificently, and that it could well afford to defer the establishment of the High Court. The argument as to the great cost that would be involved in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution was also advanced.

Mr. GLYNN.—The arguments turned out to be well founded in the case of Canada.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I am glad that the Dominion of Canada saw fit to establish its High Court. That Court has grown in power, dignity, and influence.

Mr. WILKS.—No one doubts that the Australian Court will grow, if it is once given a start.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Its growth will be a reflex of the growth of the liberties of the Australian people. I believe it is absolutely imperative, under the terms of the Constitution, that we should establish this Court. It has been said that the Prime Minister has endeavoured to play upon the use of the word "shall" in our Constitution. But I would point out that that word emphasizes the commands of our people. We have to look at the whole of the terms of our Constitution, and having done so, to ask ourselves what is the plan that was put before the people. But we are told that no elaborate argument was employed upon the platform in reference to the use of the word "shall." Yet the honorable member who urged that, admits he was aware that the creation of the High Court was part of the Federal scheme. I would further say—as was pointed out by the honorable member for South Australia, Sir Langdon Bonython—that the less populous States were assured that they could enter the Federal Union with perfect safety, because their rights would be protected by the High Court, which would be established to interpret the Constitution. That was the very basis of the Federal scheme. It was an attempt to reconcile the national and States rights. Even at the present time it is being urged that this Parliament is endeavouring to use powers which, under the Constitution, it does not possess. We are told that many of our statutes contain provisions which are absolutely contrary to the Constitution, and it is alleged that we are delaying the establishment of the High Court, simply because we desire to arrogate to ourselves powers which we have no right to exercise.

Mr. WILKS.—We have a tribunal to which we can go now.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I will deal with that matter presently. In the smaller States complaints are being made that the Constitution is being violated, and that there is no tribunal in existence to decide the point. What tribunal is there to decide upon the validity of the Electoral Act, or upon the question of the right of an individual who has been refused the registration of his vote? In such circumstances he would require to obtain a mandamus to compel the electoral officer to put his name on the roll. Upon one of the most important powers which the citizens possess, namely, that of the exercise of the franchise, there is no legal tribunal in Australia which can compel any officer to the performance of his duty. Therefore we should have some such tribunal constituted. We know that it is the duty of the High Court to interpret our Constitution fairly, and that the Supreme Court of the United States has equitably held the balance as between the States and the national powers. At the same time, where a reasonable construction justified it, it has not hesitated to give to the national Parliament all those powers which are absolutely necessary to the proper discharge of its functions. The Constitution itself is a mere sheet of paper. The value of the American Constitution lies in the fact that, notwithstanding the varying circumstances which the people had to face, it was able to adapt itself to their conditions. But what is the living voice of their Constitution? Undoubtedly it is the Supreme Court. I say that in the Commonwealth we have need for a similar institution. Honorable members have not denied that the Constitution contains clauses which direct that the judicial power shall be vested in somebody.

Mr. MCCAY.—For the time being.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—It is recognised that the Commonwealth has legislative, executive, and judicial functions. We are told that there is no mandate that the judicial powers shall be vested in the High Court. In this connexion I wish to refer to one high authority, namely, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, who, in his speech upon the Inter-State Commission Bill, interpreted the words of section 101—

There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary, &c., as constituting a mandate for the establishment of that tribunal. I cannot understand why he cannot see that the same reasoning which is applicable to that Commission is also applicable to the High Court itself. We are told by some honorable members that, because no time limitation is imposed under the Constitution, Parliament can indefinitely postpone the creation of a High Court. I say that the only interpretation which can be placed upon the fact that no limitation as to time has been imposed is that which has been put upon it by the Prime Minister. He used the words "political exigencies," and declared that, under the Constitution, so soon as matters such as the Tariff had been dealt with, Parliament was bound to fulfil the whole Federal scheme. Others again urge that there is no necessity for the creation of the High Court, because the States Courts could be made to fulfil all its duties. The honorable member for Parramatta has said that, up to the present time, no important constitutional questions have arisen, quite oblivious of the fact that there have been cases connected with the power of the Commonwealth to tax State property, and with the right of a State Government to tax the incomes of Federal officers. The important principle underlying the latter question is, as was pointed out during the course of the arguments used by counsel, that the power to tax implies the power to destroy. The same principle applies to the Federal Parliament. The power to tax State incomes would also imply a power practically to destroy State agencies. It strikes at the very foundation of our powers and privileges, and surely it is a most important constitutional question. What more important constitutional question could we have than that of breaking Federal Customs seals on ships upon the high seas. That matter has been decided by the Victorian Full Court. It has been held by that Court that in such circumstances the breaking of the Federal Customs seals on board a British vessel is an infringement of the law, and renders the master of the vessel liable to be fined. In New South Wales it was decided by the State Court that the master of a foreign vessel coming into port with broken seals was liable to be fined for this offence. These are very important constitutional matters. In the one case it was held that the Commonwealth had power practically to fine a person who was not a British subject for a breach of the Commonwealth laws, while in the other it was held that a fine could be inflicted upon a man who, while being a British subject, was not domiciled here. There are many other important cases which might be cited. Take the case which occurred in Western Australia a few days ago. The Punishment of Offences Act says that the judicial powers of the Commonwealth in regard to inferior courts shall be exercised only by a stipendiary, a special, or a police magistrate. And yet in Western Australia two justices of the peace convicted a certain person, and a Supreme Court Judge there held that he had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from that decision. We are told that there is no necessity for this Court, but I am showing that many important constitutional questions are coming up for decision, and that in order that we may have these matters satisfactorily determined, it is absolutely essential that we should at once constitute one of the very best tribunals that we can obtain. We are told now that the States Courts are doing magnificent work, and that we, as a Commonwealth, might very well agree to accept their decisions. But some of them are not wholly satisfactory. Even if a decision suited the Commonwealth it might not suit the individual on the other side.

MR. GLYNN.—There will always be one party who is not suited.

MR. L. E. GROOM.—Exactly. I am only showing that these constitutional questions are coming up for decision from time to time, and that the States Courts are being called upon to determine them. A most unsatisfactory feature of the present position is that even when a vital constitutional question is settled in the Supreme Court of one of the States, there is no guarantee that it will be binding upon the Commonwealth as a whole. The decision of a State Court is binding only in the State in which it is given. I know from experience that lawyers who are in practice in one State are unable to regard a decision given in another State with any degree of certainty, and cannot advise their clients to take action upon that determination. They feel that the Court of Queensland is not bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, nor is the latter Court bound by the decision of the Queensland tribunal. Thus, if we are to utilize our States Courts as we have been doing, we shall require to have the same question raised in each State in order to secure uniformity, or else have the matter determined by some action taken on appeal to the Privy Council. We know, however, that under the procedure adopted in some of the States Courts, those tribunals are courts of final appeal. For instance, we have been told that the decision given by Chief Justice Madden affecting the validity of the Customs Act was final. It was only when a subsequent case involving the same point arose, and was referred to the Full Court, that the decision given by the Chief Justice was overruled. If we desire to secure uniformity of decision, it is absolutely necessary that we should establish the High Court. We have been told that we can constitute a sort of floating court of Chief Justices. That, however, is not the scheme contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. CAMERON.—It would do for the present.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—No; because such a Court would be unconstitutional.

Mr. MCCAY. — No one seriously proposes it

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I am glad to hear that the proposal has been withdrawn. It was suggested by the honorable and learned member for South Australia, Mr. Glynn. It has been put forward, however, by the Premier of Queensland, who says that such a Court should be constituted.

Mr. MCCAY.—He has not a vote in this House.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That is true; but he holds an important position in the community, and with perfect honesty, no doubt, he is endeavouring to influence public opinion on the subject. He has voiced that suggestion, which has been freely discussed by the public, and it is right that we should have the matter settled, so that we may know where we stand. If the suggestion is wrong, let us give reasons in this House for our opposition to it. I did not hear the speech delivered last night by the honorable and learned member for Indi, but I have come to the same conclusion as he has, that if we are going to constitute a Court, we must carry out the provisions of the Constitution, which have been enacted for the due administration of justice. The Constitution provides for the appointment of Judges with a certain tenure of office. They are to be removable only in a certain way, and are to be paid out of the funds of the Commonwealth. Could we apply those conditions to a floating court of Chief Justices, or create a court of appeal which would not be the High Court? Such a thing is not contemplated by the Constitution. The Constitution contemplates the High Court itself as the court of appeal. If we establish the High Court, as I hope we shall, we should constitute it in a way that will cause it to command the respect and the confidence of the whole of the people of Australia. For reasons which I shall show, it is important that we should create it at this time to deal with constitutional questions. At the very outset there will be applied to the Constitution itself certain rules of interpretation or construction with respect to the powers of the States and the Commonwealth, and those decisions will establish very important precedents. The Privy Council, assuming it to be the only court of appeal that we have, and the highest Court in the realm, may, by reason of its want of touch with Australian feeling and history, give a construction to the Constitution which will be absolutely out of sympathy with our national hopes and aspirations. There may be an appeal to the Privy Council in certain circumstances, and we must admit that in some instances that right of appeal has been attended with good results to us. For example, there was the case of Chung Togy. Musgrove. The Victorian Court held that an alien who was refused admission into this State had a right to bring an action for damages. An appeal to the Privy Council practically upheld the right of the Executive to exclude aliens. That was a very useful decision to us—that we have the right to control our citizenship by our own Executive acts, and that an alien cannot bring an action for damages against us. It meant, really, that there was a wrong without a remedy.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Court said it was a case for international remonstrance.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—That may be, but before any case goes to the Privy Council, the highest tribunal that Australia can establish should first have an opportunity of hearing that matter, and of coming to a decision on the arguments laid before it. That decision would probably be the true interpretation of Australian feeling. It comes rather as a surprise to me to find that so many honorable members are opposed to the establishment of the High Court. I have casually picked up the first volume of the Commonwealth Statutes, to see to what extent our existing legislation recognises the existence of the High Court. I find that only last year we passed an Electoral Act, under which we deprived ourselves of the power to sit as a Court of Disputed Returns, and provided, in section 193, that—

The High Court shall be the Court of Disputed Returns, and shall have jurisdiction either to try the petition, or to refer it for trial to the Supreme Court of the State in which the election was held or return made.

Then there is a temporary provision that until the High Court is established, the State Court may deal with the matter. Thus the House from the first has kept the High Court to the front. Next, I turned to the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act, and I find that in section 15, provision is made for bringing an action for compensation in the High Court. In section 245 of the Customs Act, it is provided that—

Customs prosecutions may be instituted in the name of the Minister by action, information or other appropriate proceeding—

- (a) In the High Court of Australia; or
- (b) In the Supreme Court of any State.

The right is also given to bring such cases in any other Court. The same procedure is followed in section 134 of the Excise Act, in regard to excise prosecutions. Any one glancing through our Statutes would gather that the intention of this Parliament was to keep the High Court well to the front, and that we were only passing this necessary machinery legislation in contemplation of the fact that we should shortly establish the High Court.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What does the honorable and learned member mean by "shortly."

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—As soon as we can get the necessary machinery measures through. I find that in the Punishment of Offences Act exactly the same provision is in force. It is there provided, pending the establishment of the High Court, that these offences may be prosecuted in the inferior tribunals.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is clearly an expression of opinion in them all that the High Court can wait.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—Wait until this machinery has been passed so that it can be put in its proper position. Do these provisions suggest a High Court consisting merely of a few Chief Justices? Does not the provision in regard to a Judge sitting in the Court of Disputed Returns show that it was intended that we should have a single Judge sitting in the High Court? When we have passed the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill, as I hope we will, I trust that we shall further utilize the services of the Judges of the High Court, and that the Arbitration Court will be presided over by one of those Judges. We are told that the High Court would put us to very great expense, but I think the Attorney-General has shown that it is intended to utilize the existing States' machinery as far as possible, and that the only additional expense involved, so far as administrative matters are concerned, will be in the establishment of a central registry. That will require a comparatively small number of officers. Perhaps, for some time to come in Victoria, these duties may be fulfilled by the officers here. As regards the Judges, their salaries must be an additional expense, but I hope that the remuneration which we shall fix will be sufficient to command the services of the best men. The Attorney-General was right in saying that the result of the establishment of the High Court would be a reduction in certain directions of the number of Justices of the Supreme Courts. What has happened in Queensland? Only last session it was decided that the salaries of future Chief Justices of that State should be reduced by £1,000 per annum. The salary of the present Chief Justice has not been touched, for the whole of the Judges in the Commonwealth have existing rights which cannot be interfered with. As soon as the present Judges retire on their pensions, or cease to occupy the Bench, reductions will undoubtedly be made. We were told before Federation was established that the transfer of the administration of certain Departments to the Commonwealth, and the substitution of one central authority for the various State authorities, would of necessity bring about economy in State expenditure, and we know that economy and retrenchment are now being practised by the States. The sneer has been cast at those who are supporting the Bill that we are being guided too much by American precedent. If we are being so guided, we are copying an excellent model. Let us consider what the Supreme Court of the United States has done for that Constitution. Willoughby, in his History of the Supreme Court of the United States, says—

The Supreme Court is 100 years old, and during this time, but one change in the field of its jurisdiction, and none in the nature of its powers has been found necessary. Its very form has remained without substantial change since its creation by the Judiciary Act of 1789. For a century this Court has performed with exactness all the duties required of it. Since its inception it has been the firm supporter of that instrument which created it. Scarcely ever has it been out of touch with the people. Its bar has numbered among its members men of the highest intellect: Webster, Marshall, Pinckney, West. Its Justices have been men whose greatness the world has recognised, and whom the United States has been proud to call her own. To-day the Supreme Court stands the highest judicial tribunal in the world's history.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is he a lawyer?

Mr. DEAKIN.—He is a Professor of History in the University of Philadelphia.

Mr. L. E. GROOM.—I will quote another authority—a passage from Landon's The Constitutional History and Government of the United States—

The Court expounds the Constitution in the language of its own age, holding fast to the old words and power, but expanding them to keep pace with the expansion of our own country, our people, our enterprises, industries, and civilization. . . . It is plain now that we are largely indebted to the Court for our continued existence as a nation, and for the harmony, stability, excellence and success of our Federal system.

Those are the words of an authority of no mean standing. If we follow the example of a Court which, for more than a century, has so successfully interpreted the parchment deed which comprises the Constitution of America as to harmonize its provisions with the gradual expansion of a vast nation like the people of the United States, we shall follow a very good precedent. I believe that in Australia we shall in time produce a Court of equal ability. Of the American Judiciary it has been well said—

It is a power which has no guards, palaces, or treasures, no arms but truth and wisdom, and no splendour but its justice and the publicity of its judgments.

In Australia we have a Bar of which we may be proud, and we have had Judges of whom we may be proud. And I believe that under the aspirations of our fuller national life, our lawyers will rise to still greater heights, so that the Judges of the High Court will be men of whom Australia will be proud.

Mr. A. PATERSON (Capricornia).—Honestly speaking, I should prefer to keep my seat on the present occasion, but the all-compelling power of conscience, to which reference was made by the honorable and learned member for Indi last night, urges me to say a word or two. Being a mere layman, I do not intend to make an exhibition of myself by attempting to argue with the legal members of the House as to the meaning and scope of a verb, or the significance and intention of an adverb. Nor shall I express any opinion as to what provisions of the Constitution are mandatory and what merely optional. But I wish for a little information, and I should like the Attorney-General to give it to me. If the Government advocate the immediate establishment of the High Court upon the ground that it is required by a mandatory provision of the Constitution, I should like to know why they have not paid the same respect to section 65, which says that—

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the Ministers of State shall not exceed seven in number, and shall hold such offices as the Parliament prescribes, or in the absence of provision, as the Governor-General directs.

But, instead of seven, we have nine Ministers, and, so far as I remember, the appointment of two additional so-called honorary Ministers was never brought before the House at all, but was done by Executive act. If the Government can play fast and loose with a provision of the Constitution, surely Parliament has a right to choose its time for the performance of a duty in regard to which the Constitution is mandatory. I have had very great pleasure in listening to the debate. It has been an inspiration and an education to me, and I feel almost ashamed to follow the brilliant and eloquent debaters whom we have heard. I owe a debt of gratitude to them for the masterly way in which the subject has been handled from all points. But I am not satisfied that the Government and those who support the measure have made out a good case for its urgency, and that, after all, is the main point. We all agree as to the necessity for the ultimate establishment of the High Court; but some of us contend that its immediate establishment is not necessary. The Government themselves exercised discretion in the matter. Parliament had been sitting nine or ten months before it was brought forward at all, and then, instead of nailing their colors to the mast, as they should have done if they considered the Constitution mandatory upon the point, Ministers allowed the Bill to disappear without taking it to a division. I do not blame them for that action, because I believe that it has saved the country £60,000, and that if we wait a little longer we shall save another £60,000. One of the strongest advocates for the Bill says that there is no power under the Constitution to compel us to pass the measure, save the still small voice of conscience. I am considerably relieved by that statement. If only my conscience stands in the way, I can get over the difficulty. Men do not pay income tax, as some unfortunate people have been doing during the last few days, because their consciences compel them to do so, but because they are afraid of the bailiff, though tender consciences sometimes prompt people to remit so-called "conscience money" to the Minister for Trade and Customs. But the conscience argument must not be pushed too far. I have heard it applied in defence of the betrayal of his Master by the apostate Judas. He was paid his price—30 pieces of silver—and his conscience compelled him to carry out his contract. That argument, however, is unfortunate, and the example not one to be followed. Can we justify the committal of a crime in order to carry out the provisions of the Constitution? I consider it is no less than a crime to pile up expenditure which is not proved to be necessary. Every man knows that the financial difficulties which have been experienced throughout Australia, from the Gulf of Carpentaria to Warrnambool, have been very serious, and that the strain which has in consequence been imposed upon the community will continue until our crops for next season are assured. In the meantime there is a large amount of distress in Australia, and it will be difficult to explain to the electors why the Government should at this time, above all others, incur large expense in establishing a court that is not required. Who wants it, anyhow? The only private suitors will be the banks, mortgage companies, financial institutions, and great trading concerns. The representatives of these interests petitioned the Federal Convention not to deprive them of the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and it is certain that if the High Court were appointed to-morrow these litigants would carry their appeals direct to the Privy Council. In the course of the magnificent speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Indi, to which I listened with a great deal of pleasure, he cast a serious slight upon the Privy Council; but we need not wonder at that, because his experience of that body may not have been quite so fortunate as he expected. If the Bill now before us is of an urgent character, it must also have been of pressing importance when it was introduced last session; and after the way in which the Government failed to persevere with it then, I do not understand why they should make such a fuss about it now. I think we should wait until the machinery is required before we attempt to provide it. With regard to the economic aspect of the question, what are we to think of the Attorney-General, who referred to the enormous expenditure upon the Supreme Courts of Australia, and then proposed to relieve the burdens of the people by calling upon them to pay another £30,000 per annum. There is no analogy between the case of the United States and our own. The American people constitute an independent republic, and they have no Privy Council to which they can appeal. On the other hand, we have close ties with the mother country, and enjoy the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I think that the most effective shot fired against the Bill was that which was discharged by the Attorney-General himself. When the honorable and learned member for Bendigo stated that public opinion was opposed to the establishment of the High Court at the present time—in which view I thoroughly agree—the Attorney-General interjected that public opinion needed to be educated. I think that gives away the whole case for the Bill. If we agree that the public mind requires to be educated upon the subject of the creation of the High Court, then we have a very strong reason for postponing the further consideration of the Bill. It will take a great deal of education to make the electors whom I represent recognise the necessity for any such expenditure as that now proposed. I wish to make only one more observation, regarding a far more important matter than the mandate which is said to be contained in the Constitution. Whilst I feel lost in admiration of the power and skill and patriotism of the framers of the Constitution, I could have wished that they had included in it some provision under which no Member of Parliament could be appointed to a position upon the High Court Bench.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—It is due to honorable members that I should avoid detaining them any longer than may be absolutely necessary, and I shall therefore refrain from making any formal reply. Let me confine my remarks to one or two matters to which I desire to call attention before the vote is taken. I do not see the honorable and learned member for Indi in his place, but I received from him very early this morning a letter, in which he requested that if he were not present at the opening of our sitting to-day, I should call attention to a misconception of the arguments which he was privileged to present to honorable members last night. He writes—

As stated by me last night, I have no doubt whatever that section 71 of the Constitution creates a definite mandate upon Parliament to proceed to organize and equip the High Court in any event whether it creates or invests other Courts or not; that it would be and is contrary to the clear spirit and intention of the Constitution that any other Court should be authorized to exercise any Judicial power without the existence of the High Court. In other words, the judicial power is according to plain constitutional intention, either to be exercised by and under the supervision of the High Court or not at all.

I also stated that the point had never yet been raised how far that intention would be insisted on by the Courts, and it is just here that my anxiety arises, lest my views, as a lawyer, and my reasons as a legislator may have been mingled in expression.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. Is it in order for an honorable member to make two speeches in the House on the same subject—the one regularly and the other by means of a letter? I submit that the letter of the honorable and learned member for Indi is not merely an explanation, but is an elaboration of his arguments, and that therefore the Attorney-General is not in order in reading it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have no hesitation in ruling that the reading of this letter by the Attorney-General as part of his reply is perfectly in accordance with the standing orders.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I might have expressed the honorable and learned member's views in my own words, but I thought it better to adhere to his own. His letter continues—

I think the House should be told before the Bill goes to a vote, and I should be glad if you would do it in your reply, that it is my opinion a court of law would, in accordance with established practice and precedent, struggle and strive if reasonably possible to uphold the validity of any Act of Parliament, and would strain so to construe section 71 as to enable Parliament if that construction be at all possible to confer jurisdiction on the State Courts even though no High Court be established. Of course the Courts in deciding the question would be confronted with the serious consideration presented by the manifest intention of the clause as above indicated, and with the principles enunciated in Martin v. Hunter quoted by me last evening. But still the canons of construction adopted by both English and American tribunals would tend to give every fair chance to uphold the investiture of State Courts even though no High Court be organised, on the ground that the exercise of Judicial power may be severed and distributed subject to the express limitation of the Constitution.

This result would be, I repeat, quite opposed to what was intended, and we as a Parliament ought to feel bound by the intention and to act on it. But the House must understand my view as a lawyer also, that if the Parliament refuses to act on it, the disposition of the Courts in the first instance will be to uphold the validity of the Act if they can, and to follow the view taken by Parliament, though they may feel eventually coerced by the intention to hold otherwise.

The honorable and learned member found himself very seriously misconstrued upon this point, and he thought it only just to honorable members who might have been affected by his arguments that he should state exactly the limitation by which he found himself bound—the limitation which the Prime Minister, who was quite unaware of this letter, expressed to-day in almost identical terms. I regret the absence of the honorable member for Gippsland, whose attention I wish to call to a financial comparison instituted by him that cannot be sustained. He pointed out that the estimate of the cost of the Commonwealth officially supplied before the referendum, and criticized from nearly every platform during the Federal campaign, fixed that cost at a maximum of £300,000. He then proceeded to quote on the other side as evidence that the estimate had been already exceeded, the loss which he stated would result from the action of Parliament in granting a rebate of £2 per ton upon white-grown sugar. The honorable member in adding this amount to the cost of the Commonwealth, quite ignored the fact that the £300,000 estimate, as its details show, related simply to the cost of the machinery of the Constitution, and to nothing else. It in no way pretended to foreshadow the probable cost of any policy that Parliament might choose to follow in regard to black labour or white labour, the transcontinental railway, public works, old-age pensions, or the hundred-and-one other enterprises in which this Parliament might engage.

Mr. WILKINSON.—That estimate of the cost of federation was made before Queensland had consented to join.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, the £300,000. Items such as I have indicated cannot be taken into account in any comparison of the actual with the estimated cost of the Commonwealth, because the estimate was made with regard to the cost of working the Commonwealth, and had no reference to any matter arising out of possible policies pursued by Parliament. If the comparison adopted by the honorable member is to be employed, the revenue which has been derived by the Commonwealth and the savings it has effected must also be taken into account, and we shall be at once launched upon an unending sea of financial controversy. I would, therefore, suggest to the honorable member that the comparison which he instituted was one which, on further consideration, he will not attempt to sustain. The honorable member for Capricornia, whose apt and humorous criticisms we were pleased to hear, has directed my attention to section 67 of the Constitution, but he has unfortunately overlooked section 64, which prescribes that Ministers of State shall be also members of the Federal Executive Council. There are only seven Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth. The other two gentlemen who have so generously and handsomely lent their valued assistance to the Government, are Federal Executive Councillors—to whose number there is no limit—but they are not the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth; so that there has been no breach of the section to which the honorable member has been good enough to call attention. He also wishes to know where any indication has been given that the High Court is required. I may inform the honorable member that, beginning in Queensland, he will find it expressed in the chief metropolitan organ of that State, also in the greatest provincial newspaper in Queensland, namely, the Toowoomba Chronicle, a recent issue of which contains the very best analysis of this measure I have seen published. Both the leading Sydney newspapers, and many newspapers published in the country districts of New South Wales, support the Bill, and, in Tasmania, the Launceston Daily Telegraph recently published the keenest critical article upon the Bill that I have read. In South Australia, an attitude generally favorable to the Court has been taken up by the daily paper which has the greatest circulation in that State, and the same applies to Western Australia. In fact, everywhere except in Victoria, the High Court has found staunch advocates.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Geelong Advertiser favours the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That, in itself, should be regarded as conclusive evidence as to the necessity for passing the measure. The only thing required to clinch it is the support of the Ballarat Courier. There is one error which I wish to correct. The President of the Victorian Reform League, Mr. Palmer, is reported in one of the newspapers to have quoted me as having spoken of the Judges of the States Courts as being "tainted with local prejudice." I felt sure that I did not use any such words, and after having undergone the pain and suffering of reading through the official report of my speech, I find that no such words occur. No intention was further from my thoughts than to pass such an imputation upon the Judges. I made none directly or indirectly. What I did point out was that cases in which the interests of the States were directly involved could not be properly remitted to such Courts. One of the closest and most able attacks upon the Bill proceeded from the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, who is also a vigilant student of contemporary legal proceedings. I am the more surprised, therefore, to find that the list of cases which he presented to the House as representing the amount of litigation in which the Commonwealth was engaged, or in which Federal legislation was directly affected, before the Supreme Courts of the States was by no means complete. That list contains 22 cases. Even if it were complete, it would tell a tale in favour of the view which I have advocated, rather than of that for which the honorable and learned member is contending. According to him, in the first year there were four cases, in the second, ten, and in the four or five months of the present year there have been eight. It is undeniable, therefore, that Federal litigation is being rapidly multiplied. But in addition to the 22 cases which have been mentioned, I have been able, since the honorable and learned member gave the House the benefit of his list, to add 24 more, all of which have come before the States Supreme Courts, four in Chambers, and the remainder before the Full Court or a Supreme Court in some form or other. Of these I find that four occurred in the first year, ten in the second, and the balance in the portion of this year which has already expired. There are other cases of which I know, not included in this list.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—How many Full Court cases are there?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I see there was a case that came before the Full Court of Tasmania, which my honorable and learned friend has not mentioned, and another which came before the Full Court in Queensland. What do these figures show taken together? That there were six cases in 1901, twenty in 1902, and that there have been eighteen in the four months of the present year. Yet honorable members criticise this Bill on the assumption that only twenty cases have been tried since the inception of the Commonwealth. I would further point out that there have been scores of cases heard in the minor Courts, and in addition to these a number of others now in progress, but which have not yet reached the Full Courts. I could compile a much longer list if I chose, but merely mention these facts to combat the statement that cases arising out of Federal legislation do not exist in a great number. I hold that they do exist in a great number, and are multiplying with rapidity. I have but one comment to add, and that I owe to a leading member of the Victorian Bar. This gentleman has pointed out to me that honorable members appear to overlook the important results certain to be realized in the fulfilment of the Federal movement so far as it makes towards unity by the operation of an Australian Court of Appeal. At the present time there is a great divergence amongst the laws passed by the several States, and the greatest ignorance prevails on the part of the people of one State regarding the form and character of the legislation enacted by neighbouring States upon important matters. If these laws are challenged in any respect before a local tribunal, the case arouses no more than local interest, and no news of it passes beyond the borders of the State in which it is tried. Consequently the public never hear of it. On the other hand, if appeals are taken from the Supreme Courts to the Privy Council, what echoes from the proceedings of that body find their way to this country? Only professional men note the result and apply it in their own particular States. An Australian tribunal would assist the education of the people in regard to the operation of the laws under which they live, when studied in the light of the contrasts which exist in the various States. When an Australian tribunal is created, and all such matters are considered within the sight and hearing of the people, the divergences at present existing will be brought under notice, and many of them will disappear. A Federal Court would contribute in no inconsiderable measure to Australian unity of State law, and this would prove in the future an invaluable factor in securing uniformity of legal interpretation within the bounds of the Commonwealth.

Question—That the Bill be now read a second time—put. The House divided.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clause 1 (Short title).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).—It would be as well if the Attorney-General would now consent to have progress reported, because several important matters can be settled on this clause.

Mr. DEAKIN.—On the title? Surely not.

Mr. GLYNN.—I think they can be.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is a very inconvenient way of settling them, but I will agree to report progress if the honorable and learned member wishes.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

CASE OF MR. GOLDRING: ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Sir EDMUND BARTON) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—May I ask the Prime Minister if he has received further information yet with respect to the case of Mr. Goldring, in Sydney? Have the Government yet taken steps to enable justice to be done?

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat — Attorney-General).—I am unfortunately not yet in receipt of all the particulars, for which I have telegraphed to the Customs Department in Sydney. But I received to-day a petition from Mr. Goldring himself, in which he sets out that certain of his goods and his books have been seized by the Department in Sydney, and in which he asks the Government to appoint a nominal defendant in order that he may proceed against us under the powers conferred by the Claims against the Commonwealth Act. I have to-day signed a minute, which will be presented to the Executive Council at its next meeting, appointing a defendant, so that Mr. Goldring will now have no difficulty.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Was there any delay in appointing a nominal defendant?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No; I received the petition to-day, and signed the minute at once.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I desire to ask the Prime Minister when he intends to proceed with the Bills relating to sugar rebates and bonuses, the second readings of which were moved this afternoon?

Sir EDMUND BARTON (Hunter—Minister for External Affairs).—For reasons connected with finance, which will be understood by most honorable members, the Treasurer is anxious to get those two sugar Bills disposed of as soon as possible. We shall go on with them on Tuesday, because it is of great importance to have both of them dealt with in both Houses before the end of the month. After that the Judiciary Bill will be dealt with.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Senate.

Friday, 12 June, 1903.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

POSTMASTER PAYNE.

Senator PEARCE asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. In the case of Mr. Payne, postmaster, Subiaco, Western Australia, who is to be transferred to Bonnievale, what is the length of service of that officer as postmaster on the coastal district?

2. What is the length of service of officers of similar grade in the coastal district, and what is the length of service on the coast?

3. Does the Commissioner lay down any rule in determining transfers of officers between coastal and inland districts?

4. If so, has this rule been observed in Mr. Payne's case?

Senator DRAKE.—The answer to the honorable senator's questions is as follows:—

The necessary information is being obtained, and answers will be furnished as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE REGULATION 41.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I move—

That, in the opinion of the Senate, regulation 41 under the Public Service Act should be amended.

It will be remembered that when the Public Service Bill was before the Senate an amendment was moved to give public servants absolute political freedom, and that both Ministers of the Crown gave definite promises that in the administration of the law no drastic step would be taken to prevent public servants from doing what ought to be recognised as their public duty. But regulation 41, in a very definite manner, completely gags or stifles any political aspirations on their part. It is as follows:—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way promote political movements. They are further forbidden, to use for political purposes information gained by them in the course of duty.

I think that every one will agree with the latter part of the regulation, which says that no officer shall use any information which he has gained in the execution of his duty for the purpose of making political capital against probably the Minister in whose Department he is employed; but a time may come when a very large proportion of the population may be public servants. We have under consideration a proposal by Senator Pearce to make the tobacco industry a Commonwealth monopoly. If it is adopted, all persons engaged in the industry will become public servants, and the same regulation will apply to them. At this stage of the civilization of the world, are we justified in seeking to prevent men and women who probably have as much interest in the welfare of the country as have others from expressing their opinions and taking part in political movements so long as it does not interfere with the proper execution of their public duties? I do not think we are. I hold that the time has arrived when public servants should be put in exactly the same position as other citizens. I dare say there are representatives of the people who would like a public servant to be a mere automaton, to be moved about at the will of his superior officer, and the Minister under whose direction he labours; but I believe that those representatives of the people are very few, and I hope that they will become fewer until they entirely disappear. In face of the promises and protestations which were made in the Senate, it is a very singular thing to me to find the words "political movements" in this regulation. Why, sir, a public servant must not join any association which in any way exercises an influence in politics. There was a time in the history of social and industrial associations when politics and religion were tabooed, but that time has passed away, and almost every institution, no matter what its character may be, now recognises that the constitutional way of bringing about such alterations as it considers are in the interests of the people, is through the medium of the ballot-box. Very often we hear those who advocate the maintenance of good order and good government state that everything should be done in a constitutional manner, and that everything that is not done in that way is tantamount to violence, rebellion, or revolution. If we require the people of the Commonwealth to carry out all reforms in a constitutional manner, we should give every citizen perfect liberty to associate himself with the social and political movements which have for their object the betterment of the people and the alteration of the laws in any direction which may be desired. But if a public officer is expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way promote a political movement, then he has no interest in the Commonwealth, and can in no way affect its legislation, and consequently has no constitutional power. He might have a son or a daughter or a wife possessing rights which he did not possess. I do not think that any man should be placed in a position in which he would possess less power to bring about constitutional reform than any member of his family. Under a regulation of this description a public officer cannot join the Freemasons, because in certain directions they take an interest in political movements. He has no right to join the Victorian Economic League, because it is of a political character. He has no right to join the Victorian Alliance or a Temperance Alliance in any State, because it takes an interest in political movements. He cannot join the Australian Natives Association which, to my mind, and justly so, is becoming one of the strongest political institutions in Australia. I may tell Senator Fraser that under this regulation a public officer has no right to join an Orange Lodge because it takes an active interest in politics. In fact, a public officer is placed in such a position that he cannot join any of these organizations. Although we had the distinct promise of two Ministers of the Crown that no action of that kind was ever intended, yet it is clearly contemplated. What will be the position of a public servant when he reads the regulation, which is as binding upon him as is the Act itself? He will at once close up like an oyster and become a dead member of society so far as the politics of the Commonwealth are concerned. I have no intention to labour the question. I have endeavoured to state the matter as plainly as I could, and I hope that honorable senators will recognise the position in which the Commissioner is endeavouring to place public servants. It may be argued that it is not to the advantage of a public servant to take a practical interest in public questions, but that is a matter which should be left to his discretion. No impediment should be placed in his way. If he considers that it is his duty to discuss either political or municipal questions, then, so long as he does not violate the second portion of this regulation, he ought to be allowed to express his opinions. Any regulation which debars a public officer from expressing his opinions as a citizen does an injustice to him. It is monstrous that, at the beginning of the twentieth century, it should be stated in a regulation of the Commonwealth that a public officer is expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way to promote a political movement. I hope that the good sense of the Senate will be sufficiently strong to give public officers entire political liberty, subject always to the restriction which is imposed upon them by the second portion of the regulation.

Senator DRAKE (Queensland — Postmaster-General).—It is quite correct, as stated by Senator McGregor, that an amendment was moved on the Public Service Bill in the following terms :—

Nothing in this Act shall in any way prevent an officer becoming a member of any properly-constituted society or political association.

That amendment was discussed, and was eventually defeated by a majority of one vote. In glancing through the debate I do not find that any promise whatever was given as to the regulation that would be made.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Oh, yes.

Senator DRAKE.—Perhaps the honorable senator can point out where a promise of the kind was given by the Government. I cannot find it. The regulation that has been framed accords with the view that was taken, at all events by myself, in the course of the debate. Senator McGregor, in proposing this motion, has given some instances which he considers may be regarded as the results of such a regulation as has been framed. He quotes, perhaps legitimately, extreme cases. But he did not adhere to the words of the regulation. He spoke of "taking an interest in politics." There is nothing in the regulation to debar a public servant from taking an interest in politics, or even from becoming a member of a political association.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Would he not be promoting an association by becoming a member of it?

Senator DRAKE.—That is extremely doubtful. I do not think that the honorable senator is justified in assuming always that there will be a stupid and perverse administration of the Act. He cannot point to any facts whatever to lead the Senate to believe that the administration of any regulations made under the Public Service Act will be conducted in such a way. He referred to the national monopoly of tobacco in a State factory. Is there anything in the regulation that would affect employees in a factory of the kind, or prevent them becoming members of such an association as the Freemasons or the Economic Reform League alluded to by the honorable senator? Fairly read, the regulation must be taken to mean that a man who is occupying a position in the public service must not take a prominent part in politics.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It does not say so.

Senator DRAKE.—I have it here, and will read it—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way promote political movements.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is emphatic enough.

Senator DRAKE.—If it is fair for the honorable senator to take extreme instances of what might occur under a stupid and perverse administration, is it not justifiable for us to take into consideration what might happen if we had no regulations on the subject? What might occur in connexion with the Post and Telegraph Department appeals more particularly to me because the circumstances are more familiar to my mind. We must look at it from both points of view. I am afraid that some honorable senators look at how a rule of this kind is likely to operate in one direction, forgetting that it will work impartially both ways. How would it be if a postmaster or a telegraph master in a country town were president, or secretary, or chairman of a conservative political association? How would honorable senators like that?

Senator MCGREGOR.—He would have a perfect right to occupy such a position.

Senator DRAKE.—Would honorable senators think it a satisfactory state of affairs to have such an officer, holding a confidential position of that character, taking an active part in political controversies at a general election?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Certainly.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator says "Certainly."

Senator PEARCE.—He would not be compelled to do so.

Senator DRAKE.—But what happens? We will take the case of a justice of the peace. My Department is sometimes asked to allow an officer to be made a justice of the peace. In extreme cases, in remote parts of the country where there would be some difficulty in constituting a bench otherwise, we have consented to this being done. But always with great reluctance—not because there is anything derogatory in a man occupying the position of a justice of the peace, or anything wrong in going upon a bench. What we say is that an officer occupying the position of a post and telegraph master should not be forced into a situation where he might have to impose a check upon himself if he had information in his possession that had come to him confidentially. Is not that a correct view to take?

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not object to that portion of the regulation.

Senator DRAKE.—If it is desirable that we should not place postmasters in such positions for the reason I have given, it is desirable also that such officers should not be put in situations where there might be a conflict between their interests as members of a particular organization and their duty as confidential officers of a public Department.

Senator DAWSON.—But this regulation debars the whole service.

Senator DRAKE.—I am quoting admittedly extreme instances.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not say that the regulation should be struck out, but that it should be amended.

Senator DRAKE.—Amended in such a way as to allow an officer of a Department to be an active officer of political organization. And that is what I say would, in my opinion, be injurious to the public service. Take another aspect of the matter, and one that will occur to the memories of some honorable senators. It is a constant occurrence for me, as Postmaster-General, to receive applications from people for the transfer of post-offices from the premises of persons who are in business. The reason is not that anything is alleged against the honour or integrity of the persons engaged in business, and having the post-offices upon their premises, but that it is not desirable that a man in business should have the handling of the correspondence of other persons, who, perhaps, are engaged in similar businesses in the same town.

Senator PEARCE.—That is the case of a private shopkeeper being a postal official.

Senator DRAKE.—Quite so. Perhaps this difficulty has been brought home to Senator McGregor, as it has been brought home to nearly every member of Parliament. In cases of the kind there is nothing alleged against the person in question, but it is held that it is contrary to the public interest that a man who in a private ex-official occupation may become immersed in business should have his interest in business brought into conflict with his interest as an officer of the Department.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a different case.

Senator DRAKE.—It is a case which I am adducing to compare with those which Senator McGregor quoted in support of his motion for the alteration of this regulation. Honorable senators themselves would object to post and telegraph masters being engaged in a perfectly innocent occupation on the ground that it is undesirable that there should be a possible conflict of interests.

Senator DAWSON.—The objection of a trader is that his debtor may be an officer of the Postal Department.

Senator DRAKE.—No; the objection is that it is not desirable in a township where there are a number of persons trading that the correspondence of those traders should pass through the hands of one of them. There is nothing alleged against the person in question, but it is said that the practice is undesirable. On exactly the same principle, we say that it is not desirable that a man who is placed in an official position, say, a post and telegraph master, should take an active part in politics. We say that if he is the secretary or president, or a prominent member of a political association, while he may be perfectly honest, and there may be no probable case in which he would improperly use any information that came into his possession, such things shake the public confidence in the administration. The first time a postmaster was seen taking an active part in politics, there would be a feeling that eventually matters that came within his knowledge in the course of his occupation were not as safe as they would be in the hands of a man who was taking no active part in politics. That is the reason why I object to doing away with a rule of this kind in the public service. I think there is hardly a public service in any civilized community that has not a similar regulation. I do not know whether a reference will be made to the United States, as furnishing a contrary instance where persons who occupy positions in the public service do interest themselves considerably in political movements. But what does the practice lead to? Officials identifying themselves with a particular party have to sink or swim with that party.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable and learned senator say that that is the result of not having a regulation of this kind? He cannot have read the political history of the United States.

Senator DRAKE.—When one party goes out of office and another party comes in, wholesale changes are made in the Public Departments in the United States. I am not saying that the absence of a regulation of this kind requires that any such principle of administration should be adopted. But I do say that if officers of the public service interest themselves in political parties, and take sides in political controversies, it will be the beginning of a state of things leading up ultimately to the principle of the "spoils to the victors." In the interests of the public servants themselves it is desirable that they should not identify themselves either with one side or the other in party politics. This regulation, if not exactly word for word the same as the regulations that have existed in the States of the Commonwealth, is practically on the same lines. Every State in the Commonwealth has had a regulation of a similar character; that is to say, the general principle has been adopted that officers in the service of the Departments of the States shall not take a prominent part in politics. I shall just quote for the information of honorable senators the regulations in force in the public services of the various States—

New South Wales: In order that officers of all ranks may be enabled to render loyal and efficient service to the Government, they are expressly forbidden to take part in any political affairs otherwise than by recording their votes.

Victoria: In order that officers of all ranks may be enabled to render efficient and loyal service to the Government, they are expressly forbidden to take part in any political affairs, otherwise than by recording their votes for the election of Members of Parliament.

Queensland: Officers of all ranks are to refrain from taking any part in political affairs, otherwise than by the exercise of the franchise.

South Australia: Officers are hereby expressly required and enjoined not to take part in political affairs otherwise than by the exercise of the franchise.

Western Australia: Public servants are expressly forbidden from taking part in any political affairs otherwise than by the exercise of the franchise. Any public servant who uses for political purposes information gained by him in the course of duty shall be summarily dismissed.

Senator STYLES.—Has the honorable and learned senator any record of a ruling on the subject in connexion with the Railway Department of Victoria, or does he conclude that the Victorian regulation he has quoted applies to the whole of the public servants of that State?

Senator DRAKE.—I am not referring to the interpretation of the rule. I have quoted it from the regulations made under the Public Service Act of Victoria.

Senator STYLES.—I remind the honorable and learned senator that that rule does not apply to the railway service of Victoria.

Senator DRAKE.—I did not say that it does.

Senator STYLES.—The Railway Department in Victoria comprises by far the greater number of State employes.

Senator DRAKE.—How can that affect the question? We are now dealing with a regulation under the Commonwealth Public Service Act, which certainly does not apply to railway employes.

Senator STYLES.—I desired to know whether the honorable and learned senator thought that the Victorian rule, as quoted, applied to the Victorian Railway Department?

Senator DRAKE.—I presume not. Senator Styles knows better than I do what is the law in Victoria. Possibly the Public Service Act does not apply to railway officers in Victoria. It does not in Queensland, I know.

Senator DOBSON.—The important question is: who are included under the term "officers" used in this regulation.

Senator DRAKE.—All officers under the Commonwealth Public Service Act. Of course there are no railway employes included, because the Commonwealth has none. The officers concerned in this particular regulation under the Public Service Act of the Commonwealth are substantially persons occupying similar positions to those occupied by the officers affected by the regulations I have quoted under the Public Service Acts of the various States.

Senator BEST.—Does the word “officers” include every public servant of the Commonwealth?

Senator DRAKE.—There are one or two trifling exemptions under the Public Service Act, but, generally speaking, the word as used here, includes all the employes of the Commonwealth, and the honorable and learned senator will find that a definition of the word “officer” is given in the Act. How do the State regulations which I have quoted compare with the regulation under consideration now? The regulation under the Commonwealth Public Service Act says—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way promote political movements.

The latter part of the regulation is not, I believe, in any way challenged. That regulation framed by the Public Service Commissioner of the Commonwealth is really a modification of the regulations existing in most of the States. That is to say that in some of the States the regulations in force have been of a more stringent character than the one which we are now discussing.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No, they have not.

Senator DRAKE.—That may be a matter of opinion, but I think they are, and this regulation appears to me to carry out the feeling expressed in the debate which took place in the Senate, that a man should not be debarred from being a member of a political association, but that he must not associate himself with politics in such a way as to interfere with the proper discharge of his duties as an officer of a Department. I have no desire to labour the matter, but I repeat that in considering a regulation of this kind we should consider it as one which is to be fairly administered, and it is no argument against such a regulation to suggest possible cases which might occur under stupid and perverse administration. The administration of every public Department is subject to the control of Parliament, and it is not to be assumed that any one would endeavour to put a strained interpretation upon a regulation to deprive any public servant of political rights and privileges which are justly his. I think that not only in the interests of the public, who are concerned in the efficient working of the public Departments, but in the interests of the public servants themselves, it is desirable that there should be a regulation which will prevent them from identifying themselves with party political movements.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I intend to support the motion. When Senator Drake was referring to the regulations enforced in the various States I asked him, by interjection, if the Victorian regulation to which he referred applied to the Victorian Railway Department. The honorable and learned senator said he thought not. I knew it did not, but I desired to make it quite clear to honorable senators that it did not apply to the whole of the State servants of Victoria, and that the bulk of those State servants belong to the Railway Department, and were formerly under a Commissioner who allowed the officers and men of his Department, when off duty, to do just what they thought fit in the matter. The regulation of the Railway Department of Victoria is very similar to the regulation which has been quoted, and which reads—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss or in any way promote political movements.

I waited upon Commissioner Mathieson, who at the time was the only officer having authority in such matters, to ask his interpretation of the regulation. His interpretation was that the officers of the Department were forbidden to publicly discuss or to in any way promote political movements, in their working hours and on the railway premises.

Senator PEARCE.—That is not the present interpretation.

Senator STYLES.—Commissioner Mathieson said that outside of the railway premises, and in their own time, railway servants were at liberty to do what they thought fit.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There was no railway strike as a result of that regulation.

Senator STYLES.—I wish to know whether Senator Drake believes that any regulations which he, the Senate, or any other body is able to frame, will prevent the public servants taking part in political matters.

Senator DRAKE.—Of course it will not.

Senator STYLES.—It cannot possibly prevent them. What it may do is to prevent them taking part in political matters when on duty, and on Government premises.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It may gag them, but it cannot keep them from thinking.

Senator STYLES.—It cannot prevent them from acting either, because there are many ways in which they can take action.

Of course, the superior civil servants will adjourn to the club to talk over political matters there with their friends.

Senator PEARCE.—The regulation will never be put in force against them.

Senator DOBSON.—It is being enforced against a superior civil servant now in Victoria.

Senator STYLES.—Senator Dobson refers to the case of a school teacher who is charged with publicly making a speech upon political matters, and not with going to a club to talk over such matters with his friends.

Senator DOBSON.—Nobody objects to that.

Senator STYLES.—Of course, nobody objects to superior civil servants talking politics with their friends at a club. But the objection is taken to men getting up in public and making remarks upon political questions. I remind honorable senators that the State does not buy a man's political conscience and his soul. The State pays him for his labour, and, if it gets value for the wages paid him, why should it attempt to control him in other matters? If a man works eight hours a day for me for certain wages, it is of no consequence to me what he says about me so long as he does his work properly, and gives me value for the money which I pay him. It seems to me that we should satisfy ourselves that State employes earn the money they are paid, and if we desire to go further and prevent them from interfering in politics, I think we can only do so by locking them all up. We cannot prevent them from interfering in politics.

Senator PEARCE.—A Coercion Bill is the natural concomitant of such a regulation as this.

Senator STYLES.—There is scarcely a man amongst them who does not belong to some society, league, or association of some kind. I can understand that a Government officer should not be allowed to go on the public platform and deliver a long harangue against those who employ him, but I cannot understand why we should attempt to influence his political opinions, or why, if he expresses himself in a proper manner as a man ought to do, we should interfere with him at all. In my opinion, the regulation should read in this way—

Officers are expressly forbidden to use for political purposes information gained by them in the course of duty.

It seems to me that if officers do that kind of thing, sacking is too good for them. They should not be permitted to use information gained in the course of official duty for any purpose other than that for which they are paid to use it. Where that offence is committed they should be dealt with severely, and if they are not so dealt with, the officer in charge of the Department in which the offence takes place fails in his duty.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I think it should be laid down as a broad principle that the employes of the people collectively should not be placed in a different position politically from the employes of individuals. Logically, if we declare that the people collectively shall not allow their employes to take part in political movements, we must also declare that people employed by individuals shall not be allowed to take part in such movements. To do that would be practically to gag the whole community, and to substitute despotism for democracy. I think it should be laid down as a Commonwealth policy that the employes of the people collectively should be treated in the same way as the employes of individuals. In fact, I would go further, and say that the Commonwealth should be a model employer. I stated, during the debate upon the Public Service Bill, that in my opinion the Government should set an example as model employers. If we go so far as to say that Government employes shall not take part in any political meeting, or otherwise publicly discuss political affairs, we take from them a very great right and privilege which should be enjoyed by every man. Should that right or privilege be taken away, the next step might be to deprive them of their parliamentary vote, as already has been practically done in one of the States. We must be very careful before we reject the proposition of Senator McGregor, because the liberty of the subject ought to be the dearest possession of an Australian. It must be remembered that to prevent civil servants from publicly discussing political questions will not stop them from discussing such questions in private, thus probably giving rise to secret meetings and cabals, and tending to bring about a condition of affairs infinitely worse than that which the framers of the regulation are trying to avert. The Postmaster-General said that without this regulation we should find ourselves in the position of the United States, so far as the public servants are concerned. My own opinion is that the regulation, so far from preventing, would create the conditions which are found in America. A regulation of the kind interferes with the liberty of a large body of people, and there is a danger that, as in America, we may go farther and deprive the civil servants not only of their right to vote but also of their positions. A very important principle is involved in this question. Shall we, as a Commonwealth representing the people collectively, give our employes treatment different from that meted out to employes of private individuals? If a private employe may take part in public political meetings, the people, that is, the Commonwealth, should allow their employes the same right. The Commonwealth, which represents the people banded together in a community, has no right to say to the public servants—"You shall not have a political conscience, but shall be deprived of the liberty of expressing your political views in public places." If the regulation be passed one brother, who happens to be in private employ, will be at perfect liberty to take part in any political movement, while another brother, who is a servant of the State, will be deprived of his rights as a citizen. Senator McGregor is asking for the public servants the same right which we ourselves demand, and which every private employe demands; and to take away that right from any section of the community would be a blot on our legislation.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I am pleased that so early in the session an opportunity is afforded of discussing what I cannot help regarding as a very unfair regulation under the Public Service Act. I express that opinion in the face of the explicit promises we had, not only from the Postmaster-General, but from Senator O'Connor, when the Public Service Bill was before the Senate. If it had not been for those clear promises it is probable there would not have been so much anxiety on the part of Senator McGregor to have this matter thoroughly thrashed out now. A great deal has happened since the question of the public service was last before the Senate. Recently there has been brought about in the public service of Victoria the very thing which it is now sought to prevent—that is, interference by the heads of Departments with men in their rights as citizens. Events have occurred in Victoria which I dare say very few honorable senators expected to witness when the subject was last discussed by us. A great deal has been said as to the part a civil servant may take in politics. I quite agree that it would be very unseemly for a civil servant to take any very prominent part in politics, such as that instanced by the Postmaster-General. It would disgust every man in the community if a public servant, in his position as president of a political association, revealed secrets or information obtained by him in the course of his official duties. I am quite satisfied, however, that no public servant would ever think of doing anything of the sort.

Senator FRASER.—It has often been done.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Then, it must have been done in secret.

Senator FRASER.—Human nature is human nature.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If official information has been revealed under such circumstances I must grant that Senator Fraser knows a great deal more about the secrets of politics than I do. I am a mere apprentice in political life and, possibly the knowledge which has come to Senator Fraser was obtained in a way impossible to me. I am not in any way connected with secret societies, political, or otherwise. My object throughout has been to have all political or trades-union organizations conducted in a thoroughly open and public manner. As a trades-union leader, I have consistently opposed any proceedings of a secret character being introduced in Australia. In Western Australia I opposed the creation of a branch of the Knights of Labour, regarding all such private organizations as undesirable in the labour movement. We in Australia consider that we are blessed with greater privileges and liberties under our Constitution than are enjoyed in the country which gave rise to the Knights of Labour. In order to fully appreciate the meaning of the proposed regulation, we must have regard to the position of the public servants in Victoria at the present time. Does any honorable senator think that, because the railway servants of that State were recently licked into submission, or, rather, surrendered the position they had taken up, everything is satisfactory in the Railway Department? I can assure honorable senators that quite an opposite state of affairs exists, and that the whole of the Railway Department is in a seething state of revolution and discontent.

Senator FRASER.—Does the honorable senator warrant the word “revolution”?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I say that the Victorian railway employes are discontented with the present state of affairs, and that that discontent may break forth before very long in a way that will wake up some of the would-be political “josses” of Victoria. No logical argument has been adduced in favour of the regulation. We cannot prevent the public servants from thinking politics or from casting their votes.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Nobody desires to do that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Then it is for nothing that we have to thank the framers of the regulation. Surely it is better to allow Government employes to form organizations and work in the open light than to drive them into secret combinations? In my opinion we are now sitting on the safety-valve, and we ought to regard as a sort of warning the sad state of affairs in Serbia as announced in this morning's press. It is all very well for honorable senators to laugh, but King Alexander and his Ministers, who this morning are shorter by their heads' length, no doubt laughed a few months ago as the Postmaster-General is laughing now.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable senator know what the Servian regulation is on this subject?

Senator DELARGIE.—I do not pretend to be intimate with the civil service regulations of Servia, but I know that the authorities there have been sitting on the safety-valve in the same way as the political heads in the State of Victoria are now doing. If events similar to those in Servia occurred in Victoria, need any one be surprised?

Senator FRASER.—Does the honorable senator countenance that sort of thing?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I countenance nothing of the kind. Perhaps Senator Fraser countenances more of that sort of thing than I do. All I countenance is done in the open; I go into no secret societies. I hold that the regulation is not only unfair and uncalled for, but is ultra vires, there being nothing in the Public Service Act which gives the Commissioner or the Postmaster-General power to frame a regulation of the kind.

Senator DRAKE.—I did not frame the regulation.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I say that neither the Postmaster-General nor the Commissioner has a right to frame a regulation of the kind under the Act.

Senator DRAKE.—Did anybody ever say I had a right to frame the regulation?

Senator DE LARGIE.—No, but I say neither the Government nor the Commissioner has any such power; and, that being so, I think that hold the regulation ought to be omitted or improved in the direction indicated by Senator McGregor. No such regulation is needed, and there is no reason why it should be framed, or, at any rate, framed in such an objectionable manner. Recently, in Victoria, a policeman, in his own time and in his private clothes, attended a public meeting addressed by Mr. Tom Mann at Ballarat, and for this audacity he has been called to account by the precious head of the State Government. These are just the beginnings of tyranny we wish to nip in the bud. Attention has already been called to the school teacher who sinned in that he drew attention to the fact that farmers' children, who have to get up at all hours of the morning in order to milk cows and do other work, attended school in such a state of physical weariness that they were practically unable to receive their lessons. This expression of opinion by a teacher, to which attention was called on the initiative of the supporters of the Kyabram movement in his locality, is used by the precious Irvine-Bent Government as an argument against the public servants. If this sort of thing is allowed to go on, we shall have the most ridiculous position evolved. In Western Australia, railway employes have even contested parliamentary seats, without any detriment to the service.

Senator PEARCE.—The Western Australian railways pay better than those of Victoria.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is quite true that the Western Australian railways are superior to the Bent-ridden railways of Victoria. When the regulation referred to by Senator Styles was in force under Commissioner Mathieson, no harm was done to the receipts of the Victorian Railway Department. It was not until a tyrant was placed at the head of the Railway Department that trouble arose; and some remedy is required in the direction indicated by Senator McGregor.

because the Government may increase the number of its employes, and by every such increase the citizen rights of the people would be further restricted. The whole tendency of the age is to increase the opportunities for using the franchise. But the tendency of this regulation is to restrict rather than to extend the opportunities for the exercise of the franchise. I hope that it will be amended so that public officers may be allowed that reasonable amount of political liberty to which they are justly entitled. I think it will be generally admitted that the Government merely buy the labour of an engine-driver or a carpenter or a blacksmith, and that when his work is finished he should be at liberty to dispose of his leisure as he pleases. No Public Service Commissioner should be allowed to exercise any control over the actions of a public officer in his leisure. I wish to recall a few of the promises which were made by Ministers when this question was being considered in the Senate. When Senator Keating said that he was in favour of civil servants being allowed to join any association of either a political or trades union character, Senator Drake interjected these words—

Hear, hear; and they never have been barred.

Senator DRAKE.—Why not read the statement of Senator Keating to which I said "Hear, hear."

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is as follows :—

I am entirely in accord with the principle of the amendment, but there is nothing in the Bill which denies to civil servants the right to band themselves together, to associate as members of a civil service association, or to join one or the other of the many political or semi-political organizations, or the national or semi-national organizations, which permeate the length and breadth of the Commonwealth.

Senator DRAKE.—And I said "Hear, hear," to that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There is no provision in the Public Service Act to prevent a civil servant from joining an association of that kind, and therefore why should this regulation exist? When my amendment was before the Senate—and it was only defeated by fourteen to thirteen—some honorable senators who supported the Government declared that if any attempt had been made to prevent a public officer from having his full political rights they would have supported the attitude which

I assumed. On page 9367, Senator O'Connor said—

If a man is a member of a political association he may attend its meetings and take part in its work; but undoubtedly he would not be allowed to take such a prominent part in its proceedings as to be identified with them as a high official of the association, in such a way as to cause the public to suspect his fairness in the carrying out of his public duty. That is the position at the present time, and is it to be continued? At the present time the head of a Department would not interfere with a man who was merely a member of an association.

I hold that under this regulation the head of a Department can interfere with any officer who in any way promotes a political movement of any kind, and that, therefore, it is quite contrary to the promise which was given by the representatives of the Government here.

Senator DRAKE.—I do not consider it is. If there was no regulation, what would the head of a Department have to do?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The faculty of speech is given to a man to express his thoughts, and I take it that Senator O'Connor expressed the thought of the Government when he used those words. I hope that the Government will stand by the promise which was given here by their representatives, and repeal the objectionable portion of the regulation. I consider that the prestige of the civil service will not suffer by taking that course, nor will the prestige of the Government suffer by standing to the promise which was given to the Senate in their name.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).

—Senator McGregor and the supporters of this motion seem to forget that every man knows exactly the conditions upon which he joins the civil service. A position in the civil service carries certain advantages and certain disadvantages. One disadvantage is that an officer is supposed not to take a prominent part in any party movement. The same rule exists in other institutions. I was in a banking institution for 26 years, and the servants were never supposed to take an active part in politics, nor did we. We merely exercised our vote. The moment we grumbled we were told, "Very well, if you do not like the conditions you can resign." It must be remembered that public officers are not the servants of one section of the community, but the servants of the whole community. If a man enters into an engagement with his eyes open, it is absurd for him afterwards to find fault with the conditions of his employment. In all the States, I believe, public officers have full liberty to form civil service associations.

Senator DAWSON.—Do not civil servants have to comply with conditions made after they joined the service?

Senator WALKER.—Every man when he joins the civil service understands that he becomes the servant of the whole community, and that he must not ally himself with a section of the community for political purposes.

Senator DAWSON.—I understood the honorable senator to say that they joined the service under regulations then existing?

Senator WALKER.—The general condition is that civil servants are not supposed to take an active part in any public movement of a party character. A hospital movement is not a movement of a party character. Nor is an association to relieve distress a movement of a party character.

Senator PEARCE.—What about a temperance society?

Senator WALKER.—It is not a party movement.

Senator PEARCE.—Ask the licensed victuallers!

Senator WALKER.—I think all men ought to be temperate. With regard to the second portion of the regulation, Senator Drake has shown very clearly that if an officer took an active part in a political movement he might, perhaps quite unintentionally, use information which he had obtained in his official capacity. In the institution to which I had the honour to belong, we could not become justices of the peace without the approval of the board, and for the very good reason that we might be called upon to adjudicate on matters affecting our constituents. We only accepted the position on the distinct understanding that we should not be called upon to do more than witness the signing of deeds. I have been a justice of the peace for Queensland, for I do not like to say how many years. I have never sat on the bench, but I have often witnessed the signing of deeds for the convenience of the public. Now that we have adult suffrage, civil servants through their wives, sons, and daughters possess a considerable amount of indirect political influence. I regret that railway employes are not brought under the provisions of the Public Service Acts. I may be old fashioned in my views, but I think it is a monstrous thing that a whole community should be disturbed because a section of the Government employes wish to do something or other. I consider that Senator Drake made a very good point in his reference to the United States. Senator McGregor is trying to introduce the thin edge of the wedge, and, after a time, I suppose every one is to belong to the socialistic movement. I am not one of those who think that everything should be owned by the State. I am in favour of individualism. A civil servant has many advantages. He has permanency of employment. In good or bad times he draws his salary. If he goes into a political movement outside his office hours it will probably interfere with his proper attention to duty during office hours. How can he serve two masters? He had better serve one master faithfully. We have good instruction on that point. I am afraid that there is a tendency nowadays—I do not say especially in the Senate—merely to look to those whose votes we wish to get. In every State there are many Members of Parliament who when they address the House to which they belong, have in view the election which is to take place a few months later. I do not think that we are very much better than our neighbours in that respect; I do not say that we are any worse. I have as strong an objection as Senator De Largie to secret societies. I have never belonged to a secret society, and I do not intend to do so. I am not one of those who think that secret societies should necessarily exist. Perhaps in the middle ages they did a certain amount of good, but in these days everything should be done in an open manner. We know that trades unionists will not allow men who do not belong to their associations to go peaceably to their work. That is an interference with the liberty of the subject. I believe that I speak the mind of the Senate when I say that we should do all we can legitimately to make public officers comfortable in their positions as long as they give faithful service. I do not believe in stinting pay. I believe in paying a man well if he does his work properly. I am in perfect sympathy with those who wish to get a fair day's wage for a fair day's work.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable member did not support the minimum wage clause.

Senator WALKER.—Certainly not, because it is really making the so-called minimum the maximum in many cases. I hope that we shall very soon be able to come to a determination on this question.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I intend to vote against the motion. I do not mean to suggest that the regulation might not well be slightly altered. I do not think that any objection can be taken to the wording of the regulation which is in force in New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and even Western Australia. The corresponding regulation in New South Wales reads as follows :—

In order that officers of all ranks may be enabled to render loyal and efficient service to the Government, they are expressly forbidden to take part in any political affairs otherwise than by recording their votes.

No one, I think, would wish our regulation to be framed in stronger terms. Practically the same regulation is in force in Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia. The only ground on which honorable senators desire an amendment of this regulation is that it prohibits a civil servant from publicly discussing, or in any way promoting, political movements. I admit that that is capable of an extreme interpretation. It might be urged that a man, in joining an association, was promoting it. I will not say that a Minister of the Crown might not, at some time, take that view. But it is not a common-sense reading of the regulation.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Oh, yes, it is.

Senator FRASER.—I say that it is not; but if it will please the labour corner to have the word "promoting" altered, I shall not object. I should prefer to substitute either the Victorian, the Queensland, or the South Australian regulation. But to allow the civil servants of the country to take an active part in politics is a most dangerous principle indeed. When persons join the civil service they know perfectly well that they ought not to take a prominent part in politics. Their own common-sense tells them that they ought not to take the pay of the public and at the same time dictate to the Government. A man is not compelled to join the civil service, but when he takes a position under the Crown it is perfectly well understood that it is not optional for him to take part in politics. I do not say that a railway station-master ought not to be allowed to speak to two or three individuals and express his own opinion. But when a public servant gets on a platform and denounces in extreme language the Government which he is serving, expressing views highly derogatory to Ministers of the Crown, that public servant should be dismissed. There is the case of a school teacher who got upon a public platform and denounced Ministers in vile language.

Senator HIGGS.—A grand speech—it was a lovely speech.

Senator FRASER.—If Senator Higgs had to face the Queensland electors within the next few months he might not be so brave. When a teacher or any other officer gets on a public platform at a public meeting, and denounces his own Ministers, he is not fit to be a public servant.

Senator PEARCE.—It was not at a public meeting, but at a teachers' conference.

Senator FRASER.—It was at a public meeting, where the press was represented. I will admit, for the sake of argument—not that it is true—that there might be sweating in the public service, but would that justify an officer in denouncing Ministers of the Crown? What kind of a public service should we have if such conduct were tolerated? We shall have open revolt, anarchy, revolution.

Senator HIGGS.—That would be terrible, wouldn't it?

Senator FRASER.—It would be.

Senator HIGGS.—It has done a lot of good in times gone by.

Senator FRASER.—We are speaking of a country where there is every possible toleration given to and allowance made for civil servants and others.

Senator HIGGS.—Where is the toleration on the honorable senator's part?

Senator FRASER.—There is toleration to join any society any one likes so long as it is not anarchical or revolutionary. I joined a certain society some years ago, and will give a history of my action. I was a very innocent youth from Canada, and knew no more about the Orange institution than the man in the moon. But in the Legislative Assembly in Victoria some twenty years ago, or thereabouts, I supported a very old political friend of mine, the late Sir James Patterson, by seconding his motion censuring members who signed a treasonable address against my Queen and country. The words to which I took exception then, and as I would now, referred to the British Crown as "the hoof of foreign despotism." Senator Higgs laughs. I want to put him in a hole if I can. I want to make him take sides, and then I will fix him. Let him not sit on a rail. A man must either be for the King or against the King. I am for the King. I soon found what kind of opposition I had to face in this country. But I should take the same course again under the same circumstances. There is no objection to any man joining institutions or societies so long as they are not revolutionary.

Senator DAWSON.—So long as they are secret.

Senator FRASER.—There is no harm in secret meetings. There are numbers of secret meetings which do good service. But what we are now taking exception to is the open action of certain civil servants, not what they do in secret meetings. The regulations in force in some of the States cannot be taken exception to. I cannot go to the length advised by Senator McGregor and others, who would have them struck out altogether. Objection has been taken to a policeman having been found fault with because he attended Tom Mann's meetings. Does the labour corner support Tom Mann?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Certainly; why not?

Senator FRASER.—He has openly stated that he wishes to drive all the capital out of Australia. Do they support that? It does not suit them to say so. They will only take the parts of Tom Mann's utterances that suit them.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did the honorable senator hear him say that?

Senator FRASER.—Do the labour representatives denounce Tom Mann for using those expressions? If they are not for Tom Mann, they must be against him. They cannot get the benefit of all the evil work he does without taking the responsibility.

Senator Sir JOSEPH SYMON.—I thought they paid him.

Senator FRASER.—They pay him £600 a year for calling us all rascals, and for denouncing nearly everything that makes a country great—denouncing religion, I think, amongst other things.

Senator DAWSON.—Oh, no.

Senator FRASER.—Oh, yes. I have not got his speeches by heart, but that is near enough.

Senator O'KEEFE.—There is not a more religious man in Victoria than Tom Mann.

Senator PEARCE.—It is very brave of the honorable senator to denounce Tom Mann here, where he can make no reply.

Senator FRASER.—It is time public men did speak out when the labour section are trying to force on matters to a point that will be ruinous to the country. If we support Tom Mann, we shall soon be driven back to the position of blackfellows, with not even an opossum rug around us.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that the discussion of Mr. Tom Mann's views is relevant?

Senator FRASER.—I only wanted to better the opportunity. I am not afraid of my views; I never was, and never shall be. If they secure the favour of the public I am pleased; if they do not, I am quite as well pleased.

Senator HIGGS.—If the honorable senator had to stand for election this year he would not say so.

Senator FRASER.—Will the honorable senator retire for Queensland if I retire for Victoria? There is a challenge for him. It is said that a perfect corollary to this regulation would be a Coercion Bill. If any one goes down to the Police Court to-day he will find coercion institutions being carried on. Every police magistrate is a coercionist. Every Judge is a coercion Judge. The two men who are to be hanged in New South Wales in a day or two will be coerced. There is a great difference, however, between coercing people and not allowing them to do wrong. We only want to coerce people who do wrong into doing what is right. Coercion is punishment. But my honorable friends in the labour corner want to say that if a civil servant is coerced into doing right, a wrong is done to him. They are fortunate in living in a time when there is a vast amount of freedom. If they look back a few centuries, they will be able to draw comparisons that make present times seem very advantageous. I shall vote against the motion.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I hope we shall return to a calm consideration of the question, apart from the violent controversial features which have been introduced in the course of the debate. When this question was originally before the Senate, in the consideration of the Public Service Bill, a clause was moved by Senator De Largie to the effect that nothing in the Act should prevent officers from becoming members of any properly-constituted society or political association. While that was rejected by one vote, it seemed to be the general consensus of opinion that there should be no administration of the Public Service Act which would prevent any public servant from being a member of such a society for the purpose of preserving his rights of citizenship. While there may have been a disinclination to place it in so many words upon the statute-book, the general idea certainly was that the administration of the Act should operate in that direction. That view has been confirmed by Senator Drake himself. The honorable and learned senator says that it would be an unreasonable administration of the Act to prevent a man being merely a private member of such an association.

Senator PEARCE.—Ministers are only the creatures of a day.

Senator BEST.—What I desire to point out is that while there has been an objection taken to Senator McGregor's motion, the Minister himself largely admits that a fair administration of the Public Service Act, and of this particular regulation, would permit a public servant to belong to any reasonably-constituted political society or association. But what the Minister has most properly condemned is the active participation of public servants in public affairs of a political character. There appears to be on the part of Senator McGregor, and those supporting him, an admission that it is not altogether desirable that public servants should on the public platform actively or prominently support political movements. Of course, if anything of that kind is done it strikes at the root of discipline, and necessarily involves most serious complications. We have to consider how we can do what is reasonable and fair to the public servants of the Commonwealth. The public servants have to look to Parliament for redress of their grievances. We are therefore not justified in preventing them endeavouring amongst themselves to secure what is conceded to every other section of the community, namely, legitimate combination for the purpose of promoting legitimate rights. Having regard to the fact that Parliament is master of the public servants, and that they have to organize for the purpose of securing justice at the hands of Parliament, it is hardly reasonable for us to attempt to enforce a regulation which, on the face of it, would prevent any such action on their part. In my view, a reasonable interpretation of the desire of honorable senators would be given by an alteration of the motion submitted by Senator McGregor in this direction. The motion is to the effect—

That in the opinion of the Senate, regulation 41 under the Public Service Act should be amended.

I would add these words—

by inserting after the word "way" the words "to publicly."

So that the regulation would then read—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss, or in any way to publicly promote, political movements.

The latter part of the regulation we all approve. I certainly agree with those who have said that it is most undesirable that public servants should go upon a public platform possibly for the purpose of deliberately, actively, and prominently opposing principles of public policy submitted by the Ministers at the head of their Departments or by the Government generally.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Or by the leader of the Opposition.

Senator BEST.—Or by the leader of the Opposition, as the case may be. There can be no doubt that any public advocacy of particular political principles by public servants will necessarily involve serious complications, but while we should be opposed to any such active interference by public servants, we are not justified in depriving them of reasonable freedom in the exercise of their rights of citizenship. I suggest that in the exercise of those rights, and for the promotion of their own interests, they are justified in combining. The regulation in its present form is, I think, unduly extreme and drastic. While I agree that officers of the Public Service should be forbidden to publicly discuss political subjects, it is going very far to say, in the words of this regulation, "or in any way promote political movements." That, in my opinion, would deprive them of their reasonable rights, and those rights must be considered, having due regard to their relationship to Parliament. It would prevent them uniting for the purpose of securing redress of grievances, and as Parliament is their master, organization is, I think, the way in which they should seek redress of grievances. We are not justified, therefore, in doing anything which will prevent such organization. I move—

That the following words be added to the motion :—“ by inserting after the word ‘ way ’ in such regulation the words ‘ to publicly.’ ”

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—No one listening to the debate can complain that it has not been an animated one. In view of some of the statements made, I feel that, as a representative of the State of Victoria, I should clearly express my opinion of this motion. If the statement is true, as assumed by Senator Walker, that there is something looming in the distance which will perhaps prevent us freely expressing our opinions, it might be injudicious for me to express mine. But whether it be injudicious in that sense or not, I intend to publicly express what I think upon this matter, without fear, favour, or affection. If my views are found not to be in accord with those of a majority of the people of this State, then so much the worse for me. Notwithstanding that, I shall on the floor of this chamber state what I believe to be the right course to adopt. This is a question upon which, as Senator Fraser has said, we ought to take sides, and I am going to take this side: I do not consider it just on any occasion to restrict the voting power or the citizen rights of any person whatever.

Senator DONOHUE.—We are not asked to do so.

Senator BARRETT.—Holding that view, I say in the first place that I shall support the motion which has been moved by Senator McGregor. I think it is right that the honorable senator should have taken the earliest opportunity afforded him to initiate a discussion upon this question, in view of the statements made and promises implied during the discussion of the clause moved by Senator De Largie when we were discussing the Public Service Bill. This regulation seems to me to show the danger of regulations under any Act of Parliament. My mind is perfectly clear, as to the discussion which took place on the Public Service Bill. The impression I formed at the time was distinctly that the Government would not in any way unduly restrict civil servants in claiming their political rights. I intend to direct the attention of honorable senators to what was said by Senator O'Connor on that occasion. I suppose that, in speaking at the time, the honorable and learned senator was in some way voicing the opinion of the Government as well as his own, though I find that, lawyer-like, the honorable and learned senator managed in some parts of the speech he made to introduce remarks which appear to confound some of the clearest statements he made in other parts of the same speech.

Senator WALKER.—Why lawyer-like?

Senator BARRETT.—The honorable senator must know that lawyers very often use language for the purpose of concealing their real meaning, and I suppose that when the lawyer becomes the politician, as the result of his peculiar training, it is very often impossible for a layman to grasp what he really means. I advise honorable senators to study the whole of Senator O'Connor's speech, but I quote only the first part of it. At page 9366 the honorable and learned senator is reported to have spoken as follows :—

Senator McGregor seems to me to have adopted a tone which, with all respect to him, is altogether extravagant upon this question. It is assumed that those opposing the introduction of this clause are opposed to the civil servants belonging to political associations, and exercising the right of combination for political purposes, or exercising their right as citizens to influence elections. But nobody dreams for one moment of placing any obstacle of that kind in their way. There were times when a man who was a member of the Public Service found it very difficult, if not impossible, to give effect to his political opinions. But that kind of administration has gone for ever. In any Government which is carried on under the control of Parliament, under the eye of the press and the influence of public opinion, such administration can no longer exist and can never return. That is an emphatic statement by Senator O'Connor upon this question. I must be fair to the honorable and learned senator, and say that in later portions of the speech he seems to deny the clear position he takes up in the portion I have quoted. It seems to me that some members of the Commonwealth Parliament desire in this particular matter that we should promote what I may call panic regulations for the public service. I hold that no public servant should be under any restriction whatever so far as his political opinions are concerned, and that when he enters the service the whole of his political rights should be preserved to him. The fact that a man is working for the State should not debar him from freely expressing his views or from exercising the franchise. There is, however, another phase of the question with which to some extent I sympathize. It would be wrong for a civil servant to stand on a public platform and take sides in a heated political controversy. At the same time I have no sympathy with regulations which deny political rights to any section of the community. I believe that when the people of Victoria realize what they have done, or what the State Government have done in their name, they will in a short time be ashamed of the position they have created, and that the laws recently enacted will be repealed. A few years ago similar restrictions were placed on the members of the police force in the same State, and these men were deprived of their vote on the ground that it would be dangerous to give them the political rights enjoyed by other sections of the community. For many years these policemen were deprived of the franchise, but the time came when a more enlightened public opinion declared in their favour, and to-day they stand in exactly the same position as their fellow citizens. The fact that a police officer went to a public meeting when off duty, to listen to a certain lecture, caused him to be called before a board to explain his conduct.

Senator DRAKE.—The regulation has nothing to do with the police.

Senator BARRETT.—But the incident shows what the effect of the regulation might be. What has been the result of the panic legislation in Victoria? I read the other day that the Premier of Queensland is thinking of introducing similar legislation in that State, and if that be done the time may come when, even in this Parliament, it may be urged that these restrictions should be placed on Commonwealth officers. That is a proposal of a sort to which I could never agree, but which I should do my best to defeat. Every senator ought to speak and also vote on the motion submitted by Senator McGregor. Taking the consensus of opinion registered on the previous occasion, and knowing that to some extent the Government have departed from the position they then took up, I believe a majority of the Senate will support the motion. The regulation is too drastic, and, in the interests of the Commonwealth, ought to be amended.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I do not think any reasonable objection can be taken to the regulation as it stands. If it be found hereafter that it goes a little too far, or that we can more clearly define what we want, some amendment, such as that suggested by Senator Best, may be accepted. What we do want is a loyal public service. Senator Smith says that he has always expressed the opinion that the State ought to be a model employer. My own opinion is that the State is and always has been a model employer.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Only in some of the States.

Senator DOBSON.—In all of the States, I believe, State employes have been treated with the utmost consideration. There are the Public Service Boards and Appeal Boards to give them justice, and then there are conciliation and other boards, the object of which is to put a stop to the unrest created by the Public Service and Appeal Boards. Then, under the Commonwealth there is a minimum wage of a far greater amount than is paid by any class of public institutions or public employers throughout Australia. The hours of work are short and the holidays long, and in every way the public servants have always been considered. If a question were to arise affecting the position of the public servants I believe that every member of every Legislature would go to the end of his tether in order to do justice to them, and grant everything that could reasonably be asked; indeed, most of us would probably, I am afraid, forget the taxpayers who have to "pay the piper." It is rather amusing to hear how some of the honorable senators who support the amendment give themselves away, and how Senator McGregor, and some who think with him, have tried by means of great exaggeration to impress upon us the importance of the amendment. Senator Styles had to admit that it would be objectionable for a public servant to mount the platform and make a long political speech.

Senator STYLES.—I said it would be objectionable for a public servant to make a long harangue against the Government.

Senator DOBSON.—What is the difference between a man who talks for an hour and perhaps says very little, and another man who talks for three minutes and, perhaps, utters sentences which are absolutely disloyal and unfair, and not in accordance with fact, and in which unconscious use may be made of confidential official knowledge? Senator Styles gives his whole case away when he admits that a public servant ought to be stopped under some circumstances from mounting a political platform and making a long harangue. If the honorable senator can frame a regulation which will permit a public servant to go on the platform and make a short harangue I shall be very glad to see it. Then Senator De Largie also gives himself away. The honorable senator, out of that conscientiousness of his, which is altogether against the capitalist and in favour of the working man, admits that he would not like a civil servant to take a very prominent part in politics. I should like Senator De Largie, with the help of the labour corner, to suggest a regulation. Then Senator McGregor utterly gives himself away by dealing in the language of exaggeration. He has told the public through Hansard and the newspapers that we are taking away from the public servants all constitutional power.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I did not say anything of the kind.

Senator DOBSON.—I took down the words of the honorable senator, who led me to infer that if this regulation were allowed to stand it would practically deny the public servants any constitutional power.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No; I said we should be interfering with their constitutional rights.

Senator DOBSON.—Senator McGregor then went on to illustrate his argument by picturing a household consisting of a public servant, his wife, and son and daughter, each one of whom had a vote; and he contended that the family would, under this regulation, have absolutely more power than the head of the household. Does the honorable senator not see that the head of such a household would have very great power? Does the honorable senator not see that his illustration absolutely cuts the ground from under his feet? The head of the household would have the right to vote, and to attend the private meetings of his fellow workers in the civil service association, if he liked, and discuss in every possible way any questions affecting the public service, and to approach his employers in a loyal and proper way.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Not under this regulation.

Senator DOBSON.—Yes; under the regulation. Then the wife, and the son, and the daughter, could join the head of the household in fighting for an increase in his salary, for decreasing his hours, or for anything he liked to demand, and the wife, son, and daughter could become agitators and mount the platform. It is absolutely idle for our friends in the labour corner to say that we are seeking to deprive any citizen of his just rights or his just liberties. As Senator Walker has pointed out, honorable senators seem to forget that while the State ought to be, and I contend is, a model employer, there ought to be obligations on the part of the employé. Is it not the very first obligation of the employé that his service should be loyal and efficient—that he should not play the traitor?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Who suggested anything to the contrary?

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senators are suggesting something very like what I indicate. The whole speech of Senator De Largie seemed to be inspired by the anger and resentment he feels because the wicked strike which took place in Victoria utterly collapsed. It appears to me that honorable senators, in supporting that strike, were absolutely telling the railway employes that they had a right to practically rebel against the authority of the Government.

Senator FRASER.—Some honorable senators attended the meetings of the strikers.

Senator DOBSON.—That is so, and I never felt more disgraced by anything that has been done by honorable senators. Senator De Largie mistakes discipline for tyranny. He talks about our wanting to play the tyrant over men when we are simply applying that discipline which is necessary in this world if we are to be without revolutions such as have been hinted at. It appears to me that even in this twentieth century, such events as the shocking assassinations in Servia show that everything must be based on discipline. If a public servant is not ready to submit himself to the most reasonable discipline of this regulation, let him leave the service.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This regulation opens up a very important question, which is a great deal more far-reaching than perhaps at first sight appears, and upon which a great deal of difference of opinion may exist. I agree with Senator Best that we may very well examine this matter without importing into the discussion any undue heat, or without travelling beyond the limits of what is admittedly necessary and proper in relation to the position of the public servants—that is, the servants of the public, and, in this case, of the Commonwealth—whether their position be high or low. I am rather inclined to the view that although perhaps some of the words of the regulation to which attention has been called, might have been more fully or perhaps better expressed, they sufficiently convey what is intended to be prevented. They sufficiently negative, I think, the rather broad interpretation or prohibition which some honorable senators find in them. I do not take the view they take as to the extensive application of the words “political movement.” It is quite natural, as Senator Pearce said, that the civil servants should take the view that the language used covers a wider field than was intended, and may be unnecessarily restrictive upon the exercise of their rights. Because they take that view we ought not at once to accept it. It is perfectly natural that all men in the civil service should seek to get, if they can, the same unrestricted right as others to further political movements, and ally themselves with whatever active political organization in the State they think fit. Undoubtedly, that is a natural thing, and no one has a right to reproach them and to remonstrate with them. But it all proceeds on what I conceive to be an erroneous assumption. Senator Smith said, as though it concluded the whole subject, that there was no reason why the servants of the whole of the people should be deprived of any right which the servants of any one of the people enjoyed. That struck me as a very taking but utterly fallacious argument to apply to this matter, and whatever we may do as regards this regulation—and possibly some parts of the language may be improved upon—we shall be making a great mistake if we proceed on that assumption. That is not the position at all. The position is that public officers are the servants of the people represented by the Executive Government. My servants are the servants of an individual, but the civil servants have no more right to intrigue either privately or publicly against, or to denounce publicly the Government, whose servants they are, than my servants have a right publicly or privately to intrigue against me, or to publicly denounce me. That is the parallel. There must be a limit of course, but the parallel which my honorable friend drew is quite a mistake, because it eliminates a fact. Just as my servants are not allowed to join movements against me, so the servants of the State must be under a certain disability, when they enter its service, to prevent them from intriguing privately against their masters, the public, or publicly denouncing them. That is the principle underlying the regulation. Otherwise it ought to be swept away.

Senator BEST.—“Intriguing privately!” How can you possibly define a thing like that?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—You cannot enter into the minds of men. You cannot pursue them into the innermost recesses of their closets or studies or club rooms. But still that is no reason why you should not, as far as possible try, whilst doing justice to their rights, to reach the principle as far as you can. That is what the regulation is intended to do. But what I wish to make clear is that any legislation of this kind rests fundamentally on that principle, that the civil servants must enjoy what are called their political rights subject to the disability that they are the servants of the people and of the Government of the people. We all admit that it would be absolutely outrageous to permit public servants to go on a platform and denounce the Executive Government, because if they were entitled to do the one they would be entitled to do the other. When my honorable friends talk in large language about the encroachment upon civil liberty and the rights of citizens, it is utterly inapplicable to this state of things, because we admit that there is a limit. Any member of the Senate, the humblest citizen who is not a Government servant, can get up a political agitation, mount a platform, and denounce the Ministry or a particular Minister. It would be a public scandal, it would be subversive of all the best principles of government if the public servants were permitted to do so.

Senator PEARCE.—On the other hand the honorable and learned senator will admit that a public servant has some right to take an interest in the country's affairs and to be allowed to express his opinions.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The public servant has a right, and I shall refer in a moment to what I consider to be the limits of that right. The regulation does three things. We are all anxious, I am sure, to conserve as far as possible and in every way consistent with their position the political rights of civil servants. No one wishes to encroach upon them one atom more than is necessary.

When we are told, and rightly told, that civil servants take the view that they are unnecessarily restricted, we must remember that they entered a service which gives them a great variety of privileges. They enjoy practically permanent employment during good behaviour; they enjoy certainties which the ordinary employé of an individual does not enjoy, and in return for these privileges they give up, and are bound to give up, certain portions of that common freedom—certain portions of those rights in connexion with public affairs which other citizens enjoy. They enter the service with their eyes open, they to receive certain privileges, and in return they are subject to certain disabilities. The only question is how far those disabilities extend. This regulation points to three, and no one offers adverse criticism about the third one, by which—

They are further forbidden to use for political purposes information gained by them in the course of duty.

Every one, I understand, agrees with that portion of the regulation. But allow me to point out to Senator Best that it will be nearly as difficult to enforce that part of the regulation as it will be to enforce what he pointed out as a blot, and to remedy which he proposes to insert the word “publicly”—to enforce their seclusion, so to speak, from all forms of private intrigue.

Senator BEST.—It is only a question of degree.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes. You can never reach a policy of perfection by a regulation of this kind. You have only to do the practical, and the impossibility of reaching the practical by putting in the word “publicly” is just as applicable to that part of the regulation as the other. If a man wishes fraudulently, or in violation of his duty to his employer, the State, or his duty to the Minister, to convey information from a public office to the leader of the Opposition, he will do it, and in nine times out of ten he will never be found out. You cannot pursue every man in whatever tortuous course or intrigue or anything of that kind he may adopt. You can only lay down a rule which will enable you to do it, if you can, when you can, and as far as you can. The first portion of this regulation is admittedly a good thing—

Officers are expressly forbidden to publicly discuss * * * political movements.

But the part on which the discussion has hinged is—

Or in any way promote political movements.

We have to consider what is sought to be forbidden. I take entirely the view of the Government upon this matter. Looking at the position of the Government; looking at the fact, as Senator Higgs said yesterday, that they have been unswervingly supported by my honorable friends on the left during the last two years; looking at the fact that they would not be likely to frame a regulation which would unduly encroach or do a wrong to public servants; then it is prima facie pretty plain that they used language which they believed hit at the mischief intended to be corrected, and would prevent injury to the Commonwealth. What is it that we want to prevent? In the passage which Senator Barrett quoted, Senator O'Connor has declared what we all assent to—that there is not the slightest objection to civil servants forming associations amongst themselves as they do, and advancing their own interests by an appeal to Parliament if they like, by swaying the election of a particular member, and assisting to secure the representation which they desire.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Would not the formation of such an association be the promotion of a political movement?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think not. I do not think that that is what is meant by “political movements” in this regulation. It is not what the Government meant. It is for the purpose of defining the meaning more clearly that I intend to suggest the alteration of two or three words. I take the view that “promoting political movements” means, not movements amongst the civil servants for their own interests as civil servants, but political movements in the large sense, as ordinarily understood. This regulation would prevent them, I am sorry to say, from promoting that great cause of liberty and prosperity, free-trade. It would equally prevent them from promoting the interests of monopoly by associating themselves with a protectionist association. I am not going to discuss whether the Trades Hall Council is a political institution or not, but assuming that it is, the regulation would prevent them from joining a body such as that if organized, as has been alleged, for political purposes. Senator O'Connor in his speech showed that no one contemplated, and no administration in the face of Parliament would attempt to administer this regulation so as to prevent the civil servants having an association amongst themselves for the purpose of furthering their own interests, just as the servants in the employment of any of us are entitled to band themselves together with a view of representing their interests, and securing an improvement in the terms of their employment, by asking for higher wages, by making representations to their employer, or even by retiring if they like. The power of striking in that sense—I am not justifying striking—would be open to them. The right of combination is sacred. Every body of men has a right to say whether they will work for particular wages or not. Therefore, the position of civil servants is absolutely analogous to that of the servants of a private individual in respect to the right to combine, to deputationize their employer, and to do everything they can for the improvement of the conditions of their service. But public servants, or the servants of a private individual, have no right to intrigue secretly against their employer, or secretly to promote a movement to his detriment, or to get up on a platform and denounce him. Dismissal would be the immediate result of that in the case of private employes, and so it should be in the other case. Therefore, the word “publicly” would not have the effect intended. It would not meet the case, because in point of fact it would emphasize the right to agitate secretly. I should infinitely prefer to allow public servants to associate publicly, for the reason that Senator Best gives, that you can follow them when they do things publicly; rather than I would allow them to do it privately and secretly. It is rather unfair to the civil servants to encourage them to combine secretly, and to forbid them to do so in the open eye of day. If there were any doubt as to this regulation being intended to cover arrangements made amongst themselves for their interests, I would suggest an amendment—to add after the word “movement” the words, “except among themselves.” That would prevent them from joining outside political organizations.

Senator PEARCE.—Has the honorable and learned senator thought about their position in joining the Australian Natives Association?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not considering that.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator only thinks about the Trades Hall.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not thinking about that either. It is a doubtful institution, a little under a cloud at present. The insertion of the words I suggest would give the civil servants the most absolute freedom to associate publicly or privately. Why should they not have a newspaper if they please, and form a union among themselves to denounce their own grievances?

Senator PLAYFORD.—And denounce Ministers?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They can do as they like if they do it amongst themselves. If it is thought that there is a risk of their denouncing Ministers, all I can say is that the only remedy is to stop them even from organizing amongst themselves. But I do not desire to do that.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They might promote political movements among themselves.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend is of the same opinion as I am with regard to these words. I think that the words “political movements” do not contemplate or include civil service associations, or arrangements amongst themselves to further their own interests.

Senator BEST.—The words Senator Symon suggests inserting do not carry out his idea.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The words “except among themselves” would mean that they could carry on political associations amongst themselves.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I, myself, do not wish to add the words I have mentioned, but, at the same time, I think that the words “political movements” do not include movements or agitations of civil servants among themselves for their own benefit. I am certain that they do not. The regulation is perfectly sufficient as it stands. All that I say is, that if any honorable senator thinks that the regulation would preclude civil servants—I do not think it would—from making these combinations amongst themselves in their own interests, let us add some words, if they can be suggested—I am not wedded to the words I have mentioned—to provide against such a contingency. My own view is that the regulation, as it stands, is perfectly sufficient, and, therefore, I shall support it.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable and learned senator move an amendment or not?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I accept Senator Best's amendment, which will carry out all we desire; that is, to give civil servants the right to combine and carry on their own business in their own way.

Amendment agreed to.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

STANDING ORDERS.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 11th June, vide page 786):

Standing Order 273—

Motions—"That the Committee do now divide," "That the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again," and "That the Chairman do now leave the chair," shall be moved without discussion, and be immediately put and determined, and no such motion shall be repeated within fifteen minutes of any of these motions having been negatived. Provided that the senator in charge of a Bill or resolution, or a Minister of the Crown may at any time move to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Upon which Senator Higgs had moved, by way of amendment—

That the word "Motions" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "A motion."

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I am in very great hope that after the intervening fifteen hours of calm, honorable senators will this afternoon admit the justice of the arguments which we advanced last evening. I desire to address another appeal to the keystone of the South Australian democratic arch, to act upon his own observation, that it does not matter very much whether a simple majority or a two-thirds majority is provided for. If at any time honorable senators are tired of a debate, and if there has been considerable iteration by an honorable senator, I am satisfied that we can get twelve out of eighteen, assuming that eighteen honorable senators are present, who will vote for the closure. And in a House of 24 senators I am sure we shall be able to get sixteen who will be willing to close up the other eight if it is necessary.

Senator DAWSON.—They have no right to close up any but the offending member.

Senator HIGGS.—I am presuming that the other eight will all be offending. I should like honorable senators not to keep in view any lengthy observations which may have been made during last session, but to consider a case in which an honorable senator may move a motion which is distasteful to the majority of the members of the Senate. That majority may combine together to close up the debate as soon as the mover of the motion has concluded his remarks, and thus prevent any discussion upon the subject. The instance which I am about to relate, owing to the extraordinary advance of the spirit of militarism throughout the Commonwealth, and of what I may term the exaggerated idea of reverence on the part of the people for those whom we allow to be our Kings and Princes, may not be a very good one to quote just now, but I remind honorable senators of what Senator De Largie said in connexion with his motion dealing with the proprietors of the Argus, and the memory of King James. The honorable senator moved that the editor of the Argus should be brought to the Bar of the House for having been guilty of publishing in his paper certain disparaging statements regarding the memory of that King, who was held in such high esteem by his subjects. It will be remembered that Senator Stewart, himself a descendant of the Stuarts, followed the mover of the motion.

Senator FRASER.—Some of the Stuarts were not much good.

Senator HIGGS.—I ask the honorable senator not to be irreverent, because we have in this Parliament representatives of both the Tudors and the Stuarts. We have a Tudor in another place, and a Stewart in the Senate. Senator Stewart followed Senator De Largie, and honorable senators at that time were horrified that anybody should make such a proposition as to call the editor of a modern newspaper to the Bar of the Senate for having expressed sentiments disloyal to a King who had been dead for some time. An honorable senator rose and moved—"That the Senate do now divide."

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Sargood.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Sargood did rise to move the motion, and made a brief speech in doing so, but he had to give way to somebody else, who moved the motion according to the standing orders. A similar motion may be moved in years to come, when possibly three or four senators may desire to follow the mover of the original motion under consideration in order to give expression to their views. But if this motion is permitted they will not be allowed to say anything. They cannot get up and say—"Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak," because the Chairman will say—"You have no right to debate this question, it must be put to the vote without debate." The majority, having made up their minds, will close up the minority. I have no desire to be personal to any honorable senator, but I say that to vote for such a standing order as this is not in keeping with the reputation for liberality and the support of liberal principles which certain members of this Senate have borne in the past. I am sure that if they treat the matter seriously they will be prepared to concede the majority asked for by honorable senators in this corner. I speak of honorable senators in this corner, but I know that we have sympathizers on both the Ministerial and Opposition benches. Unfortunately they are not present, and an important matter of this kind is apparently to depend on one or two votes. I remind honorable senators that we are laying down a practice for all time. If after an experience of eighteen months or two years in the Senate we carry such a standing order as is now proposed, the arguments used to carry it now will be advanced later on if any attempt is made to alter it, and it will be said that our experience in the past has shown that the standing order is a wise one, that we have never had any trouble in connexion with it, that its power has never been, and is never likely to be abused, and that therefore we should not alter it. I briefly repeat what I think the most telling argument in favour of altering the standing order, apart from the consideration that the majority has no right at any time to stifle the voice of the minority, when the minority is giving expression to its views in a decent and orderly way.

Senator DRAKE.—As the Government were doing last session.

Senator HIGGS.—I really did think that Senator Drake was one of those who are willing to "let the dead past bury its dead," but every speaker who rises to support the alteration of this standing order is met by the honorable and learned senator with the interjection, "I cannot forget what you did last session to the Government." Now, where is the gratitude of the Barton Ministry, when they cherish remembrance of such a trifling matter as that was at the time? I believe that the Ministry are treating Senator Fraser, who has often been in strong opposition to them, with greater consideration than they are treating honorable senators in this corner who supported them so handsomely, and so servilely as some persons would say, during last session. Senator Drake is apparently willing to avail himself of an opportunity to punish us by voting for a standing order of this kind. Let me say something which I have heard, and which I believe can be borne out by Senator Playford. Though this standing order has been in force for a very long time in the South Australian House of Assembly, no member of a Government in South Australia has ever been known to support it when the motion "That the House do now divide" has been proposed.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not if anybody desired to speak. It was also an understood thing that, as a matter of honour, if a member had spoken, he would not vote for a motion which would shut up somebody else. That was an honorable understanding amongst us.

Senator HIGGS.—I ask honorable senators to consider the limitations referred to by Senator Playford. We have no experience of the South Australian practice, but evidently a practice has grown up in the South Australian House of Assembly of respecting the rights of the minority, and not only has no member of the Government ever supported a motion of this kind, but no private member, who may already have spoken, has been found voting for a motion which will close the mouth of another member. There is no proposal to embody any such practice as that in the standing order now proposed. It is proposed that a motion that the Senate do now divide shall be put without debate, and may be carried by a bare majority. Is that a fair thing in a Senate constituted as this is? I could understand a proposal of the kind in some other body but not in this, where, unlike the Legislative Assembly of a State, we represent States as States. I cannot see any good ground for the standing order; on the other hand, I see a great deal of harm that may be done.

Senator PEARCE.—It might be applied to representatives of Western Australia who wanted to discuss the question of a trans-continental railway.

Senator HIGGS.—That might be so, and we know that by some senators, especially those who represent Victoria, the proposed transcontinental railway is looked upon as a sort of "wild-cat" scheme. It is possible that the representatives of Western Australia might scarcely be able to think of anything else but this railway, owing to the pressure brought to bear upon them by their constituents.

Senator CLEMONS.—Do not say that!

Senator HIGGS.—If representatives do not voice the requirements of their constituents, they are not true to their trust. The subject of a transcontinental railway might prove insufferably dry to the representatives of other States.

Senator STYLES.—No.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Styles is an expert, and no doubt would be interested, but to other senators the discussion of the question of cost of land, and of the passengers and products to be carried, might prove very dry.

Senator FRASER.—Did the honorable senator say "products"?

Senator HIGGS.—No doubt Senator Fraser desires to make out that the railway will serve only a barren country.

The CHAIRMAN.—There is no objection to the mention of the transcontinental railway as an illustration, but I ask the honorable senator not to go into details.

Senator HIGGS.—It is possible that six senators from another State might come here boiling over with indignation at what they consider the neglect of this Senate, and might give their arguments at great length, and in some cases repeat them. In such case an unkind, I will not say brutal, majority might call for an immediate division, and thus, in their own way, enhance the beautiful Federal sentiment of which we have heard so much.

Senator FRASER.—And save the country.

Senator HIGGS.—And save a few of the wealthy people of Victoria from a little taxation. Other subjects than that of the transcontinental railway might arise, but I do not wish to anticipate matters. Within a short period I might submit a motion, the discussion of which would be deprecated by some of the "right-thinking" persons in the Senate, and, as soon as I have made my observations, an honorable senator might rise and move an immediate division, and be supported by a majority. Is that the way to build up the great Australian nation?

Senator DOBSON.—Majority rule or nothing must build up the nation.

Senator HIGGS.—Free speech is also going to build up the Australian nation. I should like to remind honorable senators of Senator Fraser's observation in reference to revolution and so forth.

Senator FRASER.—There is not complete freedom of speech in Australia; I could give many instances of where it has been stopped.

Senator HIGGS.—What we wish to protect is that freedom of speech which does not infringe on the freedom of speech of others. If I, or any other honorable senator, make a lengthy speech, is there any infringement on the right of another honorable senator to do the same?

Senator PLAYFORD.—If it is not done for the purpose of wasting time, there is no infringement.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Playford knows that there is a limit to human endurance.

Senator WALKER.—On one occasion a Member of Parliament occupied nine hours in a speech.

Senator HIGGS.—That may be so, and it would be possible for any one to make a nine hours' speech under the standing orders if the Chairman permitted. I submit, however, that there is hardly a human being who can make a speech of such length, and keep strictly to the terms of any resolution. A member of the New South Wales Legislature once spoke for a period of eight or nine hours, but he was assisted by the fact that his attention was called to the entrance to the chamber of honorable members from time to time, and took the opportunity to comment on the circumstances.

Senator PLAYFORD.—If the report of a select committee were under consideration, it would be open to an honorable member to read every word of the evidence. One Member of Parliament in New Zealand once spoke for seventeen hours.

Senator HIGGS.—A man who makes a speech of that duration must inflict lasting injury on his physical constitution.

Senator PEARCE.—There is an honorable senator who has earned a particular name for a performance of the kind.

Senator HIGGS.—Yes; "Jawbone Jones," or some name of that sort; but I am sure no one would endeavour to earn a reputation deserving an epithet of the kind. Each of us has a desire to establish a character in the public eye, and we are jealously careful in regard to our actions and conduct.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—We have listened to Senator Higgs with pleasure, but I do not think that gentleman always distinguishes between liberty and licence in speech. The address of nine hours to which reference has been made was, I consider, an example of undue licence. There is nothing more valuable than time, and nothing is more frequently wasted; and I think that the standing order should be accepted. We heard from Senator Dawson a very interesting reference to the application of the closure in the Queensland Parliament, and my sympathies are very largely with him. At the same time, that gentleman did not give the full particulars of the reasons for the action then taken. He did not tell us that day after day a certain minority had wasted a great deal of time; though no doubt the Chairman of Committees on that occasion was somewhat unscrupulous in his methods of rectifying what he thought a glaring and almost criminal course of conduct. From what Senator Higgs said, we may rely that in this Senate we are not likely to be inconsiderate to any minority who wish to express views, however fully, so long as they are relevant to the question before us. About two years ago I had the honour of moving "That the House do now divide," and found the opinion of the Committee decidedly against me. However, in my ignorance, I pressed the matter to a division, and had the pleasure of being gloriously defeated. That shows that the Senate has, in itself, its own protection. I believe we can rely on the good sense of a House like this to give any honorable senator, however much they may differ from him, a full opportunity of enunciating his views. I hope we shall proceed to a decision without further delay.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I am afraid that in the interval between last night and this afternoon some one has got hold of Senator Walker, and, in vulgar parlance, has been "pulling his leg." The honorable senator has just told us that, to a very large extent, he sympathized with what I said about the incident in the Queensland Legislature, but he suggested that I had omitted to mention the circumstances that underlay the particular injustice of which I complained. Senator Walker has led us to understand that the action taken by the majority in Queensland was only after days and days of waste of time and obstruction. But if anybody has so informed the honorable senator, he has been told an untruth, or, if he has looked up the records of the Queensland Parliament, he has misunderstood them. The action was taken on the very first sitting at which this particular Bill was considered; and, now that the matter has been re-opened, I should like to point out to honorable senators what is possible with a biased and vindictive majority. It is absurd to think that we are to be a Senate for all time, and that never, at any particular juncture, we are to have a biased and vindictive majority. We have no guarantee that the class of individuals who now occupy positions in the Senate is going to be continued for ever—that at a time of trouble, when feelings are warm and discussion heated, the natural prejudices of one class against another will never find expression in a vindictive use of the power of a majority, as given under the standing order. This standing order in Queensland was put into operation not only to apply the closure, but in order to get the majority of two-thirds necessary to carry the Bill. To this end the majority deliberately corrupted and prostituted the office of Chairman, and used the power thus obtained to suspend a sufficient number of the Opposition to leave a favorable majority of two-thirds. That shows how far a majority may go in order to carry out their vindictive will. When we know these facts, to ask us to trust to the sense of fair play is to ask what is impossible. So far from days and days being wasted in obstruction, the authority of the majority was put into operation at the very first sitting against a member who had never opened his mouth during the discussion. It was as an indignant protest against this gross and foul injustice that not only did Mr. Brown, who is the present leader of the Opposition in Queensland, and a number of his followers, leave the House, but afterwards Her Majesty's constitutional Opposition, led by the late Mr. Groom and his next in command, who is the present Postmaster-General in the Commonwealth, also retired, leaving the Government faced with empty benches.

Senator WALKER.—At what hour in the morning?

Senator DAWSON.—That was done on the following afternoon.

Senator DRAKE. — That was not done under a standing order of this kind.

Senator DAWSON.—It was done by a deliberate and vicious use of standing orders of the closure description. The honorable and learned gentleman knows that he stood in the chamber hour after hour and protested against the vicious use which was being made of a similar rule, which led to all that trouble, disturbance, and to ill-feeling which has not yet died out. The ill-feeling it created amongst honorable members on either side is not dead. The action we took created an ill-feeling against us. The action which was taken against us created an ill-feeling in myself. I feel so keenly the injustice which was then done that, if I live to be a centenarian, I shall never forgive the perpetrators of it. So long as I am able to crawl I shall use my strength in endeavouring to keep them out of any position of public honour, trust, or confidence. Such injustice makes men hesitate before they will consent to create a power which may be vindictively and viciously used. The least we are entitled to ask for and to receive is some reason from honorable senators which will appeal to any rational being why they desire this power to be granted. Is there any reason in the wide world why it should be granted? Have we had cited any case which would entitle the majority in the Chamber to exercise the power? All we have heard from Senator Drake is that we applied the rule last session, and that his experience of its application was disastrous. As he said, it was used in a most unjust and grossly unfair manner. If in his opinion its application has led to injustice or gross unfairness, surely that experience ought to be convincing proof to him that it ought to be eliminated from this code. If it is passed it will only mean a repetition of unfairness or injustice.

Senator DRAKE. - It was the improper use of the standing order to which I referred.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator has only quoted one instance where the Government have suffered from the use of the rule. I suppose it is not contemplated to have this standing order unless it is intended to be used.

Senator CHARLESTON.—When necessary.

Senator DAWSON.—That time is determined by the majority of the senators present. It was determined by the majority of the senators present on the occasion which Senator Drake complained about.

Senator DRAKE.—I did not agree with their judgment. I did not complain, I merely referred to a fact.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator said that the use of the rule was an injustice, and I think the words he used were "grossly unfair."

Senator DRAKE.—No; those are the honorable senator's words.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator said that the rule was used in a grossly unfair manner against the Government. He led us to understand that the only reason why he wishes to have a permanent rule of the kind is because, while we had a temporary rule, he and his Government once suffered unfairness and injustice from its use.

Senator DRAKE.—No. It was to show that the labour party abused it.

Senator DAWSON.—We are fighting for the abolition of the rule, because it is not likely to conduce to the maintenance of good relations among all sections in the Chamber. The more frequently it is used, the more frequently will the harmony of the Chamber be disturbed. On one occasion it may operate against us, and on another occasion it may operate against the Government. Its operation against us is not likely to put us in a condition of sweet reasonableness, nor is its operation against the Government likely to put them in that frame of mind—with the result that bad feeling will be engendered and maintained. It was first put in operation by the late Senator Sargood, because Senator De Largie, in the exercise of what he conceived to be his right, sought to bring to book an offender in the person of the proprietor of the Argus. A bare majority, not desiring to have that question ventilated, was enabled, under cover of the standing order, to stop all discussion. If it is a good thing for one side, it is a good thing for the other, and as soon as we got an opportunity to exercise this power we followed suit, with a result that Senator Drake and his party did not like. The same feeling will operate again. The majority has no right to ruthlessly trample, not merely on the rights of the minority, but on the rights of an individual member. A senator is not sent in by the good-will of the majority here; he does not stop here by the good-will or the friendship of any member or any body of the Chamber. He is sent in here by another body, whose interests he represents. Every time you infringe upon the individual rights of a senator you infringe upon the rights of those who sent him here.

Senator CHARLESTON.—You must prevent him from interrupting the business.

Senator DAWSON.—I am not claiming that he should be allowed to interrupt the business. I do not urge that any senator or any body of men should be allowed to interrupt the business. We have standing orders to punish any senator who deliberately wastes time or obstructs business. The standing order which I am denouncing deals with quite a different position. If a senator deliberately sets himself to waste time and prevent business from being done, a motion may be moved that he be no further heard, and he can claim the protection of the Senate; and if it says "no," then he is punished. Under this rule, however, the guilty party escapes scot-free, and those who have not contributed to the offence are punished. If Senator Charleston can reconcile his ideas of fair play and justice with a proceeding of that kind, then God help his ideas and the people whose ideas he represents here.

Senator BARRETT (Victoria).—I have followed very closely the discussion on this standing order. I also think that relatively speaking there can be no standing order more important than this one. At the same time I cannot forget that wherever it has been applied it has created a good deal of disturbance, and frequently the minority against whom it has been exercised have proved to represent the majority of the people, and their action has been indorsed at the ballot-box. In the Victorian Parliament many years ago we had some experience of a standing order of this description. In the later seventies the McCulloch Government, who, I believe, held the record for occupancy of office, brought in a standing order to suppress the freedom of speech of certain members who believed that they were fighting in the interests of the country, and they were partly successful. Mr., now Sir, Graham Berry was leading the Opposition. They were fighting for liberal land laws, for protection, for all those liberal statutes which have made Victoria what it is; but they were crushed for the time by the McCulloch Government under a standing order of a similar nature. When the Government appealed to the country, their forces, although they had commanded a big majority in the Parliament, were scattered in all directions, and Mr. Berry was returned to power with the greatest majority that has ever been given to a Premier in our State. We ought to be extremely careful to make this rule as elastic as possible. I am not prepared to accept the statement of what has happened in South Australia as a reason why the rule should be adopted in the Senate. We have heard too much of South Australia in connexion with our standing orders. Simply because South Australia has done this and that, we are told that the Commonwealth Parliament must follow upon the same lines. The testimony is that this standing order has never been put into operation in that State except under extreme and exceptional circumstances. For that reason let us err upon the other side, and give freedom of speech wherever we can.

Senator FRASER.—Freedom to kill time!

Senator BARRETT.—No; because that cannot be done. There is another standing order dealing with that.

Senator FRASER.—It is very difficult to enforce.

Senator BARRETT.—No. If a senator is guilty of tedious repetition the Chairman, who is constituted the judge of tedious repetition, can pull him up. But this standing order would close the whole debate. Senator Drake complains to some extent that this power was used against the Government last session. Senator Higgs admits that it should not have been used, but he says that as the standing order was used against his party, he was justified in using it against the Government.

Senator DRAKE.—Bad reasoning.

Senator BARRETT.—If this power was used unfairly against anybody last session, why give any party power to use it again? Would it not be better to err on the other side rather than restrict free speech? Let our standing orders be elastic. If it be shown that there is a desire to obstruct, let the standing orders we already have be put into operation. I shall vote for the amendment.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I cannot refrain from saying a word or two in reply to Senator Dawson. The people of Queensland, who were the best judges of what took place in the Parliament of that State, have repeatedly, at general elections, returned the Governments who did what has been complained of.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia).—The honorable senators in the corner in which the labour party generally sits seem to think that this standing order is levelled at them. It was not intended to apply to any party or group of senators.

Senator DAWSON.—We say that it only operates against a minority.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—I do not see why they should assume that they are always going to be in a minority.

Senator DAWSON.—We are generally.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Senator Dawson said I think that a biased and vindictive majority would take advantage of the standing order. If there is a biased and vindictive majority it does not matter what standing orders we have. The majority can suspend the standing orders and do anything they like. The whole system under which we live requires that the majority shall rule. The terms of this standing order do not help a biased and vindictive majority, because they can do what they like without it.

Senator PEARCE.—It takes an absolute majority of the Senate to suspend a standing order.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—It can be done upon notice by a majority of those present. Therefore, sooner or later, by some means or other, if there is a majority which is biased, or vindictive, or both, or neither, they can do what they like.

Senator DAWSON.—No they cannot.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—They can suspend the standing orders if any standing orders are in their way.

Senator STYLES.—Any one senator can object to the suspension.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—Oh, no! Standing Order 439, which is the one under which we are working, says—

When a motion for the suspension of any standing or sessional order or orders appears on the notice-paper such motion may be carried by a majority of voices.

The whole system of government under which we live is based on the supposition that the depositary of power, whether the Governor-General, or Ministers, or the Parliament, or individual members, will exercise that power in a fair manner, with proper consideration. If it were not so all government under our system would be impossible. That has been pointed out by Mr. Gladstone in most eloquent words, and undoubtedly it is the fact. I have lived under this standing order for the 36 or 37 years of my parliamentary life. During about 25 years I was a private member, and for ten or eleven years I was President of the Legislative Council of South Australia. During the whole of that period this standing order has hardly ever been abused. A practice has arisen—and I am sure that if we have this standing order a practice will arise in the Senate—which has been very properly described by Senator Higgs. The Government never vote for closing debate, and members who have spoken never vote for it. The rule is only used in those very rare instances when a number of members combine together to stop the whole conduct of public business. It is quite true that there is another Standing Order, No. 412, which enables the President or Chairman to prevent a member who is obviously “stonewalling” from continuing his speech. But that does not apply until there are five or six or half-a-dozen members who are anxious for some reason or another to block all business. It is all a matter of convenience. All these standing orders are matters of convenience. What is most convenient for the ordinary conduct of business? That is all we have to ask. If I thought for one moment that this standing order was going to lead to any injustice towards any party or group of senators, undoubtedly I should not vote for it. But I do not think so. It will have no such effect. I believe that it will, generally, be conducive to the good conduct of public business. There were two occasions during last session on which this standing order was carried into effect. I am sure that honorable senators, generally, regard those events as danger points to be avoided in the future, and not as precedents to be followed. It must be recollected that we were gathered from different States, had been used to different parliamentary practices, and that, perhaps, senators who have not been used to this standing order did not fully appreciate the effect of carrying certain motions. But this debate has shown by the speeches of honorable senators that in future they will not put this standing order into operation unless very grave circumstances require it.

Senator DAWSON.—Suppose we are turned out and new senators come in?

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—The new senators will be leavened by the old.

The CHAIRMAN.—And the standing order can be altered if necessary.

Senator Sir RICHARD BAKER.—It can be altered if it is found that it does not work well. If new senators come in they will, I feel sure, acquire that regard for the orderly conduct of the business and for minorities, and that forbearance towards others, which is so characteristic of this Senate, and I hope always will be. I am certain that those honorable senators who regard this standing order with such apprehension, are fighting a shadow. They have no real reason to be solicitous about it. If I agreed with them, undoubtedly I should vote for some modification of the standing order, but I feel sure that it has worked well in the past, that it will in the future, and that it is utterly impossible to provide by any standing order that the majority shall not ultimately rule.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—Senator Fraser has mentioned by way of reply to myself that the majority in Queensland, which I complained about as acting in a certain manner, had their action indorsed by the electors of that State.

Senator FRASER.—Several times over.

Senator DAWSON.—Let me draw attention to the fact that the only opportunity which the electors of Queensland have had of expressing their opinion one way or the other as between the other party and ourselves, was at the time of the Federal election, when we were returned triumphantly, and the others, including the Speaker who lent himself to the action taken against us on the occasion mentioned, were at the bottom of the poll. I have no intention of pitting my knowledge of these standing orders against that of Senator Baker, but I must differ from his interpretation of them, particularly when he attempts to draw a contrast between the meaning of one standing order and of another. Let me point out one significant remark that dropped from Senator Baker's lips. He spoke of his experience, extending over a number of years, of this standing order, and said that he had hardly ever known it to be abused. In the first place I emphasize what has already been pointed out, that a practice has grown up in South Australia which has rendered this standing order perfectly innocent, and has robbed it of all its sting. There the Government never supports a motion under the standing order, and it is an understood thing that any member who has spoken in the debate does not vote for it. The matter is left to the determination of the other members of the House. But that is the practice only in South Australia, and this Senate is composed of members from the other States as well. Further, Senator Baker said that the power was hardly ever abused, but I say that if it was ever abused, that is a reason why it should not be given. We should not provide standing orders which will allow of abuse or injustice. On the contrary, our standing orders should be framed to prevent injustice and abuse.

Senator FRASER.—This standing order may stop a greater abuse.

Senator DAWSON.—That may be so. But surely there should be some sign that a greater abuse is likely to arise before we proceed to make provision against it? Surely the honorable senator is not anticipating that the Senate is going to be a disorderly House, and that it is therefore necessary to put drastic coercive powers in the hands of the majority? I direct attention to the fact that it is only in extraordinary emergencies that any Parliament seeks for drastic coercive powers. When the trouble arising has been dealt with, these drastic powers are dropped, and the ordinary powers of Parliament are held to be sufficient. What we are being asked to do now is to provide for drastic powers before there is even the suspicion that an offence will be committed. Even the Premier of Victoria, the other day when asking for the most extraordinary powers which a Premier in any British community has ever asked for, explained that he desired to pass them only during the continuance of a particular trouble, and that when that trouble had disappeared, he desired that the drastic powers for which he asked should also disappear. Senator Baker reminded us that a biased and vindictive majority could apply all the standing orders and could move their suspension.

Senator PLAYFORD.—And make new ones.

Senator DAWSON.—I shall consider that also. There is here either a misconception of the true position or an evasion of it, because a motion to suspend the standing orders must be carried by an absolute majority of the whole Senate or two-thirds of the senators present. That is what Senator Higgs is now asking for. Again, notice of a motion for the suspension of the standing orders is given at one sitting, and the motion is moved at another. But under this standing order the objectionable motion may be moved at any moment during the discussion of any subject, and honorable senators may be away who would not think of granting a power of this description. Another important difference is that a motion for the suspension of the standing orders may be debated, whilst no discussion is allowed upon the motion moved under this standing order. A division is to be taken upon it without opportunity either for protest or approval. Surely there is a very great difference in the power given to a biased and vindictive majority in this case, as compared with the cases cited by Senators Baker and Playford. It is true that the majority can make new standing orders, but that cannot be done without opportunity for ample discussion, or without honorable senators having ample notice of what is proposed. If honorable senators cannot see the difference in these cases, I cannot waste my strength and my brains in an endeavour to point out what should be obvious.

Senator FERGUSON (Queensland).—A good deal has been said with regard to what has taken place in the Queensland Parliament, but my experience in Queensland leads me to say that if such a standing order as this was not in force there, the business of the country could not be carried on. If a two-thirds majority were required in the Queensland Parliament to carry such a motion as may be proposed under this standing order, the Parliament would be as badly off as if it had no such standing order, because at the present time there are about 24 members of the labour party in a House of 72 members. However, the standing order has never been used since the occasion to which reference has been made. The reason for that is that the members who were obstructors then are now out of the State Parliament, and we have them here. That is the strongest reason why we should be very careful to leave the proposed standing order as it is. If we do not, we may have here the same obstruction as they had in the Queensland Parliament.
